On Saturday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert were exposed to much annoyance. It appears that with a view of enjoying a private walk, the Queen and Prince Albert, in plain dresses, her Majesty alao wearing a veil, walked from the Palace to the pier. Her Majesty was dressed in a tartan plaid pelisse of French merino, trimmed with dark fur, a straw bonnet, trimmed with velvet, and a black lace veil. Prince Albert wore a kind of shooting jacket of dark velvet. The Royal pair gained the pier unobserved, and walked for nearly an hour, when they prepared to return. The fact that her Majesty was on the pier had, however, become known; and as the Queen and Prince left the esplanade, a considerable number of persons crowded round the toll-gate, and many of them followed her Majesty, as the Prince and herself walked towards the Pavilion. As the Royal pair approached Castle-square the crowd pressed forward more closely, and some errand boys rudely peered beneath her Majesty's bonnet. The Queen eventually escaped from her annoying followers by entering the Palace by the private gates. Her Majesty, it appears, was so displeased with this rude behaviour, that a communication was made to the magistrates, who have since taken steps to prevent a recurrence of the annoyance. The inhabitants of Brighton sometimes felt themselves aggrieved because they did not often enjoy the presence of Royalty; but if the Queen cannot enjoy a walk without being subjected to annoyances from which the meanest of her subjects are free, it is not to be wondered that Brighton is so seldom selected for the Royal residence.

TUESDAY.—Her Majesty took another walk this morning, notwithstanding the ground was covered with snow. Accompanied by Prince Albert, her Majesty drove along the King's-road as far as the Battery, where the Royal party alighted; and her Majesty and the Prince walked across the snowy beach, to the water's edge, where the snow had been washed away by the tide. Thence they proceeded westward as far as Brunswick-square, where the carriage was waiting, and next drove to the Chain-pier. The Queen and Prince Albert walked to the pier-head; and on their return met the carriage containing Lady Lyttelton and her Royal children.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the Princess Royal, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttleton, rode out upon their new sledge this morning, which her Majesty used for the first time. The sledge was driven by Prince Albert, and the Royal party proceeded as far as Clayton Tunnel, about six miles from Brighton, before they returned. The sledge is very elegantly constructed, and the ponies being elegantly harnessed with a profusion of bells, it had altogether a novel and beautiful appearance. His Royal Highness tried the sledge before he took the Queen out. (Next week, we shall present our readers with an engraviug of this elegant, and, in this country, novel, equipage.) The Queen and Prince Albert rode out in the afternoon in an open carriage, for an airing on the cliffs.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

London, Saturday, February 15, 1845.

The business of the Session can hardly yet be said to have commenced; there has been no debating, and all the interest of the Parliamentary proceedings is confined to the questions and replies that sometimes elicit a slight indication of future measures or intentions. But this information is not frequently obtained, or when obtained, altogether definite; the possession of office seems to confer an unrivalled faculty of avoiding a direct answer to a direct question; some official reserve may be necessary, but it ought scarcely to be made the rule to be always acted on, which appears to be nearly the case.

One measure only of any great public importance has been introduced this week, and that is the bill for amending the Law of Settlement. Every one must be familiar with the evils of the present parochial system, which made parish officers, in some cases, go to the length of absolute homicide by neglect of giving, or refusing to give, relief in cases where the settlement was doubtful. Destitute persons in the last stage perhaps of disease, were bandied about from parish to parish and from overseer to overseer, recognised by neither party and rejected by both, till they sank exhausted, and death put an end to the contest by removing the hapless cause of it. Parishes stood on their legal rights perfectly regardless of what humanity and charity required, and till the legal title of the pauper to relief was established, his necessity was disregarded, and while lawyers and parish officers were quarrelling, a fellow creature perished for want. The litigation arising from questions of disputed settlement, was, under the old system, most expensive; the sums wasted every year in this manner were enormous, and the abuses of this kind were proved to be so gross that the necessity for preventing them formed one of the principal arguments in favour of the New Poor-law Act. But much of the old system still remains, and to remedy the intricacies of the Law of Settlement as connected with the parochial system, is the object of Sir J. Graham's bill. Settlements are now obtained by birth, by apprenticeship, by service, by residence; all requiring proof and evidence, which, after a lapse of many years, is difficult to obtain. The new measure proposes that after the passing of the act, birth alone shall confer a settlement, leaving all existing settlements unchanged. The bill, in fact, has no retroactive effect, but is prospective only. In the bill proposed by Sir J. Graham last year, he made a residence of five years confer such a right of settlement, irrespective of birth, that a pauper could not be removed if he became chargeable. The beneficial effect of this is evident enough, as so long a residence cannot but in most cases have produced ties and connections with a locality from which it must be painful to be severed. But now this provision is to be expunged, and we regret that it is so. We do not see that a rigid adherence to the birth-settlement alone is absolutely necessary, and many cases may occur in which it will be very objectionable.

But the great feature of the bill is one that we think will excite more of opposition than the author of it anticipates. He proposes, as far as questions of settlement are concerned, to abolish altogether the division of England into parishes, and to substitute the district unions for them. This breaking up of an old system, so grown in, as it were, and blended with our social condition, is not a thing to be assented to without great consideration. Already symptoms of opposition are visible from both sides of the house, and this part of the bill will evidently be warmly contested. The abolishing of the clause of the act of last year, making long residence a bar to removal, has also injured the measure; and with these two objections to it, it would not at all surprise us to see it miscarry in its progress through the house, as many of Sir James Graham's, be it said in passing, have done before. He is an able and dexterous administrator of a law when made, but as the originator of legislative measures, he has not been successful. His Education Bill broke down beneath a weight of popular dislike that was fatal to it. His present Medical bill seems to be most unpalateable to the profession it is intended to regulate, and this measure on the Law of Settlement contains much that will be difficult to carry through.

From a conversation that occurred on Wednesday evening, it is not unlikely that Lord J. Russell may move an amendment in the discussion that will take place on the Financial statement of Sir R. Peel. If the amendment should refer to a modification of that part of the Property Tax which presses on income, to which we have referred in another article, we think the noble lord will have a strong case, and his opposition may prove formidable, as the question is not a party but a universal one. Everything, however, will depend on the details of the Prime Minister's proposition.

There must be some magic hidden in the sum of five pounds. It will release a man from the consequence of many grievous offences, and, if he can command the sum, give him impunity in committing them. A ruffian may beat a man, or if he prefers it, a woman, to any amount short of causing death, and five pounds will satisfy the law; this has been proved over and over again, at our police-offices, which present frequent instances of gentlemen indulging in the luxury of a piece of brutality, as they would in that of a rare bottle of wine, or very out of season and impossible fruits, or any other rarity, or it may be excitement. For the same sum any fool with a taste for notoriety, may, when half-mad, and wholly drunk, destroy a rare work of art and antiquity, which no amount of wealth can replace! Five pounds is the price of the indulgence; the demolishing of the Portland vase, at the British Museum, and the proceedings consequent on it, are as good as an advertisement, that in all public galleries and collections, sculpture and paintings may be destroyed on the lowest possible terms, with every facility given, and perhaps a reduction allowed to any one demolishing a quantity! A Rubens or a Titian are dirt cheap at the price, considering the notice to be gained by the transaction, and an Eve by Bailey or a Grace by Canova, present very eligible opportunities of acquiring distinction. Considering the smallness of the penalty and the intense love of fame in the class that furnishes our Oxfords and Beans, we would advise the closing the doors of the British Museum and the National Gallery for a month at least, till the mania of imitation, that almost invariably follows such strokes of genius, dies out. One suicide from the Monument is the cause of several. There are many more fragile articles in the Museum, to which a fit of delirium tremens and a lump of stone may be fatal. As the law gives no protection to what is of inestimable value, let the guardians of them at least try to preserve them by some effort of their own. Seriously, the glaring defect of the law in this respect is lamentable. Some vagabond, with his nerves and judgment all shattered by drunkenness, wilfully destroys a work of art, the loss of which is absolutely a national one, and he can escape with a paltry fine, or a slight imprisonment, which to one so degraded is probably no punishment at all. The subject has very properly been taken notice of in Parliament, and we do hope, this great defect will be remedied. Surely a rare work, by a Raphael or Titian, ought to have as great an amount of protection from the law as a sapling or a bunch of turnips!

The French press is not satisfied with the Queen's Speech, and the discussion upon the Address in reply to it. There is nothing wonderful in that, for it is difficult to say what would not be made a grievance that England is connected with. But their remarks are something less fierce and violent than might have been expected, being rather of the nature of grumbling than of invective. The most serious complaints are founded on the contemplated increase in our naval force, particularly the steam portion of it, and the omission of all notice of the Morocco war in the debates of the House of Commons! The latter phenomenon may be explained from a habit very common among Englishmen, of not talking much of what is no concern of theirs—a habit which our neighbours might imitate with advantage. But the French are no less discontented with their own Government than with us: the attempt to effect a reduction in the postage charges of France has failed in the French Chamber, on a division of 170 for the reduction, and 169 against it; the President added his vote in the negative, and the numbers being equal, the question was declared lost. When the numbers are equal in the House of Commons, the decision is given in the affirmative. The Débats, in commenting on the extraordinary result, says:—

Thus we are in France—the most timid men in the world in making useful changes, the most hardy and the most rash in vain and dangerous innovations. We are all fire for revolutions, and all ice for good and wise reforms. It is not so that our neighbours, the English, proceed, and they are not the worse for it. What boldness and what resolution is there in their conceptions of political economy! They diminish the postage on letters in the proportion of nine to one, and at the same moment they draw from their coffers 500,000,000, to indemnify the proprietors of slaves in their colonies. We discuss during long years the expediency of emancipation of postal reform and of other subjects more or less worthy of interest. We make good speeches, we compose better books, but when it becomes necessary to carry any of those measures into effect, our heart fails us.

Had such a severe censure appeared in an English paper, it would have been denounced as another proof of national hatred and antipathy.

ANOTHER REPORT FROM THE BOARD OF TRADE ON RAILWAYS.

Railway Department, Board of Trade, Whitehall, Feb. 11.

Notice is hereby given, that the Board constituted by the Minute of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, for the transaction of railway business, having had under consideration the Bolton, Wigan, and Liverpool Railway scheme, have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the said scheme:

And the Board, having further had under consideration the following schemes, proposed by the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Company, viz., the Patricroft and Clifton Branches, the St. Helens and Rufford Branch, the Parkside Branch, the Extensions into Liverpool, have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the Patricroft and Clifton Branches, the Parkside Branch, the Extensions into Liverpool, and against the St. Helens and Rufford Branch.

And the Board having further had under consideration the Trent Valley Railway scheme, have decided on reporting to Parliament in favour of the said scheme, with the exception of the Potteries and the Alrewas Branches, the postponement of which, until a future period, will be recommended.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

Windsor, Thursday Evening.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, who has not been able to leave Frogmore House during the day, in consequence of the extreme unfavourable nature of the weather, gave a small dinner party this evening. Covers were laid for fifteen. Information reached the Castle this morning, that her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, will take their departure from Brighton, for Buckingham Palace, on Tuesday next, at the latest. The infant Royal Family will remain for about a week or ten days longer at the Pavilion. The new organ, towards the erection of which, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert subscribed the sum of £80, was performed upon, for the first time, this morning; divine service commencing at six o'clock. Nothwithstanding the extreme inclemency of the weather, the church of St. John was nearly filled in every part, the whole of the principal inhabitants of the town being present. The Musical Service included the "Cantate in D.," by Dr. G. J. Elvey; the Anthem "Sing we merrily to God," by Dr. Crotch; and the Coronation Anthem, "Behold! O God, our Defender," composed for the Coronation of her Majesty, by Dr. Elvey, who presided at the organ. The vocal parts were sustained by the gentlemen and choristers of St. George's Chapel, the whole of whom were present. The prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Bentley, one of the assistant curates. The old organ, which formerly belonged to St. George's Chapel, was presented to the parish church by George the Third, upwards of 50 years ago.

Prince Albert.—It is rumoured, and we believe upon good authority, that the title of King-Consort is about to be conferred upon his Royal Highness Prince Albert. This, we presume, would be preliminary to a demand for an increased grant. It is said, also, that there will be a brevet on the occasion.

Mr. Baron Gurney.—We regret to state that the learned baron continues confined to his bed at Brighton, very seriously ill.

Lady Lyndhurst's Soiree.—Lady Lyndhurst has issued cards for her first soirée to the foreign corps diplomatique and their ladies, &c. on Tuesday next, at the noble and learned lord's mansion in George-street, Hanover-square.

The Earl of Derby.—The venerable Earl of Derby continues in improved health at Knowsley Hall, Lancashire. The Hon. Colonel and Mrs. Stanley are staying with his lordship.

The Earl of Mornington.—We regret to state this venerable nobleman is daily growing weaker, and little or no hope is now entertained of his recovery.

Earldom of Panmure.—A petition of Mr. W. Maule, praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to adjudge and declare "that he has right to the title, honours, and dignities of the Earldom of Panmure, and Lord Brechin and Navar," was presented by command of her Majesty on Tuesday to the House of Lords, and it was referred to the Committee of Privileges.

Marriage in High Life.—The Lady L. Fitzmaurice, only daughter of the Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne, was married on Monday to the Hon. Henry Howard, M.P., son of the Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY. Feb. 10.

In a convocation holden this day, the Rev. Frederic Wade, M.A., of Trinity College, Dublin, was admitted ad eundem.

At the same time a Congregation was holden, when the following degrees were conferred:—

Masters of Arts: The Rev. William Rogers, Exeter; Rev. John Acres, Lincoln.

Bachelors of Arts: Frederic George Blomfield, Baliol; Alfred Richard Myddleton Wilshere, Pembroke; George Charles Benn, Merton.

In the same Congregation, Mr. Daman, of Oriel, was nominated by the Junior Proctor, to be a public examiner in Literis Humanioribus.

The University of Oxford and the Tract No. 90.—At nine o'clock yesterday evening the Proctors announced to the Vice Chancellor their intention to exercise their right of veto and negative the proposed decree respecting the tract No. 90, which was to have been submitted to Convocation. The short notice for so important a measure is said to be the reason which has induced the Proctors to take this step. Mr. Gladstone, M.P., and Dr. Hook will, it is said, attend Convocation, and register their votes against the proposed measure for degrading Mr. Ward.

Feb. 12.

The following gentlemen have been elected Proctors for the ensuing year by their respective societies:—

Senior Proctor.—Rev. Thomas Harris, M.A., Fellow of Magdalene College.

Feb. 13.

At the Convocation, on a scrutiny, the number of votes were, for Mr. Ward, 586; against him, 777. For the second proposition: for the degradation of Mr. Ward, the votes were for the degradation, 569; against it, 511. The third proposition, for the condemation of Tract 90, was then negatived by the Proctors.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.

Feb. 13.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At the last congregation the following degrees were conferred:—

M.A.—Thomas Brown Foulkes, Queen's College; Thomas Peckstone, Trinity College; Thomas T. Leete, Caius College.

L.L.B.—James Mules, Trinity Hall.

B.A.—Samuel W. King, Catherine Hall; William Gilder, St. John's College; Frederick Bliss, Trinity College; G. Head, Trinity College; H. Nichols, Trinity College; J. M. Lukin, St. Peter's College; J. F. Ogle, Jesus College; E. T. W. Probyn, Caius College; W. Sloane Evans, Trinity College.

Augustus Frederick Birch, has been admitted a Scholar of King's.

The Rev. D. S. Hodson, B.A., Corpus Christi, has been appointed Head Master of Bolton Grammar School; and Lorenzo Smith, B.A., of Emmanuel, Master of the Lower School, Manchester.

The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's have presented the Rev. R. S. Bower, M.A., to the rectories of St. Mary Magdalen and St. Gregory by St. Paul's, in the city of London, vacant by the promotion of the Rev. John Saunders, M.A., to the rectory of St. Luke, Old street.

The Bishop of Ely.—His lordship still continues in a very precarious state; and it is thought by his medical attendants that should the slightest relapse unfortunately take place, a fatal result may in all probability be expected. His lordship suffers very much from a violent and frequent cough. His medical attendants are one or other constantly by his bed-side, and in addition to those called in, Dr. Haviland, the regius professor of physic in the University of Cambridge, was sent for in the commencement of the attack.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

OFFICIAL CHANGES.—We believe it is arranged that the Hon. W. B. Baring succeeds Sir Edward Knatchbull in the office of Paymaster General to the Forces; and, as we have already stated, Lord Jocelyn succeeds Mr. Baring at the Board of Control.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office on Thursday. The council was attended by all the Ministers.

QUEEN'S COUNSEL.—The following gentlemen are to be raised to the rank of Queen's Counsel:—Messrs. Lee, Parry, and Wood, of the Equity Bar; and Messrs. Humfrey, Hayward, Butt, Russell Gurney, and Montagu Chambers, of the Common Law Bar.

CALEDONIAN BALL.—The anniversary ball of the Caledonian Society of London took place at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, on Thursday, the 13th instant. The assembly consisted of upwards of five hundred elegantly-dressed persons. About sixty visitors appeared in fancy costumes, but the national Celtic garb predominated among the members of the Society.

NEW ZEALAND COMPANY.—On Thursday a special general meeting of the proprietors was held at the office, Broad-street Buildings, for the purpose of receiving a report of the affairs of the company, and of adopting measures thereon, in pursuance of the adjournment from the 30th of January last. Mr. Somes, M.P., the Governor, presided, and there were present Mr. Marjoribanks, M.P., Mr. Mangles, M.P., Mr. Hutt, M.P., Mr. G. Lyall, jun., Mr. Jeremiah Pilcher, late Sheriff, Mr. George Robns, and several other directors and governors. The proceedings being opened, the report was read by the secretary, being the 17th of the directors. The details were confined to the dispute between the company and the Colonial Secretary, and to the conduct of Government in relation to the colony. The report concluded by recommending the adoption of a petition to Parliament, and by expressing a hope that there the company would receive that justice denied to them by the Colonial Secretary. Mr. Somes, M.P., the Governor, next censured the conduct of Lord Stanley in very severe terms, and observed that if Lord John Russell had been in power the state of things would be quite different. Mr. George Robins also censured the conduct of the Colonial Secretary, observing, that although a Conservative, he would give the Whigs every credit for the attention which they had ever paid to the interests of the company. It was finally settled that a petition should be presented to Parliament, praying for redress.

LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.—On Wednesday the twenty-third half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of this company was held at the Euston station—Mr. George Carr Glyn in the chair. From the report, it appeared that the revenue for the half year ending December 31, amounted to £456,477, of which £450,479 was derived from the ordinary traffic, and £5968 from interest on the employment of cash balances and from rents. The charges amounted to £182,543, of which £96,413 was for working the line, and £86,130 parish rates, Government duty, &c. The ordinary traffic exceeded the amount in the corresponding half year of 1844, by £18,122. The charge for working it was less by £273, making the comparative rate of half-yearly charge to receipt as £21 8s. 1d. per cent. in 1844, to £22 7s. 3d. in 1843. The net proceeds, £273,904, added to the surplus of the preceding half-year, £15,937, left a clear profit of £289,841, and on this amount the directors recommended that a dividend of £5 be again declared on every £100 of the company's capital stock, leaving a rest of £47,093 to the credit of the current half year. The report was adopted, and resolutions were passed authorising the directors to lease the Churnet line, by which a direct communication would be made with Manchester, and also to lease the Trent line; also authorising the directors to construct a branch line from Dunstable to the London and Birmingham line at Leighton Buzzard. A resolution was also passed, empowering the directors to purchase the West London Railway. Five retiring directors were unanimously re-elected.

SNOWBALL FIGHT WITH THE POLICE.—On Wednesday hundreds of persons collected in the New Kent-road, to witness a most extraordinary affray with the police. Some boys were throwing snowballs at each other, when a constable of the P division seized one of the lads, about twelve years of age, for the purpose of conveying him to Southwark-bridge station-house. In a few minutes a mob collected, and among them several boys, some of larger growth, who instantly commenced an attack on the man in authority. Another constable also ran to the assistance of his brother officer, when a general attack by snowballs was made on them. One of the constables took charge of the prisoner, while the other endeavoured to take some of the elder delinquents, but they were too nimble and effected a safe retreat, joined by the boy who had been first captured. The constables then gave up all hope of capture, much to their discomfiture. It may be as well to mention that the fine, if convicted, is 40s., for throwing snowballs in the public thoroughfares.

MORTALITY OF THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths during the week ending February 8 was 1018, the proportion being 510 males to 508 females, showing a considerable increase over the average of the last five years, which was 963; 491 being males, and 472 females. In the first class, including epidemic diseases, there is an increase of four as compared with the weekly average of the last five years; 33 deaths have occurred from small-pox, 27 from measles, and 34 from scarlatina during the week, all, with the exception of 11, being under the age of 15. The deaths from diseases of the lungs, including bronchitis and asthma, amounted to 336, exceeding the average by 44; and there is an increase in deaths from violence, privation, cold, and intemperance, the average being 26, but the number during the past week is 33.

ANOTHER SHIP ON FIRE.—On Wednesday afternoon, a fire broke out on board the brig King of the Netherlands, Captain J. Pain, lying off the Surrey Canal, Rotherhithe. It originated in the fore cabin, in consequence of the overheat of the stove. There being a large number of sacks and sacking in that portion of the vessel, it was speedily wrapped in flame, and at one time it was feared that the brig would have been totally destroyed. Several persons on shore instantly put off to render assistance, and after some trouble they succeeded in confining the flames to the cabin, but they were not extinguished until a considerable quantity of sacks had been destroyed, the cabin burned round, and the bulk-head seriously damaged by cutting away. The present is the third ship that has been on fire in the river Thames during the week. The vessel belongs to the Steam Towing Company.

COUNTRY NEWS.

REPRESENTATION OF LEWES.—The Hon. Henry Fitzroy arrived at Lewes on Monday evening, and immediately issued an address to his constituents. The hon. gentleman commenced his canvass early next morning. Mr. George Daring Kemp (son of the late Mr. Thomas Read Kemp, formerly a member for this borough) has just issued an address; and Mr. Summer Harford also made his appearance on Wednesday. The election is fixed for next Monday.

OPENING OF THE ROCHESTER AND GRAVESEND RAILWAY.—The Rochester and Gravesend Railway was opened on Monday with the usual formalities, and, nothwithstanding the intense severity of the weather, a considerable number of passengers passed up and down during the day, whilst the lookers-on mustered in strong force at the various points of the line where the train was visible.

BUCKINGHAM ELECTION.—On Monday Sir T. Fremantle was again elected for Buckingham, without opposition. When declared duly elected, Sir T. Fremantle returned thanks, and said he could assure the electors that he had not ventured to aspire to so high a post as the one which he then had the honour of filling, which was one of the highest in the government of Ireland, and second only to that of Prime Minister (hear); but there were frequent occasions, both in public and private life, when they were obliged to submit to the wishes and judgment of others. It was under some such circumstances that he had accepted the office that had been offered to him. (Loud cheers.) He would be always at his post, and when he ceased to do so he would cease to be their representative. (Loud cheers.) He was personally unacquainted with Ireland; but having been a member of the House of Commons for seventeen years, and having taken part in the legislative measures connected with that country, he felt the greatest interest in its prosperity. Taunts had been thrown out that the English people disliked the Irish. Nothing could be more unfounded. (Hear, hear.) A more warm-hearted people did not exist than the Irish (cheers); treat them with kindness, and you would make them friends. Ireland was an integral part of the empire, and was to be treated like the counties of York or Cornwall. Unfortunately there did exist in that country a strong distrust of the British Parliament, British rulers, and the people. He, however, did not despair of seeing the day when the people of that country would look to the union with this kingdom as their best safeguard (Loud cheers.) Everything must be done to conciliate the people of Ireland, laying down the rule that the legislative union should be maintained, the Church upheld, and the laws respected. They were prepared to hold out the right hand of friendship to their fellow-subjects, and make friends with them. They might fail, but it would not be for want of honest intentions or active exertions.

STAMFORD ELECTION.—We stated last week that the nomination for Stamford would take plaee on Monday. On that day Sir G. Clerk was returned without opposition. Sir George acknowledged the honour conferred upon him in suitable terms. The Whig papers state that when Sir George made his appearance on the hustings in the morning, hundreds of snow balls were thrown at him: and, after the election, the hustings were pulled down by the mob, who followed his carriage, but were kept off by a strong party of special constables; they continued, however, to pelt him with snowballs. The ceremony of "chairing" was soon brought to a close, they add, and Sir George was glad to take shelter at the hotel where the committee sat, for the showers of snowballs continued unabated. He had scarcely alighted before every decoration was taken from his carriage; and when he made his appearance on the balcony to return thanks, he was again attacked with snowballs, which prevented him from uttering more than a few words at a time. Several windows in the hotel were broken. On leaving the balcony, Sir George good-humouredly told his friends in the room that he never expected such treatment from the inhabitants of Stamford, who, on former occasions, had evinced so much kindness towards him.

SUDDEN DEATH OF M. MIDDLETON, ESQ., OF HOPTON HALL.—We have to announce the untimely death of Marmaduke Middleton, Esq., of Hopton Hall, Derbyshire. Mr. Middleton met Mr. Meynell Ingram's hounds at Radborne, on the morning of the 6th instant, and had the misfortune to be thrown from his horse twice in the field. By the latter fall his head was injured, and he was obliged to leave the hounds, and return to Radborne, where he remained about two hours; he then felt himself so much recovered as to consider himself able to ride home. He had proceeded about four miles, accompanied by Mr. John Hall, of Hopton, when (as is supposed from the effects of his recent injury), he again fell from his horse, and pitched his head on the hard and frozen road. He was taken up quite insensible, and conveyed to the nearest house, Mr. Webster's, Mercaston Hall, where every possible care and attention were shown to him, but he survived only about an hour. An inquest was held last Saturday—the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

A CHILD BURNED TO DEATH BY HER MOTHER, IN CUMBERLAND.—Last week we gave an account of the barbarous murder of a little girl, named Sarah Ann Crosby, by her mother, Jane Crosby, who burnt the child to death. Some additional particulars of this frightful transaction were elicited at the Coroner's Inquest. The investigation commenced a little after noon on the 30th ult., and was continued till midnight on Friday, when it was adjourned till Monday last, the 10th instant. William Crosby, the father of the murdered child, is a labourer in husbandry, and is only at home on the Saturday evenings and Sundays. He has a wife named Jane, and two daughters, namely, Mary and Sarah Ann, aged respectively about 12 and 7 years, the only issue of his marriage with his wife. Mrs. Crosby is a woman of most dissolute character, passionate, and greatly addicted to drinking spirituous liquors, and taking laudanum in large quantities. The murdered child was the greater favourite of the father (the mother having poisoned the mind of the elder with indulgences and threatenings), and was in the habit of telling him on Saturday nights what her mother had done during the week; and on that account the mother, from time to time, manifested a most inveterate and inhuman dislike and hatred to her younger child. She frequently most cruelly beat her, and turned the poor child out of doors at bed time and kept her out all night, and on several occasions threatened to put an end to the child's existence. In order to carry this barbarous and unnatural resolve into effect, on Tuesday evening, the 28th ult., she made up a large fire in the kitchen of her own house, with the determination of sacrificing her child in the flames prepared by her own hands. For reasons only known to this wretched woman herself, she stripped off all the child's clothes and hid them in a hole behind the inner door and in the ash-midden, and, having done so, took the child by its legs and arms, and literally roasted it to death. One side of the face was much burnt and the eye nearly out and its breast and neck and back were most shockingly burnt. It appears that the child, on being held over the fire, had turned its head on one side, and thrust it forward, and by doing so one side of the face was more burnt than the other, and that she had thrust her breast against the red-hot bar, which accounts for the severe burn on that part of the body. The wretched woman then took the child off the fire, and held her on her knee by the fire till life was nearly extinct, the little innocent faintly asking her other sister for a drink of water. On calling in the neighbours she said that Sarah Ann (the deceased) had set herself on fire while she (the mother) was absent at a farmhouse about two miles off, and made other incredible excuses. A person was sent to the farmhouse to inquire if Jane Crosby had been there that day or evening, when it was ascertained that the tale was a fabrication. Mr. Carrick, the surgeon, was sent for, but on his arrival he found the child in a state beyond reach of medical aid, and the poor child died about two next morning. On examining the child's shift it was found to be burnt about the neck and back, but the burnt places had been made with a red-hot poker, and the other articles of dress not being visible suspicion became stronger, especially when the prisoner's former bad conduct was taken into consideration. Richard Weston, one of the witnesses, searched the house, and found the clothes hidden in a hole of the wall behind the inner door. On the first investigation of this horrid murder, the elder girl seemed reluctant to give her evidence freely, alleging that if she told the truth she was afraid of her mother, who would ill-use her. At the adjourned inquest she gave her testimony more frankly. Fourteen witnesses were examined, and the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder." The wretched woman was committed to Carlisle gaol to take her trial at the next assizes, which commence on the 22d instant. This shocking tragedy has given rise to the greatest excitement at Lammonby and the surrounding neighbourhood, and, indeed, throughout the whole of Cumberland. The village of Lammonby is near Greystoke, about eight miles and a half north of Penrith.

OPENING OF THE MARYPORT AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.—The opening of the above-named line of railway, from end to end, a distance of 28 miles, was celebrated on Monday with great ceremony. Most of the shops in Maryport were closed, and business was in a great measure suspended throughout the town. The first train from Carlisle arrived at Maryport at twelve o'clock, and the whole of the carriages were literally crammed with passengers, who, on their arrival, were greeted with the firing of cannon, and by the loud and hearty cheering of the immense crowd assembled at the station yard. The train started from Maryport at one o'clock. Now that this railway is opened out, a large accession of passenger traffic is anticipated, in consequence of its connection with the Newcastle and Carlisle line at the latter town. The company are preparing a number of third class carriages, covered and seated, for the conveyance of passengers along the line at the rate of 1d. per mile.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE PORTLAND VASE.—On Tuesday, the young man named William Lloyd, who was brought before Mr. Jardine, at BOW-STREET, on Friday evening, was placed at the bar for final examination, charged with wilfully and maliciously destroying with a stone the inimitable vase in the British Museum. The vase, which was valued at £1000 and upwards, was described as being the property of his Grace the Duke of Portland. Sir Henry Ellis, the principal librarian, and several gentlemen connected with the museum, were on the bench. Mr. Bodkin appeared for the prosecution. The prisoner, on being placed at the bar, appeared perfectly composed, and by no means evinced any symptoms of mental aberration. —Mr. Burnaby, the chief clerk, addressing him, said—When you were last brought before the court you refused to give your name: do you now choose to give it or not?—Prisoner: I do not wish to give my name. Mr. Burnaby, by direction of the magistrate, then read over the evidence given by Mr. Edward Hawkins, the keeper of the antiquities in the museum, at the former examination.—Mr. Bodkin asked the prisoner if he wished to say anything to the charge preferred against him?—The Prisoner: I merely wish to say this, that I do not wish to give my name, as it might involve other persons in my disgrace. —Mr. Bodkin: Without making any mention of persons connected with you, what have you to say to the charge of having broken the vase?—Prisoner: Only this, that I had been indulging in intemperance for some days, from the effects of which I had only partially recovered when I entered the museum, and being consequently in a state of nervous excitement I was afraid of everything I met with, and under such impression I acted in the manner I have done, and for which I was then taken into custody; but I did not commit the act through any design or evil intention whatever towards any person.—Mr. Bodkin said he had the honour to appear on behalf of the trustees of the British Museum, upon whom the principal duty devolved in prosecuting in the case on the part of his Grace the Duke of Portland, who had kindly permitted the property in question to be placed in the museum for the inspection and gratification of the public. It was deemed necessary since the last examination that a medical gentleman should wait on the prisoner, for the purpose of examining into the state of his mind, and the report made left no doubt of the prisoner's sanity. It was, therefore, with a view to protect property of this description, and affording a public example, by punishing a person convicted of such a flagrant act, that the present course was adopted. It was much to be regretted that such was the defective state of the law upon such offences, that it was difficult to meet the present charge by anything like an adequate punishment; however, it was provided by the 24th section of the Wilful Damage Act, "that if any person shall unlawfully or maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil to, or upon, any real or personal property whatever, either of a public or private nature, for which no remedy or punishment was therein before provided, every person being convicted thereof before a justice of the peace, should forfeit and pay such sum of money as should appear to the justice to be reasonable compensation for the damage, injury, or spoil so committed, not exceeding the sum of £5.—Mr. Jardine to the prisoner: You have heard what has been stated. Have you anything to say?—Prisoner: Whatever punishment you feel it your duty to inflict upon me I shall feel the consolation that it is really deserved. —Mr. Jardine: Are any of your friends in attendance?—Prisoner: None whatever.—Mr. Hawkins, one of the superintendents of the British Museum, proved that the shade, which was worth about £3, the fragments of which were lying on the floor with the fragments of the vase, was the property of the trustees of the museum.—Mr. Jardine said that was the most perfect and legitimate course for the trustees to pursue, and called upon the prisoner to pay the amount of the glass shade, having wilfully and maliciously destroyed it.—Prisoner: I assure you, Sir, it was not done maliciously.—Mr. Jardine: In the eye of the law it was a malicious act on your part, and I cannot help, in my humble capacity, observing with the counsel, that the act of parliament providing for such offences is very inefficient, which prevents my entertaining the case respecting the destruction of the vase against you for the present; but for the destruction of the glass shade I shall put the law in full force, and order you to pay the sum of £3 forthwith, and in default be committed to hard labour in the House of Correction for two calendar months. The prisoner is an Irishman, apparently about 21 years of age, of respectable appearance, and rather under the ordinary stature. He is of a fair complexion, thin, and apparently somewhat delicate; the weakness of his voice in some measure justifies this last impression. He was well dressed, and wore a great coat. There was something strange in his looks and manner at the first examination, but on Tuesday we could trace nothing in either to justify the notion that his mental faculties are deranged. In the course of Thursday Mr. Jardine received a letter from some unknown person, by whom the sum of £3 was enclosed, with directions that it should be paid to the Trustees of the British Museum, to whom compensation was awarded to that amount, for the destruction of the glass case surrounding the Portland Vase. The magistrate therefore gave directions for the immediate release of the delinquent, who was as promptly set at large by the Governor of Tothill-fields Prison.

POSTSCRIPT.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO THE DUKE OF NORFOLK.—On Thursday, at eleven o'clock, her Majesty and Prince Albert left the Palace at Brighton, to lunch with the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk at Arundel Castle. Her Majesty was attended by the Countess of Mount Edgcombe. At a quarter-past twelve the Royal cortège was seen approaching the Marine Hotel, Worthing, when the bells struck up a merry peal, and as soon as the Royal carriage drew up, her Majesty was greeted with the most respectful loyalty. The Duke of Norfolk had arrived previously, for the purpose of accompanying her Majesty to Arundel. Her Majesty conversed freely from the carriage window with the noble duke, who, the moment the horses were put to, proceeded by the side of the Royal carriage on horseback. The Duchess of Norfolk received her Majesty on alighting from the Royal carriage. Twelve of the duke's servants appeared in state liveries of crimson and gold—each suit cost 25 guineas. This visit of her Majesty is preparatory to a three days' visit in the summer. Her Majesty returned to Brighton at a quarter to six to dinner. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert have engaged to take luncheon with the Earl of Liverpool at Broxted Park, near Cuckfield. The noble earl has invited a large circle to the dejéuner to meet his august visitors.

FOREIGN.

LATER NEWS FROM THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.—The mail steamer Cambria has arrived, with New York papers to the 31st December. The American House of Representatives, and also the Senate, are busily occupied in discussing the Oregon territory question, and in both houses a bill has been brought in for the actual establishment of a territorial government over that country. In Texas the movements are towards annexation to the United States. The news from Mexico is most important; but there seems to be a doubt as to its correctness in some points. Santa Anna is said to have been defeated and captured by Bravo and Paredes, and some accounts state positively that he has been shot. On a careful examination of the various accounts, we have little doubt but that the news of his defeat will turn out perfectly correct. It is stated that letters from Mexico, dated the 9th ult., arrived at Tampico by express on the night of the 13th, giving the important intelligence that a desperate battle had been fought on the plains of Appan, between Santa Anna on the one side, and Bravo and Paredes on the other, which ended in the total rout of the former, who was captured in trying to make his escape. Five hundred men are reported to be killed, and General Paredes had been despatched by Bravo in pursuit of the routed troops of Santa Anna. Bravo himself was on the march back to Mexico, with his august prisoner.

RAILWAY COLLISION.—A collision of trains took place on Tuesday night on the Brandling Junction Railway, near the Felling station, but happily none of the passengers were hurt.

Accounts have been received of the death of Sir James Dowling, Chief Justice of New South Wales.

LONDON FEVER HOSPITAL.—Yesterday (Friday) the annual meeting of the Governors of this hospital was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Thomas Everett, Esq., Treasurer, in the chair. The gross receipts, including dividends and £200 from the City of London, amounted to £2365 6s., and the expenditure figured £1823 11s. 11d. The funded property exceeded £3726. The report was adopted, and the Rev. E. Scovell, whose eloquent appeal on behalf of the Hospital last Sunday added £154 6s. 4d. to the fund, was elected Honorary Governor. Thanks were then voted the Chairman, and the meeting adjourned.

BURNING OF THE BARK, "HENRY."

On Monday afternoon, about 3 o'clock, the bark Henry, which was taking in coals off the East India Dock buoy, near Blackwall, was perceived to be in flames. The light but steady breeze which prevailed all day fanned the flames into such fierceness, that all the efforts of the astonished crew to check their progress were soon rendered ineffectual, and, as the only means of saving the adjacent shipping from the spread of the fire, it was resolved to scuttle and sink her in deep water. The vessel was accordingly cast off from her moorings with all promptitude and attached to a couple of steam-tugs, which proceeded with her down the river below the Folly-house, where the warping cables caught fire, and it then was found necessary to tow her aground on the north flats, near Greenwich Point, and leave her to her fate. In less than an hour from the first appearance of the fire, her hull, masts, and rigging were wrapped in sheets of flame, which threw up immense jets of sparks in continuous showers to the leeward, rendering any approach to her impossible. The heat was too intense, and the crashing and splitting of her timbers were audible at a considerable distance, and for miles up and down both shores of the river the blazing ship was clearly visible, the awful appearance of the fire being increased and an indescribable effect added to its terrors by a fall of snow, through which it loomed with a lurid glare, like that of a wintry sunset, and now and then flashing through the drift so brightly, that the light was reflected by the frozen service. It was said that the Great Britain was at one time in danger from her proximity to the Henry. Hundreds of spectators assembled all along the shores, despite the snow, the cold, and mud, and numberless boats rowed around the bark, as near as the heat would permit them. The scene was, altogether, singularly striking; the contrast between the dark hull, enveloped in wreaths of fire and smoke, and the smooth surface of the snow in the background, dotted over with the black figures of the eager crowd, who were struggling on knee-deep, to get a nearer view of the ship, producing a most extraordinary effect. At half-past four o'clock her foremast, which seemed like a smouldering pillar of fire, was alone left standing, the main and mizen having gone over the sides, a mass of embers, some time previously; and shortly afterwards her deck fell in, throwing up a vast fiery column into the air, which descended slowly, like the remains of innumerable rockets, sparkling and hissing through the snowy shower. Then her hold became visible, glowing with the intensity of a furnace, and spurting out sheets of flame through the ports. This unfortunate bark, which was chartered for her Majesty's service during the Chinese war, was the property of the Messrs. Fletcher, of Limehouse, and was considered a very superior sea-going vessel, having been built at Quebec of the best materials only four years ago. Had she been properly scuttled, a step which Captain Rowland, the harbour-master of Greenwich, suggested as soon as he arrived, she might have been saved, or, at least, a greater portion of her hull might have been made available to her owners; but, it is said, that the holes which were made for that purpose were not bored at a sufficient depth below the water, and that the sudden lightening of the ship, consequent upon the loss of her masts and spars, raised the hull so much that the scuttle-holes were brought clear above the surface, and, consequently, the only thing that could be done was, to tow her out of the course of the channel, and put her aground. The master, Mr. Finlayson, was not, it is said, on board at the time, but the crew exerted themselves to the utmost to avert the sad calamity. This fire, which has consumed property to the value of £10,000, is reported to have originated in the fore-hold, where a heap of shavings saturated with turpentine, which had leaked through from the vessels of some painters who were at work at the time, was set fire to by a boy, and in a moment spread into so fierce a flame as to defy every effort to overcome it. The bark, which was of more than 500 tons burden, was about proceeding with a cargo of coals to the depôt of the Oriental Steam Navigation Company at Aden. It is believed that she was uninsured. The hull of the ship continued to burn during the whole of the night, and it was not until the tide had risen on the following morning at an early hour, and gradually filled her, that the flames were in any way got under. On the tide receding, measures were promptly adopted by Capt. Rowland, the harbour master, and her unfortunate owner, to weigh that portion of the hull which had escaped destruction. Although she was completely destroyed to the water's edge, shipwrights were immediately set to work in stopping up the aperture made to scuttle her, which they effected with every success. On the return of the tide she floated. On undergoing a survey, the whole of her interior seems to have been consumed, and her sides down to within a few feet of the coppering, and, notwithstanding she must have been covered by the water for a short time, some beams at her bow were absolutely found on Tuesday afternoon, at four o'clock, to be still on fire. A careful inquiry has been instituted respecting the origin of the calamity, and, according to the latest information, it appears that some boys were engaged in cleansing one of the after between decks, when one of them accidentally dropped a lighted candle which he held in his hand amongst some shavings, pieces of tar, wood, old rope, &c., and those inflammable articles almost instantaneously igniting, fired as instantly the whole of the after part of the ship.

The keel, or remains, of this unfortuate ship, was safely weighed on Tuesday evening's tide, and during the night was towed round to the Union Dock, Limehouse, where she will be broke up, so as to preserve her new coppering. The wreck, as may be conceived, presents a most desolate appearance, the whole of her interior being consumed. The ill-fated vessel stood at Lloyd's, A 1, having only been built at Quebec, in 1840, and has wholly been engaged in the Indian trade.

THE LATE MURDER AT BETHNAL-GREEN.—James Tapping, who stood committed for the alleged wilful murder of Emma Whiter, by shooting her with a pistol, was formally brought up before Mr. Bingham, at WORSHIP-STREET, in order that the depositions, which had been previously in part taken, might be read over in his presence. On being placed in the dock, the prisoner made an effort to display the same reckless demeanour and apparent apathy he had exhibited from the commencement of the proceedings, but the frequent convulsive action of the muscles and other involuntary symptoms of internal agitation clearly manifested that his hardihood of manner was altogether assumed. The depositions, which were voluminous, having been read over by the chief clerk, and attested by the witnesses. Mr. Bingham told the prisoner that if he wished to offer anything in answer to the charge he was ready to hear it; but Mr. Vann answered in his behalf, that he had advised his client to reserve his defence until he was placed upon his trial.—On mounting the steps of the prison van the prisoner appeared to be overcome by emotion, and trembled violently; but almost instantly recovering his self-possession, he turned round, and with an air of reckless bravado raised his hat to the mob. The action was followed by a deafening shout, accompanied by a loud cry from some of his friends of "Hats off," which was complied with by a majority of those assembled.
either to justify the notion that his mental faculties are deranged.

A RUSSIAN FAMILY ATTACKED BY WOLVES.

FINE ARTS.

THE RUSSIAN MOTHER AND THE WOLVES.*

The Wolves! Oh, God! for a spark of soul
To gift that horse with sense,
To bid him speed in this dreadful need
This agony intense!
Away! away! like a lightning flash!
Fast as the drifting wind!
With the Angel-Spirit of Hope before,
And the Stride of Death behind!

Oh, dread! a horror is on my heart,
My blood runs thin and chill!
Have I a sin, so black within,
That bringeth me this ill?
Father above! oh, pour thy love
Down on this weary way,
And save my babes from a death of blood,
And bless them while I pray!

Away! Ha! ha! but the fearful fright,
Hath struck through the creature's veins;
Rushing along with an impulse strong—
No curb! no trace! no reins!
Go! fly! Oh God, that shuddering sound,
That worse than murderous growl!
My babes, you are prest to a mother's breast:
Despair! despair!—they howl!

They howl! they howl!—their withering cry
Strikes all my heart with cold!
On! on like the fires that sweep the sky;—
Oh, agony untold!

Bless them, and guard them, God above!
Away from these mad wild things;
And hallow a desperate mother's love,
And give to her danger WINGS!

* This appalling scene, is copied from a large mezzotint, by Jazet, from a celebrated picture by Schopin. The scene represents one of the vast snow-clad steppes of Russia, and its gloomy vegetation, also capped with snow The group in the foreground is truly terrific: a band of wolves, "roused by wintry famine," are about to seize upon the affrighted travellers; they are the Vekvoturian, or mountain wolves, of the black variety: the terror of the family in the sledge, and the action of the horse, are powerfully depicted. In the distance, is seen another band of wolves, attacking a wild horse of the steppe.

OF THE BARQUE "HENRY," OFF BLACKWALL.—(See preceding page.

DESTRUCTION OF THE PORTLAND VASE.

"Or bid mortality rejoice or mourn,
O'er the fine forms of Portland's mystic urn."
DARWIN.

In our late impression of last week, we gave an account of the destruction of this invaluable specimen of Grecian art, by a miscreant visitor at the British Museum. The details of the wanton act will be found elsewhere recorded in our present journal; and now that the precious gem of art is irreparably destroyed, it will be interesting to the reader to see its beauty picturesquely commemorated in our pages.

BOTTOM OF THE VASE.

This exquisite production was originally known as "the Barberini Vase," from its having been, for more than two centuries, the principal ornament of the palace of the Barberini family. It was purchased of Sir William Hamilton by the Duchess of Portland, since which it has been known as "the Portland Vase." It formed the gem of the Portland Museum, which was sold by auction, in separate lots, by Messrs. Skinner and Co., on Monday, April 24, 1786, at Privy Gardens, Whitehall; and, in a preserved copy of the catalogue, we find the following note, made at the time of the sale:—

"The most celebrated antique vase, or sepulchral urn from the Barberini Cabinet at Rome. It is the identical urn which contained the ashes of the Roman Emperor Alexander Severus, and his mother, Mammæ; which was deposited in the earth about the year 235 after Christ. It was dug up by order of Pope Barberini, named Urban VIII., between the years 1623 and 1644. The materials of which it is composed imitate an onyx was found lying. We have engraved this plate below, and appended the references.

A, The Monte del Grano, beneath which was the sepulchre.
B, Tomb of Alexander Severus and of Julia Mammæ.
C, The ancient entrance to the tomb.
D, An aperture in the mass of the work of the vault, by which an entrance was obtained into the sepulchral chamber where the marble sarcophagus was found.
E, The coffin, or sarcophagus.
F, An entrance to a small chamber, with no other outlet.

HANDLE OF THE VASE.

G, The arch of the chamber, at the level of the ground, broken in order to take out the sarcophagus, which was lowered by cranes, and drawn through the ancient entrance
H, Dotted lines, showing the plan of the upper chamber.
I, A modern Casino, on the summit of the mount.

Probably few relics of antiquity have excited greater interest than this celebrated vase. There are various opinions as to its production. Mr. Wedgwood considered the figures to have been made by cutting away the external crust of white opaque glass, in the manner of producing the finest cameos, and that it must have been the labour of many years.

There have been likewise many conjectures as to the figures on the vase; among which the speculations by Dr. King and Dr. Darwin are not the least striking. The latter occupy seven quarto pages of notes to the poem of the "Botanic Garden," illustrated with four plates, the actual size of the vase and figures. We must, however, pass by this lengthy disquisition the ground a rich transparent dark amethystine colour, and the snowy figures that adorn it are in bas relief, of a workmanship above all enconium, and such as cannot but excite in us the highest idea of the arts of the ancients. Its dimensions are 9¾ inches high, and 21½ inches in circumference. A more particular account of it may be found in 'Montfaucon's Antiquities,' Vol. 5, B. 2, Chap. 6; in 'Bartolli delli Sepolchri Antichi;' in 'Brenal's and Misson's Travels;' and in 'Winckelman on the Arts of the Ancients.'"

At this sale the Vase was purchased by the Duke of Portland, for the sum of 1029 guineas, and was deposited by his Grace in the British Museum in the year 1810. It adorned the centre of the anteroom (No. 9) at the head of the stairs leading from the gallery of antiquities: it was placed upon an octagonal table, beneath a glass case.

The first information we have respecting this vase is, that it was found, about the middle of the 16th century, inclosed in a marble sarcophagus, within a sepulchral chamber, under the mount called the Monte del Grano, about two miles and a half from Rome, on the road leading to Frascati. This sepulchral chamber appears to have been the tomb of the Emperor Alexander Severus, and of his mother Julia Mammæ; and the vase was, probably, a cinerary urn belonging to the sepulchre. Bartoli, in his work on Roman and Etruscan sepulchres ("Gli Antichi Sepolcri," 1704), has given a sectional representation of the Monte del Grano, with the hollow sepulchre within, and the spot in which the sarcophagus or the following brief description by a correspondent of the Morning Chronicle:—

"There are three scenes, one on either side of the vase, and one at the bottom. The first represents three exquisite figures seated on loose piles of stone under a tree near a ruined column, the capitol of which lies, among other disjointed stones, at their feet. The centre figure is a female reclining, apparantly greatly exhausted, or dying. She is supported by her left elbow, and in her left hand she holds an inverted torch, while her right hand is thrown over her drooping head. On her right hand is the figure of a man, and on her left the figure of a woman; both have their backs towards the reclining figure, and their faces are turned to her. They are both, apparently, in deep thought, and are resting on their arms. The other scene represents a figure passing through a portal with great timidity, and going down into a darker region, where a beautiful female is waiting with outstretched hand to receive him. She is seated with her feet towards an aged figure, who is resting his chin on his hand, and who has one foot raised on a column and the other apparently sunk into the earth. Between the knees of the female is a large and playful serpent. Preceding the first figure, and above the female, is a cupid, who is beckoning him to advance. The first figure appears exceedingly anxious to take with him a cloak or garment, which he is holding, and which adheres to the side of the portal through which he has just passed. In this scene there are two trees, one of which bends over the female figure, and the other over the aged one. The scene on the bottom of the vase represents another figure, either male or female, in a curious and cumbersome dress, with itsfinger pointing to its mouth, and on its head there is a Phrygian cap. Above this figure is the foliage of a tree. This figure is on a larger scale than the others, but not so well finished or so elevated. Aged heads with ugly ears, like those of quadrupeds or satyrs, are represented on the handles.

"In all probability, these scenes represent the progress of initiation into the Eleusinian mysteries, and the vase was very likely originally used to hold the holy water for the lustration of the candidate for the office of priestess, whose initiation is thus described in Universal History, vol. 6, p. 3: 'A certain number of young women were brought up at the expense of the republic with all possible care, in order to be employed in the ceremonies to be performed at Eleusis. They were kept confined in the Thesmophorion, a public building in Athens, watched by persons set over them to guard their virtue. After this they went in procession to Eleusis, and there passed a whole day at the feet of the statue of Ceres, in fasting and prayer.'

"Now, in the first described scene, the centre figure appears greatly exhausted by watching, and the inverted torch which she holds in her hand, the flame of which is just expiring, is a symbol of the exhausted state of nature. The other two figures are apparently her guards, the female figure holding a rod or sceptre as an ensign of authority. The second scene represents the priestess fully initiated into the sacred mysteries, which is denoted by the serpent, the ancient symbol of wisdom and immortality, seated at the entrance of the temple, accompanied by the hierophant. She is leading a candidate forward to initiation, who is tightly holding a portion of his robe, which probably represents his lingering attachment to humanity. The figure at the bottom represents the priestess in her full robes of office, with her finger to her mouth, being the attitude of silence, denoting that she is enjoining the candidate to keep unbroken the mysteries into which he is about to be initiated."

We have engraved the Vase entire; one of the heads from whence spring a handle; and the bottom; together with the bas-reliefs around the entire Vase.

We learn from the Penny Cyclopædia, that a mould of the Vase was made by Pechler, the gem engraver, while it was in the possession of the Barberini family; and, from this mould, a certain number of casts were taken by Mr. Tassie, who afterwards destroyed the mould. Mr. Wedgwood made a small number of copies of the Vase, which were sold at about 25 guineas each, and which were distinguished for the admirable skill displayed in their production. The moulds employed for these copies are, we believe, still in existence.

NEW MUSIC.

THE MULBERRY TREE. Song. Written by S. W. PARTRIDGE, Esq. Composed by HENRY LAHEE. Leader and Cock.

There is considerable and original merit in this song, and sung even to tolerably well it must prove effective. We have no objection to the harmonies, but, to the eye at least, the notation would be better if the frequently occurring D sharp and A sharp were written E flat and B flat. The chords in which they occur are diminished sevenths.

"OH! MOTHER, HEAR THY POOR BLIND CHILD." Song. Written by HARCOURT RUSSELL, Esq. Composed by F. ROMER. Leader and Cock.

A very clever composition in the canzonet style. Here and there, however, there are some careless harmonies, as at bar 3, page 5, and between bars 2 and 3, stave 4, on the same page.

NATURE'S GENTLEMAN. Song. Written by Miss ELIZA COOK. Composed by HENRY RUSSELL. Leader and Cock.

Neither very original, nor very elegant; the six-eight canter spoils the words, which should have been set to common time.

THE DREAM OF THE REVELLER; OR, THE THREE HOUSES. A Descriptive Cantata. The words by CHARLES MACKAY, Esq. The music by HENRY RUSSELL. Leader and Cock.

Very well imagined both by author and composer. A little more of German severity, however, would not have been amiss—the picture is an awful one, and should not be too lightly coloured. The levity of the abandoned is too happy—there is not enough of reckless despair in its character.

No. 1. SWEET MAIDEN. Canzonet. Composed by GEORGE J. O. ALLMAN.—No. 2. I SAW THEE WEEP. Canzonet. The Poetry by Lord BYRON; composed by G. J. O. ALLMAN.—Treagar and Co., Cheapside.

To the first of these Canzonets is prefixed a symphony of two pages length, reminding us of the introductory tutte of a grand concerto; after which a "ridiculus mus" appears, in the shape of a poor and ill-managed melody. The accompaniments at page 6 break the musical Priscian's head most unmercifully.

No. 2 is a very flowing and graceful melody, if its rhythm were not distorted in bars 6, 7, and 8, of page 2, and bars 7 and 8 (which should have been incorporated) of page 3. Nothing can be more offensive than errors against musical prosody.

CHAMBER TRIO, for Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello, by W. STERNDALE BENNETT. Coventry and Hollier.

This is a most delicious composition, full of fancy and learning, feeling, and exquisite taste. We know not which of the movements we like best. Perhaps the first is the most elegant, but the following portions are not without their claims to a rivalry. The serenade is an exquisite morceau; the finale is the portion we like the least; there is more pretension and less effect than in any other portion of the trio, but take it altogether it is an honour to the musical taste, learning, and genius of old England.

THE AMARANTHE WALZER (Why not Waltzes?) By H. CRAVEN GRIFFITHS, R.S.M.

These waltzes exhibit no novelty that can be approved of. Every little girl in the world that, by ear, knows the difference between tonic and dominant harmonies could write a thousand of them. In fact, they are female compositions. The affixes of R.S.M. to the composer's name, we confess ourselves at a loss to understand.

"THE FAIRY'S WELL." Song. Written by HENRY LOVELL. Composed by N. J. SPORLE.

This song, it is stated, is founded on the old proverb "It is better to let well alone." For the life of us we cannot see any connection between its words and the proverb, but in the music a reminiscence of "Nix my Dolly" convinces us that "it would have been better to let well alone!"

REMEMBRANCE. Ballad. Written by C. CHAMBERS EAMES, Esq. The Music by LOUISE BENDIXEN.—Ollivier.

A beautiful melody, most artistically harmonised—wanting only a fitting opportunity of being heard to be admired on all hands. The theme is graceful and its treatment unexceptionable—indeed, in some passages highly creditable to the contrapuntal knowledge of the fair composer.

SPIRIT OF AIR. Cavatina. Written by W. H. BELLAMY. Composed by GEORGE LINLEY.—Leader and Cock.

"Graceful and flowing and free." Perhaps the three-eighth movement in D is too much like the ordinary crescendo of an Italian Overture, but altogether it is a pleasant composition, although, perhaps, it may be said there is some slight discrepancy between the rhythms of the words and music.

CHAMBER TRIOS. No. 7. AWAY TO THE WEST. Composed by CHARLES E. HORN. Leader and Cock.

It is with pleasure we hail the appearance of any new composition by Horn. There is always a quaintness and originality about his conceptions which are delightful. We should like to see a Grand Opera by him. The present Trio is fanciful in the extreme, and, with delicate treatment, must produce a beautiful, fairy-like effect. Professional vocalists will read its beauties at sight, and we recommend it as a charming study to all Amateurs.

LAZY MOON, LAZY MOON! Duet. Written by W. H. BELLAMY; Composed by CHARLES E. HORN. Leader and Cock.

An elegant and imaginative composition—full of fancy and feeling. The passage commencing with "There's a violet bank" is very sweet, and the whole brilliantly worked up to the end.

THE MUSICAL BOUQUET. Composed and adapted to M. Coulon's figures and dance by F. LANCELOTT.

The only amusing part of this publication is the title-page, on which the following enumeration of the names of great composers, winds up with rather a touch of the bathos:—Bellini, Donizetti, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Rossini—JULLIEN! Finis coronat!

We have received a vast number of other Polkas, but really are weary of noticing them. Their common-place monotony must be fatiguing to every one whose musical ears are not in their heels.

LA SYLPHIDE, Polka, (original?). Composed by T. BROWNE. Leader and Cock.

There is no great originality of feature in this music. If it be true that Orpheus once fiddled to the Brutes, we are quite sure that the figure which they danced was the Polka. We cannot exactly say what his music consisted of, but if it were not better than the alternate tonic-dominant, two-tr ur, jog-trot, modern Polka, it must have been sorry stuff indeed.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—Mr. Lumley having refused his permission to allow Signor Costa to conduct the approaching series, we learn that the directors of this national (?) institution have determined upon sending to the Continent for a gentleman to wield the baton. Oh! Sir Henry Bishop, Sir George Smart, Messrs. Cooke, Bennet, and fifty others, the old saying is true, that "no one is a prophet in his own country."

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

Ex nihilo nihil fit may be all very well to quote as a bit of classicality, but, if we are not entitled to doubt its mathematical veracity, what is to account for the play of "Much Ado about Nothing?" The fact is, that instead of nothing being made out of nothing, there is so much made out of it every day, that we might begin to fancy that nothing was at the bottom of everything, only that a few substantial and palpable matters rise up before us with a reality and identity which convince us that they are not sprung ex nihilo.

For all this, since the opening of the Session, that same vague old gentleman, Nothing—whom the schoolmaster defined as "a footless stocking without a leg"—has had as large a share of the public business in the English Parliament as any of the realities of gain or grievance that are gathered around us; and the discussions in St. Stephen's, up to this present writing, have been about as dull, desultory, profitless, and uncertain, as the most unnerved system could desire. Galvanic rings have been extensively worn out of doors, but there has been nothing approaching to a shock in the Legislature, where excitement, usually so prevalent—at least with an Opposition—seems to have fled from the benches, and vacated his seat in favour of the Gallic bore, ennui.

We take the solution of this still-water riddle to be either that it is the calm of the session preceding the storm, or that the country has been waiting the Minister's financial statement, John Bull never caring to busy himself much about anything else until he has ascertained exactly what they are going to do with his money. And this is very plausible and very prudent of John Bull; only that, in the meanwhile, as we said before, the nation is dreadfully hard up for excitement.

While the debates have been remaining in this eminent state of stagnation (one slice of bankrupty and a chop of divorce from Brougham—one suggestive lecture on taxation and revenue from Monteagle—and two or three spurts of conversation from M.P.'s who do not yet appear to have definitely settled what they are going to do), Mr. Wakley has proved himself the merriest and the wisest of the national conclave, by the raillery lavished upon barristers entrusted with the lines of rail. He gave these long-robe boys a decided wig-ging for speaking not so much against Time as to Eternity!. He seemed to think the railroad from London to York would not be half as long as one of the speeches opposed to it—and although we believe he has opposed the new prison discipline, as regards criminals, yet, in reference to barristers, he evidently—and small blame to him—longs for the establishment of a more silent system than the one at present adopted. Good faith, if the truth were told, there is too much law everywhere, and that very seldom of the best.

Part of the railway discussion, however, has been of a good wholesome character—that, we mean, which scouted the impropriety of any member of the Board of Trade Committee, being a proprietor of railway shares. Ploughshares as many as you please—but railway shares—no—they would be infra dig property—more infra dig than ploughshares. It is quite a fact that the Stock Exchange gambling on the Gazette days—when the new reports are issued, and some Solons profess to have had information in advance, has been frightful—and it must be confessed that some individuals have made enormous sums of money by never being in the wrong! The debate has had, we hope, the good effect of checking this, and putting anonymous information hors du combat.

Talking of the quantity of bad laws (adverted to a paragraph above), what a pleasant heap of it is occasionally to be found in Crown offices. The silk gown of the Solicitor-General, we should imagine, must have been considerably ruffled in the Smith distillery case. Eh! Mr. Thesiger! your suaviter in modo must have been a little disarranged. What! your first great official case? Three hundred thousand pounds the prize in jeopardy to the Crown, and the trial thrown overboard just as you were getting in medias res! A bad rule—an insufficient rule—a rule that was no rule! So, then, you went into your law-excise office, did you, and took out the wrong permit, and the trial has consequently not gone off with the spirit that was expected? Fie! Solicitor-General, fie! But we beg your pardon. The Court exonerated you; Mr. Kelly, whose forbearance was rather generous, did not accuse you; and society is left to its conviction that whenever there is an atrocious blunder committed Nobody is to blame. Poor Nobody! he is worse than Nothing!

What is Sir Peter Laurie about that he does not put down suicide by drowning in the Parks? What an-ice man he would be if he only accomplished this. The weather may be very cold, but if not cold enough for the water to bear up the human body—under it skates and infirmities, people ought not to be allowed to go skating, weather or no! Besides, the feelings of society are shocked. It is pleasant enough to read the "Arabian Nights" at home, but it makes one nervous to see a lad in—in St. James's Park. Nor can the round-about-way of parting with existence—the Serpentine mode of destruction resorted to in the park of Hyde, be a whit more pleasant to a delicate sensibility. And after all, a little common sense and ability would settle the whole business. Your humane societies are mighty virtuous institutions, and there is, perhaps, still more virtue in their ladders and their ropes—but we have heard that the surest way of not requiring the stomach-pump is not to take the poison—and that prevention is better than cure. Why are people allowed to go on the ice, while there is any possibility of their going in? A positive injunction from the proper authority, the disobedience of which should be made as much a civil offence as breaking the shrubs, or injuring the Queen's ducks—with a handful of policemen to enforce the regulation—would save more human lives than all the humane societies in Park-dom! Now, if Sir Peter the philantrophist would have this seen to—he might earn a whole collar of medals, and wear skates on his buttons for the remainder of his days. But if he does not attend to the matter, it is time that society did, for these park duckings and drownings are disgusting satires upon the folly, recklessness, and obstinacy of mankind. However, we hope the ice may soon return to water, and the weather merge into mildness for the sake of the poor.

The Ministerial elections have gone off well, and Buckingham has returned Sir Thomas Fremantle, as of yore. It is, however, said that Moses and Son intend to petition against his return, upon the ground of injury inflicted upon their fraternity of Buckingham, inasmuch as no tailor will be able to make any profit if every voter has his mantle free!

> Trelawney in Cornwall gave way to Carew,

We find that Carus Wilson is to be brought up to London, in obedience to the rule of the Court of Queen's Bench, and that the magnates of Jersey are so far brought to their senses, touching the influence and supremacy of our Lady Victoria and her Chief Justice at Westminster. We know nothing about the merits of Mr. Wilson's imprisonment, which we believe was for contempt, and seems to have been of very cruel duration, but we do know something of Mr. Wilson himself. Once he was the giant of Fleet-street, Chancery-lane, and Lincoln's Inn; and so tall as to have been as much looked up to as any gentleman in London. A friend of ours at whose house he was accustomed to visit, had one evening his household considerably disturbed. There was a loud double knock at his door, which, however, still remained closed, and the knock was repeated. He rang his bell, and a new servant, who had only arrived that day, answered it, and was desired to open the street door. Going into the hall for that purpose, she uttered a shriek, and rushed back into the diniug room. What was the matter? "Oh, Lord, Sir," cried the half-fainting domestic, "there are thieves at the door, Sir, and they're trying to break in—they've got a ladder, Sir, and one of them's looking over the fanlight." The gentleman went out himself to open the portal of his domicile, and his servant uttered another shriek when she saw Carus Wilson standing quietly upon the step, and stooping his head at least a foot before he could pass under it. "Oh, Lord, Misses," she added, as the gentleman shook hands with the monster, "I'm blest if master isn't bringing in a giant!" We have not heard whether the galor of Jersey was obliged to raise his roof.

THE WEATHER IN MANCHESTER.—Shortly after noon on Sunday, snow began to fall at Manchester, and continued during the afternoon and evening, with the wind strong from the southward. The railway trains were not considerably beyond their time, with the exception of the Birmingham trains. The mail train on Sunday evening, due at a quarter past six o'clock, did not reach till a few minutes after seven. The Burnley (coach) mail, on Sunday, was also about half an hour late, owing to the snow. On Monday morning the snow was six or seven inches deep; and, during the day, some more snow fell, and the frost continued, with a south-east wind. On Tuesday morning the frost was not so severe, and in the afternoon there were some indications of a thaw, but in the evening the frost became more confirmed. In Liverpool and the neighbourhood there was a heavy fall of snow on Sunday, with a southerly wind, and the ground was covered to a depth of six or eight inches on an average; and where it drifted it was knee-deep. The railway arrivals there were regular and to time, with the exception of the Birmingham trains, one in the afternoon being half an hour, and another in the evening nearly an hour beyond time.

'TIS JUST THE HOUR!—BALLAD.

Oh! come, oh! come—'tis just the hour—
The dews 'gin to weep,
And the birds are asleep—
And the stars in the skies
Have but half open'd eyes—
They cannot see us in our bow'r!
Oh! come, oh! come—'tis just the hour!

Oh! come, oh! come—'tis just the hour—
The whispers of Love
In the dark of the grove,
Are sweetest and best,
As the bird has confest
That woos the Queen-Rose in her bow'r!
Oh! come, oh! come—'tis just the hour!

Oh! come—oh! come—'tis just the hour,—
The lone Waterfall
In the valley, is all
That far off awakes—
And a sweet murmur makes
As it sprinkles the heath with its show'r!
Oh! come—oh! come—'tis just the hour!—

Oh! come—oh! come—'tis just the hour
For lovers to tell
All the secrets that dwell
In the depths of their souls,
While the Moon fondly strolls
In search of Endymion's bow'r!
Oh! come Love! 'tis just the hour!

OBSERVATIONS ON THE WEATHER.

On the evening of the 11th day, I was prepared to expect an intense cold, by the circumstance of a temperature at 7 P.M. being at 21 deg., and at 11 P.M. being 15 deg., with clear sky, and the temperature continued to decline till half-past 7 o'clock in the morning of the 12th (Wednesday), when the thermometer read 1½ deg. below zero, or 33½ below the point of freezing water, a degree of temperature of the air protected from radiation less than any I have ever before seen. Immediately afterwards, I found my dry bulb thermometer to read zero, and my wet bulb to read 1 deg. below zero: the reading of the minimum thermometer was at zero, and so was also the reading of the maximum thermometer; another thermometer whose scale only calculates to 1 deg. could not be read, the mercury being all in the bulb, so that most certainly the temperature of air at this time was at a point 32 deg. below the freezing point of water; the reading of a thermometer on snow was 12 deg. below zero; that of one placed on flax, cleared of snow, was 12½ deg. below zero; that of one on long grass, cleared of snow, was 6 deg. below zero; that of one on long grass, under snow, was 26 deg.; so that the effect of the snow was to keep the grass warm by 32 deg.; the reading of one on the surface of ground, under long grass covered by snow, was 28 deg. These readings are lower than any that have ever been seen in this country from natural causes, as far as I know; they are certainly lower than I have ever before seen them; the instances which seem to approach those low readings are 1838, January 20. On this day I saw the thermometer at zero; the previous instance occurred on February 9, 1796, but the evidence of this is not very good, as the effects of radiation, which was then scarcely acknowledged, were not taken into account. The phenomenon, it appears, may be expected to take place about once in twenty years in this climate. During the day I took the following observations:—At 8h. A.M. the reading was still at zero; at 8h. 10m. it read 4 deg.; at 9h. 10m. it read 4 deg.; at 9h. 50m. it was 9 deg.; at 11h. 0m. it was 10 deg.; and at noon it was 21 deg. This rise of 11 deg. of temperature took place in one hour. At 1h. P.M. it was 25 deg.; at 4h. it was 29 deg., being the highest point attained. The temperature then began to decline, and at 6h. 15m. P.M. the temperature passed 20 deg.; and at 7h. it was 18 deg., with a clear sky, but a thick atmosphere. Some clouds then collected, and at 9h. it had decreased to 19 deg; at 10h. it was 20 deg., and it continued to increase throughout the night, and the temperature now (half-past seven o'clock on Thursday morning), is 25 deg. The following observations I took during the day, which will be best told in a tabular form, and the headings of each column will explain itself. In reading it, the sign — before the 8 deg. 5 min., implies that the temperature was 8½ deg. below zero, or 40½ deg. below the point of freezing. By subtracting the numbers in the first column from those in the second column, the effects of the snow for keeping the grass warm are shown: thus, at Feb. 12, 7h., 9 deg. from 33 deg. show that 24 deg. was the effect of the snow on the grass.

At noon the temperature was 21 deg., and it was pleasant by contrast to the feeling; even when the air was at zero, it did not feel so very cold. There was no motion in the air, and the air was very dry, both circumstances tending to prevent that sudden abstracting of heat which is felt in windy weather, and the air with much moisture in it. The barometer during the previous day had been rising rapidly, and during the 12th day it varied from 30in. 2 to 30in. 3.

RETURN OF SEVERE WEATHER.

The cold weather has returned with great severity. During Sunday night the thermometer was down to 29 degrees, showing three degrees of frost, and about four o'clock on Monday morning it snowed for about an hour. At six o'clock A.M. the mercury had risen to 31 degrees, with a dense cloudy sky, and the wind south-east; and at nine o'clock it again commenced snowing, and continued throughout the day, the mercury at part of it being higher than 32 degrees (freezing point). The snow storm which commenced on Sunday evening did not terminate until between three and four o'clock on Tuesday morning. Travelling by stage coaches and other land conveyance is, in consequence, much impeded.

At a distance from town the fall of snow has been more copious. The Guildford coach was unable to reach town on Monday, being detained by an accumulated snow-drift about three miles on the London-road. The road to Dorking was almost impassable, and Mr. Broad, the proprietor of the only remaining four horse coach on that road, was compelled to stop for some time at Leatherhead, on Tuesday morning, until a passage was cleared, under the apprehension that he would not be able to continue his journey.

On Monday the accumulation of snow was so great on the South-Western Railway, that the luggage train from Southampton did not arrive in town until next day. On Tuesday morning the mail train, by the same conveyance, did not reach the Vauxhall terminus until half-past eleven, having the Southampton, Portsmouth, and Yeovil mails. The delay took place from the Andover-road to the Woking station, and for some distance the speed of the train did not exceed four miles an hour. There was no delay of importance in the arrival of any of the other railway trains.

The snow appears to have fallen most thickly in the counties of Essex and Suffolk, and on the southern side of the metropolis. During Tuesday night the frost was severe; the barometer slowly rising.

The weather on Wednesday was intensely cold, the wind blowing keenly from the east. During the night, the frost was most severe, and at break of day the streets of the metropolis had the appearance of sheets of ice, the pavement being extremely slippery. The snow which fell during the first two days of the week lies in some places four feet deep. This is the case on the Lammas lands at Fulham, which at high tides are usually under water. At the Receiving-house on Wednesday forenoon, the mercury, at 10 o'clock, was as low as 14 degrees—the lowest point it has reached this winter.

The fineness of the day caused the parks to be thronged, and thousands disported themselves upon the ice. In the Regent's Park the ice was in excellent condition. The number of persons who ventured on was upwards of 4,000. Several duckings took place in the course of the day, but none of any moment.

In St. James's Park the ice was very unsafe. This is always the case in this park; but, despite of this, there was a good number of skaters. The ice broke several times, and although many were immersed nothing serious occurred.

Upon the Serpentine the ice was in a bad state, but in the middle of the day the skaters were very numerous. No accidents occurred. In Kensington-gardens the number of skaters during the day was upwards of 1000. The members of the Skating Club were there. Several of them went knee deep into the water, but were speedily got out.

Some parts of the river Thames are covered with masses of floating ice. Towards low water, on Thursday, the masses had accumulated to such an extent as to cause great interruption to the navigation, particularly in the Pool. It is somewhat remarkable that the great frost of 1814, on which occasion the Thames was frozen over and a fair held thereon, commenced on the 8th of February, (the day when this severe weather commenced) and continued for six weeks. On Thursday about noon-day there was a heavy fall of snow, but in the course of the afternoon it rained, and at night although it was bitterly cold, there was a thaw.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"You see this business with a sense as cold
As is a dead man's nose."—Winter's Tale.

Such too, shall be this, our discourse—a winter's tale; to the narrative whereof we sit us down with a proboscis as frigid as the summit of the Jura. Adopting, however, the spirit of our thesis morally—apropos of the gelid, we address our consideration to the philosophy, which, so far from regarding sport cordially, sees it with a perception "a little less than kind." Sorrows—which means the whole family of the dismals—we are told, never make their appearance single-handed, but like an invading army. Thus—while that stupendous question, "To be, or not to be," is hanging over the whole genera which fine gentlemen have designated game—every hour brings an argument to bear upon it. The organs of combativeness everywhere sound the charge to the souls and bodies of the poachers. And who shall wonder at it? "Give them a punch on the head," says Mr. Grantley Berkeley. "Give them letters of marque against the pheasants," cries Mr. Bright; "and are they not heirs by Nature to the hares?" These are the maxims which bring the onslaught on the keepers. Giles Scroggins has the instinct of woodcraft under his prize jerkin, burning as fiercely as ever it raged beneath the corslet of belted knight. Also hath he, in like manner, a taste for glory, and the flavour of a Michaelmas "bird," so that with the prospect—nay, certainty, of a fight or a pheasant before his eyes, what wonder, as the poet says, that he "affects the shade." Woe, woe, to the watcher or the rooster that falls in his way. Listen to his war-song at what time the earth puts on her sables, he issues from his peculiar Tom and Jerry, chanting—

Here's a hand for them that love me,
And a fist for them that hate;
And whatever fowl 's above me,
Here's a blaze—at any rate.

In the papers of the day, as the phrase goes, there was, during the week, a paragraph to the intent that Sir John Cope's hounds recently drew blank (their ordinary luck, indeed, in Dian's lottery) all the covers belonging to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and that the keepers stated they had been put to death at the instance of their Royal master. Of course, it was not true, but the report was not the less mischievous on that account. We all know how Peter Pindar's ostler applied his confessor's hint about the efficacy of pomatum in the matter of horse's teeth. So many a burly son of the Ball, who whilom would as soon have thought of shooting a fox as shaking hands with a Frenchman, will very likely take a slap at Charley, and follow shoot with the Queen's husband. But the heaviest blow of all levelled against the ferœ naturæ is that their cause has been espoused by the lawyers. A dreadful letter all over Coke upon Littleton saw the light a day or two since, wherein the writer showed that the moment you abolish the right of property in partridges, there's an end to the principle in reference to the great sources of our national revenue, and that no man will be entitled to call a drop of running water his own! That, legally, he shall never from that hour slake his thirst—save at "pond or lake." What a pity the discovery was not made sooner—will not Mr. Berkeley publish a second edition of his pamphlet, with this great fact for its climax?..... Seriously, if the question as to the policy of upholding the present system of Game Laws is to be anticipated, why is it not taken up in a manly spirit, and on honest grounds? No Englishman will be influenced in his opinion about them by the sophisms of the special pleader, or the platitudes of the pamphleteer. The rural sports of this country are the offspring of the national character. They are better protected by convention than they can be by any code devised by Lords or Commons. They belong essentially to the class of liberal pleasures—let their pursuit be liberal also. Scout the bastard battue from their list: let sporting restrictions be regarded as bonds of peace, made for every man's protection, and not as Pennsylvanian bonds, for no man's security. Away with your subtleties of black letter: do not the champions of our popular pastimes know that they merit their advocacy because they are the frank, free, boon resources of wholesome enjoyment? or do they, indeed,

"See this business with a sense as cold
As is a dead man's nose"?

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The layers and backers were alike "passive," and the market, in consequence, exhibited little in the way of change, either in Chester Cup or Derby. All that we have to point out is a slight upward movement in the Era, St. Lawrence, and Pride of Kildare, and trifling decline in Obscurity, Celeste and Cataract. The Derby nags remain as before, with the exception of Kedger, Newsmonger, Mentor, and the Miss Whip colt. The Iron Master's qualification remains in abeyance.

THURSDAY.—Business continues very languid at the Corner; indeed, with two or three exceptions, it would really appear that both layers and backers have determined to stay proceedings until the nags get off their straw beds. At present Semiseria, The Era, Celeste, Zanoni, St. Lawrence, Strathspey, and Extempore, are all that remain in force for the Cup; and Alarm, Cobweb colt, Newsmonger, and the Miss Whip colt, for the Derby. Our price current, therefore, will be brief:—

FOOT RACE AT SLOUGH.—The long-pending foot-race for a sweepstakes of £50 each, distance one mile, between Jackson (the American Deer), Maxfield (the North Star), and Davies (the Welsh Chicken), came off on Tuesday afternoon at Slough. The road, which had been previously considerably blocked up by the heavy fall of snow of the night before, was cleared the whole distance by several men. The sweepstakes were won by Maxfield beating Davies by between 15 and 20 yards, and Jackson by upwards of 50 yards. It will be recollected that, a short time since, Jackson beat Maxfield in a three-mile race, without any apparent effort. Jackson also beat the celebrated Sheppard in an hour's match not long ago, performing in that time upwards of eleven miles. The mile on Tuesday was run by the winner in 4 minutes and 49 seconds. Considerable sums of money changed hands.

THE IRON TRADE.—The make of iron in the United Kingdom at the present time is near 1,400,000 tons annually. Scotland furnishes almost one-third part of the supply—being 450,000 tons annually, or at the rate of 9000 tons per week. But in the course of two months there will be nine new furnaces put in operation in the neighbourhood of Glasgow alone, and their combined yield may be calculated at 1350 tons weekly, or 70,000 tons per annum. Three new iron works have also been arranged for, which may be completed, and have twelve furnaces—the number contemplated—going within twelve months. They will give a yield, if at all successful, of 1800 tons weekly, or 93,000 tons by the year.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A LADY.—Mr. Higgs held an inquest on Tuesday evening at the King's Head, Crown-street, Oxford-street, on the body of Mrs. Elizabeth Harvey, aged 50, the wife of Mr. Peter Harvey, currier, of Oxford street. Joseph Hillier, assistant to Mr. Day, draper, High-street, Stepney, stated that on Friday evening, at about seven o'clock, deceased staggered into Mr. Day's shop, and said she thought she was going to have a fit, and asked him to send to Mr. Newington's, in White Horse-terrace, whither she was proceeding. Witness did so, but before any one arrived deceased had become senseless. Medical aid was procured, and deceased was removed to a private room and bled. She became apparently worse, and, by the surgeon's advice, she was placed in a cab, and conveyed to her own residence. Mr. Charles Simpson, surgeon, Cambridge street, Golden-square, stated he had attended deceased professionally. She was subject to apoplectic fits. Witness had advised that she should never go out alone. When witness was called in on Friday deceased was dead. She had been brought home in an open cab, and witness was of opinion that she ought to have been taken to the nearest hospital, where proper treatment would have been administered. Mr. Jacob Mason, of Torrington-square, said he was at Mr. Harvey's when the cab containing the deceased arrived. She was not dead then, but expired a few minutes afterwards. The verdict was—"Died from apoplexy."

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SUDDEN DEATHS.—Mr. Higgs held an inquest on Monday at the Green Man, Berwick-street, Oxford-street, on the body of Mr. Francis Walsh, aged thirty-three. From the evidence it appeared that the deceased was related to Captain Pidding, and carried on the business of a tea dealer at the premises of his brother, Mr. W. S. Walsh, who is a wine and spirit merchant in Berwick-street. On Friday evening deceased was left dozing by the counting-house fire, and was found dead in his chair the next morning. Verdict, "Died from apoplexy."——On Tuesday Mr. G. J. Mills held the following inquests on persons who had died suddenly:—At the Plasterer's Arms, Little Marylebone-street, Portland-place, on the body of Henry Burgess, aged sixty eight, formerly a coach master. Deceased had been unable to work for twenty-one years in consequence of rheumatism in the lower extremities, and on Monday morning last, between six and seven, his wife found him dead in bed. He went to bed the evening previously in his usual health. At the Half Moon, Clipstone-street, Fitzroy-square, on the body of Eliza Castle, aged fifty-six, of No. 98, Norton-street. She was out and well on Friday forenoon, but on her return home in the afternoon, she fell down in her room in a fit, and died three hours afterwards. At the Perseverance, William-street, Hampstead-road, on the body of Edith Sortwell, aged thirty-six, wife of a blacksmith, living in Mary-mews, close by. Deceased was out and, apparently in good health on Friday morning. In the course of the day she was seized with sudden illness, which terminated fatally in a very short time. The fourth inquest was held at the Devonshire Arms, Duke-street, Manchester-square, on the body of a female servant in the employ of Miss Duffell, residing in the above street. Deceased on Sunday went to repose on her bed, and not coming to the kitchen in time to prepare dinner search was made for her, and she was found dead in bed.—On Wednesday evening, Mr. Higgs Coroner for Westminster, held an inquest at the Royal Yacht, Stanhope-street, Clare-market, on the body of William Moss Gregory, aged forty-five, a lawyer's clerk, and brother of the well-known Barnard Gregory, of the Satirist. It appeared that deceased lodged at 119, Drury-lane, and was subject to asthma. He partook of breakfast on Sunday morning, and his landlady entering his room soon afterwards, found him speechless lying on the sofa, and within five minutes he expired. The Jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."—Mr. Wakley held four inquests again on Wednesday, in the eastern part of his district, on persons whose deaths had been almost instantaneous. One was held in the parish of St. Giles's, on a glove-maker, named Ann Bennett, aged thirty six, who dropped dead on Sunday evening, immediately after taking tea. Two others were held at the Windmill, Leather lane, Holborn, on the bodies of Mary Stagg, aged 65, wife of a compositor employed at Hansard's, and of Jane Sutton, aged six weeks. They were both found dead on Saturday morning in their rooms. The fourth inquest was held at the Wilmington Arms, Clerkenwell, on the body of Margaret Jones, aged sixty. She also died suddenly on Saturday night. In three of the inquests, verdicts of "Natural death" were returned, but the inquiry respecting the death of the child was adjourned for a post mortem examination. These sudden deaths were attributed to the abrupt change in the weather, from mild to severe.

A NEW MODE OF PASSING COUNTERFEIT COIN.—On Sunday, whilst a collection was being made at the doors of St. Clement's Danes for a charitable purpose, an elegantly-dressed female, about 40 years of age, and of lady-like manners and address, expressed her willingness to contribute a small sum towards the object sought to be benefitted, but regretted that she had no small change in her possession, at the same time producing a sovereign from her purse, and offering to give 1s. 6d. if they would oblige her with the change. This request, after some delay, was complied with, and 18s. 6d. was handed to her, and having leisurely placed the silver in her purse she left the church. A short time after, the sovereign was found to be counterfeit.

ALARMING FIRE AT CHATHAM DOCKYARD.—About two o'clock on Tuesday, a fire of an alarming character broke out in Chatham Dockyard. Happily, however, owing to the heavy fall of snow, the absence of wind, the presence of assistance immediately on the spot, a plentiful supply of water, and the praiseworthy exertions of officers and men—naval, military, and civil—the damage sustained, although extensive, is comparatively little to what might have been anticipated from the inflammable materials and their contiguity. The fire was first seen in a place called the Joiners' Pound, which was full of seasoned mahogany and other materials for ships' cabins, &c.; and very soon it had extended on one side to the joiners' shop, and afterwards on the other, to the treenail-house, over which is the school for the apprentices, forming a range of buildings on the east side. The roof of the joiners' shop was destroyed, and the building itself was entirely gutted; and all the bulkheads, &c., prepared for ships building, with great numbers of joiners' chests of tools and fittings were consumed. The treenail-house was also gutted, and the roof of the building, with a great portion of the books, instruments, &c., belonging to the school, were completely destroyed. The schoolmaster's house, which is at the east end of the buildings, is also ruined. The schoolmaster and his family happily escaped without personal injury, and a large quantity of his property was saved, but of the whole range of buildings on fire scarcely anything but the tottering walls remain. As soon as the alarm was given the workmen flocked to the yard in great numbers, and by the well-planned arrangements which are made for such a casualty in the Royal service, the engines belonging to the dockyard were very quickly in full play. The officers and men from the various ships in the Medway were very promptly on shore, and engaged most actively in the suppression of the fire, &c. The troops of the garrison, to the amount of seven hundred, turned out on hearing the alarm bells, and with their engines, and headed by their officers, were also at the scene of conflagration in the shortest possible time. Considerable difficulty was experienced in keeping the flames form igniting the immense roof over the dock in which the Janus new steam-sloop designed by the Earl of Dundonald, is fitting. Happily, from the quantity of water played upon it, and the snow lying on the roof, it did not receive any damage. The origin of the fire appears at present to be involved in mystery, for, as far as can be understood, it was first seen in a part of the range of buildings near which there is no fire-place. The total extent of the loss of property is estimated from £15,000 to £20,000. During the time of the drums beating to arms, the officer commanding, Sir Michael Creigh, K.H.G., officer of the 11th Regiment, was at a grand entertainment given by the officers of the regiment, at which there was upwards of one hundred officers attending, many of whom repaired from the ball-room to the scene of destruction in their full dress.

DARING ROBBERY.—On Monday night, between eleven and twelve o'clock, a most daring robbery of property, to the amount of nearly £400, was committed by some thieves getting clear off with a box containing jewellery, linen, plate, silk, and valuable shawls, belonging to a French lady and gentleman, who had just arrived at the terminus of the Dover Railway, from the Continent. The robbery was committed between the station and the Waterloo-road. It appears that the gentleman had two boxes, containing an immense deal of valuable property, placed on the top of the fly. The boxes were both safe when the fly left the railway, and the gentleman desired to be driven to one of the foreign hotels at the west-end of the town, but when in the Waterloo road, one of the boxes containing the above valuable property was suddenly missed. How the box could have been removed from the carriage remains a mystery, for they were so secured that it was impossible for the box to have fallen off. There was no person outside with the driver, nor did he stop anywhere on the road. Besides the property already enumerated, the missing box contained a considerable sum in gold.

SUICIDE BY A BOY.—On Tuesday Mr. Wakley held an inquest at the Lion and Lamb, Drummond-crescent, Euston-square, on the body of Thos. Press, a boy aged 14, the son of a cow-keeper, who committed suicide. Jas. Press, the brother of deceased, said he resided with his parents at 43, Drummond-crescent. The deceased went to school, and occasionally assisted in carrying out milk. On Friday, at dinner time, it was discovered that he had been playing truant, and had appropriated some money belonging to his parents to his own use, and spent it amongst some other boys. This coming to his father's knowledge he boxed his ears, declared he should have no dinner, and threatened to beat him. Shortly before two o'clock deceased's mother gave him some dinner, and then told him to wash himself, which he did. About half-past three the same afternoon witness went into the yard, and observed the cow-shed open, and on entering he discovered the deceased hanging by his neckerchief from a beam. Witness gave an alarm, and Mr. Lambert, a neighbour, and his mother, came and cut deceased down. He was quite dead, and in order to effect his object must have got on one of the rails placed to divide the cows, and then jumped off. The jury returned a verdict—"That deceased destroyed himself by hanging, but in what state of mind he was in at the time there was no evidence to show."

SUICIDE BY DROPPING FROM A WINDOW.—Mr. Higgs held an inquest at St. George's Hospital, on the body of Sarah Ann Oates, aged nineteen, housemaid in the family of J. Rawlins, Esq., of 51, Oxford-terrace, Edgware-road. In September last deceased laboured under severe attacks of nervous headache, which deranged her intellect. Whilst suffering under an unusually severe attack she threw herself from a second floor window into the street. She was not rendered insensible by the fall, and in answer to a question, she said, "I did it because I thought it would be a nice leap." She was removed to the hospital, in which she lingered in a maniacal state, and died on Sunday last of injury to the spine caused by the fall. Verdict—"Temporary insanity."

A WOMAN BURNT TO DEATH.—On Tuesday evening, Mr. Payne held an inquest at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, on the body of Mrs. Ann Llewellyn, aged fifty. Sarah Williams, No. 30, Guildford-place, Bagnigge-wells-road, said that the deceased resided in her house, and on Friday last, witness, hearing a loud scream, and cries of "help," ran down stairs and saw the deceased in flames. She raised an alarm, and Mr. Locke, one of the lodgers, ran down and extinguished the fire by the aid of a blanket. Deceased was dreadfully burnt all over the body, and no time was lost in taking her to the hospital. She said that she was dusting the mantel-piece, when a spark flew out and set fire to her gown. Verdict—"Accidental death."

FIRE AT WALHAM-GREEN.—On Tuesday night a fire broke out in the basket-warehouse of Mr. Walden, at Walham-green. The fire continued to rage with fury, so that before the arrival of any engine the roof had fallen in; and when the one stationed at Fulham did arrive, it was ineffectual for a considerable time, owing to a want of water. Two other engines soon after arrived, but were not brought into play. The result was the destruction of the building and the stock, value about £2000. We believe the whole was insured.

LAMENTABLE DEATHS FROM POISON.—A very melancholy occurrence took place on Tuesday morning in the Grove-road, Camberwell, by the accidental administration of oxalic acid, instead of carbonate of soda. About half-past eight o'clock in the morning, Mr. and Mrs. Montague, who kept a cheesemonger's and sort of general shop in the Grove-lane, next to the George Canning public-house, sat down to breakfast in their accustomed way, when Mrs. Montague did the duties of the breakfast table. After pouring out two cups of tea, Mrs. Montague drank one almost at a draught. Mr. Montague partook of the tea, and complained that there was something hot in the teapot, and immediately called to a young man in the shop named George May, and requested him to taste the contents of the cup. The shopman did as he was desired, and jocularly said to his mistress that she must have emptied the pepper-box into the teapot. He drank, however, the remainder of the cup, and was nearly losing his life by so doing. In a short time after, the three, namely—Mr. and Mrs. Montague, and George May, the shopman, were taken very ill, when a surgeon was sent for by a neighbour (the landlord of the George Canning, who accidentally heard of their illness), and Mr. Fox, Mr. Massey, Mr. Cooke, and other medical gentlemen, attended, and applied every remedy that skill could suggest for the preservation of the lives of the patients. The stomach-pump was applied, but only in one instance (that of the shopman) was it effectual. Mrs. Montague died in about one hour after breakfast, and her husband expired at 2 o'clock. Mr. Montague was about 62 years of age, and his wife near 45. They had no issue from their marriage, but were supposed to live in a comfortable and amicable way. By what means the poison got into the teapot is at present a mystery, but it is supposed that the deceased, Mrs. Montague, had put it there, believing it to be carbonate of soda, which she applied to soften the water. From an analysis since made by the medical gentlemen it has transpired that the poison contained in the teapot was oxalic acid. Mr. Montague dealt in some few drugs, but no oxalic acid has been found on the premises since the occurrence. It appears that Mr. Montague was the first to find that there was something obnoxious in the tea, and on speaking of it his wife coincided with him in opinion, but yet drank her cup of tea.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Wednesday morning a fire broke out at No. 2, Fletcher's-place, Islington, occupied by Mr. D. Bryant. The fire was soon extinguished, but not before a boy, three years old, was burnt to death, and part of the bedding consumed.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

It appears by a parliamentary paper just published that the total of the capital of the unredeemed funded debt amounted on the 5th Jan, 1844, to £772,169,092, and the annual charge thereon to £28,516,882. The amount of the capital of the unfunded debt in Exchequer bills amounted, in the year ended the 5th of January, 1844, to £18,407,300, and the charge for interest in the same year to £594,051. If the amounts of the funded and unfunded debt be added together, it will be seen that the sum total of the National Debt amounted on the 5th of January, 1844, to £790,576,392, and the total charge thereon to £29,110,933.

One of the papers received by the last Indian mail, the Singapore Free Press, alludes to the serious illness of the Emperor of China; and, indeed, mentions a report which had reached Canton of the Emperor's death. The Emperor is nearly 70 years of age, and has reigned 24 years, having ascended the throne in the year 1820. Should the report of the Emperor's decease turn out to be true, great changes may be expected in China ere long. One of the most important, as regards the commercial interests, will be the legalization of the trade in opium, which has only been, hitherto, delayed by the Emperor being too far committed in his opposition to it to give way.

The Bremen Gazette says that the different German States are at this moment occupied with a plan for the establishment of a uniform postal system for the whole of Germany.

Mr. Josi, the keeper of the prints and drawings at the British Museum, died last week at the early age of 44. Mr. Carpenter, the husband of Mrs. Carpenter the artist, is a candidate for the situation.

Letters from Rome state that the Pope's new treasurer finds the revenue of his Holiness in a state of the greatest confusion. Cardinal Torte, the former treasurer, has been recently dismissed, and it is found that he is a defaulter to an immense amount.

The Gazette de Zurich states that the Grand Council had decided, by a majority of 106, that the Deputation of the Canton should vote for the expulsion of the Jesuits, and that the resolution had tended to tranquillise the Canton.

Mr. Ellis, of Barming, Kent, died last Sunday in his 76th year. Mr. Ellis was the largest hop-grower in the world—his plantations having at one period extended over as many as twelve hundred acres, although, we believe, of late they were somewhat reduced in extent. Notwithstanding the great extent of his plantations, he personally superintended the whole of them to the last.

The Austrian Observer states that three shocks of earthquake were experienced at Trieste on the 23d ult., the first at four o'clock, the second at 35 minutes 58 seconds after seven, and the third a few seconds later. It does not appear, however, that the shocks were of sufficient violence to cause any damage.

Letters from Hungary, dated the 17th ult., state that a coronation of the Empress of Austria, or Queen of Hungary, is spoken of with some degree of confidence as likely to take place in the ensuing autumn.

According to information of an authentic character, the present state of health of the Empress of Russia causes the greatest uneasiness to the members of her illustrious family. The Empress has now for a considerable time been indisposed, and the shock her Majesty received by the demise of her daughter, the Grand Duchess Alexandrina, has made ravages in a constitution already suffering from a complaint, the result of which inspires the greatest fears.

It is stated in a letter from Berlin, of the 5th, in a Frankfort journal, that the report of the illness of the Emperor of Russia was not altogether unfounded. He is said to be affected with a jaundice, which does not confine him to his room, but yields very slowly to medical treatment.

A letter from Hanover, of the 1st, states that the Prince Royal, who had been for some time suffering from an attack of the eyes, has recovered sufficiently to be able to appear in public.

Accounts from the Simplon announce that this route has been for several days obstructed with snow. From the 13th to the 17th of January the weather is described as having been very dreadful. It had snowed without intermission in a whirlwind of extraordinary violence. On the 15th not a creature could obtain access to the hospice, which was in a complete state of blockade. At seven o'clock in the evening an awful avalanche, which was detached from the head of Schœnhorn, descended upon the back and on the two lateral fronts of the hospice, dashing in thirteen windows and one of the doors. At Rottilch considerable damage had been done by the avalanche.

The Augsburgh Universal Gazette repeats confidently the report that the King of Prussia is about to grant a constitution to his subjects, and adds that something great and comprehensive may be expected from him on that subject.

The German Papers mention that the Queen of Sweden, the two young princes, and the princess, left Stockholm on the 30th ult., en route for Norway. They also say that a uniform rate of postage has been adopted in Finland.

M. Rolland, the well-known Paris butcher, who for many years has been the purchaser of the "bœuf gras," exhibited at the Carnival, has gone to England (says a Paris paper) to offer her Majesty the Queen a round of beef, from the finest animal that has ever been killed in France.

A letter from Florence states, that the celebrated engineer, Count Marchetti Tomasi de Riete, had formed a project for connecting the Mediterranean with the Adriatic, by means of a canal, which will be finished in five months.

Van Diemen's Land papers to the 26th of October, state that a considerable shock of an earthquake had been felt at Flanders Island, a phenomenon rather rare in the Australian group.

Delton, condemned to death for the murder of an old woman, named Dejorge and her servant, and Grasset, who had assassinated the widow Hue, at Longvilliers, were executed on Monday at Versailles. Delton, on ascending the steps, declared that he merited his fate, and in a few seconds had ceased to live. Gasset was nearly insensible when he reached the place of execution. The executioner's assistants were obliged to lift him up the steps, and as they tied him on the plank, the unhappy man, happening to cast his eyes on the fatal knife, fainted on the instant. Almost at the same second the fatal blow descended.

Sir William Follett, the Attorney-General, arrived at Marseilles on the 7th inst, from Naples, on board the Alecto steamer. Sir William, on his passage, experienced very rough weather. During his stay in the Bay of Naples, the Alecto ran aground and lost all her boats. She was to leave in a day or two for England to be paid off, having been five years on the Mediterranean station.

An apprentice lad, on board an English vessel in Calcutta, had lately a packet presented to him through the Post-office, the postage of which amounted to about £2 sterling. It merely contained a newspaper, which some friends of his in London had enclosed in half a sheet of paper, and addressed to him, when his vessel was in London, expecting that it would find him in St. Katherine's Dock. His vessel, however, sailed before the letter could be delivered, and it followed him—first to Hobart Town, next to Sydney; thence to Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta; thence to the Mauritius, and, finally, back again to Calcutta, where it caught him, after having travelled thirty thousand miles, and occupied on its tour one year and eight months.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

FORD HOUSE, DEVONSHIRE.

This fine old mansion, adjacent to the town of Newton Abbot, about 15 miles south by west of Exeter, is associated with one of the leading events of English history; for in one of the chambers the Prince of Orange slept, after he had landed at Torbay, on the 5th of November, 1688.

FORD HOUSE, NEWTON ABBOT.

At Newton Abbot, too, is another interesting memorial of the Revolution, a sexagon stone, which was the base of the market cross, on which the Prince of Orange ascended, and stated his acceptance of the call to the Throne. On the sides of this stone are sculptured his declarations respecting Protestantism, &c.

White to move and win in five moves

WHITE.

* 20th move—White left the Pawn en prise on purpose to win the Queen.

† 23rd move—Black's Queen seems to be lost now, but his next move leads to a very interesting position, wherein White cannot take the Q without disadvantage. If after the 23rd move of black, white plays Q to King's Bishop 3rd, black takes Queen's Pawn, and if white plays Q to her Rook's 3rd, black takes Queen's Bishop's Pawn, and black wins at least three pawns for a piece and a very good position. The best move of white would probably be 24 Rook takes Q.

‡ 26—White ought not to have taken this Pawn; he loses time, which enables his adversary to open a decisive attack.

§ 27—If white King to Rook's 3rd, black checks with Bishop on King Bishop's sq, winning easily. If white King to Bishop's 3rd, Rook checks Queen and King; if then Queen takes the Rook, Bishop retakes and white cannot take Queen's Bishop with the Rook, the Queen threatening check on King's Bishop's 8th retaking the Rook.

REMOVAL OF KING'S CROSS.

REMOVAL OF KING'S CROSS.

What strange mutations does the hand of "public improvement" work in our metropolis. Less than a score of years have rolled away since a very anomalous pile was reared at the point where meet the New-road, Maiden-lane, Pentonville-hill, the Gray's Inn-road, &c.; the spot receiving the somewhat grandiloquent name of "King's Cross." The building boasted, however, of correspondent pretension; the lower story was classically embellished, as the portion in our engraving shows; the upper stories were less ornate; but, if the expression be allowable, the structure was crowned with a composition statue of the Fourth George—and a very sorry representative of one who was every inch a king. The pennyworths of artistical information, doled out from week to week, soon taught the people that the above was a very uncomplimentary effigy of majesty; even the very cabmen grew critical; the watermen (aquarii) jeered; and the omnibus drivers ridiculed royalty in so parlous a state, at length the statue was removed in toto, or rather by piecemeal.

We cannot tax our memory with the uses to which the building itself has been appropriated; now a place of exhibition, then a police-station, and last of all (to come to the dregs of the subject) a beer-shop. Happily, our artist seized upon the modern antique just in time for rescue from oblivion; and his sketch is far more picturesque than would be "a proper house and home." The "time to pull down" at length arrived; the strange pile has been cleared away; and, lest a future generation should ask "where the fabric stood," we have consigned its whereabout to our columns. The dome-topped house in the distance will serve to identify the spot with our own times: it is in the Regent-street-cum-Gray's-Inn-road style.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—On Monday last, a general assembly of the academicians of the Royal Academy of Arts was held at their apartments in Trafalgar-square, when Charles Landseer, Esq., was duly elected a Royal Academician, in the room of Henry Perronet Briggs, Esq., deceased.

THE BOROUGH OF SOUTHWARK.—We understand that Sir W. Molesworth intends to offer himself for the borough of Southwark at the first vacancy. Mr. B. Wood, we are sorry to learn, continues in a very dangerous state.

ST. JOHN'S GATE, CLERKENWELL.—This celebrated ecclesiastical remnant, the only one of the kind in the metropolis, is threatened with destruction, under the provisions of the new Building Act, complaints having been made to the overseers of the parish that it is in a state of insecurity, threatening the safety of passengers. For some time past, the lodge entrance to the old monastery has been tenanted as a public house, and it is apparently in a very dilapidated state from want of proper repairs and attention. A strong desire exists on the part of many antiquaries and the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, to restore this interesting part of the ancient building, and to convert it into a literary and scientific institution for the benefit of the inhabitants of the crowded district of Clerkenwell, in the same way as Crosby-hall for the City, as it might easily be made available for the purpose, and it is intended shortly to convene a public meeting on the subject.

QUEEN ANNE'S BATH.

QUEEN ANNE'S BATH.

Public Baths are more numerous in the metropolis than is commonly supposed; as the pages of the "Archæologia," the "Gentleman's Magazine," and other antiquarian records testify. The specimen engraved above is thus described by a sensible correspondent of the Times:—

"In the thick of the once renowned 'slums' of St. Giles's there has existed one of the finest springs in the metropolis, which has been 'known to local fame,' and esteemed for its medicinal properties for the last two centuries; and, if the gossip of tradition may be relied on, it was once the favourite bagnio of Queen Anne, whose name it still bears to this day: it is to be seen at No. 3, Old Belton-street, between Holborn and Long-acre, in the direct line of the intended new street between Holborn and the Strand; one side of the street in question has already been pulled down, so that the bath is now once again brought to light, though sadly shorn of its ancient splendour. It is a curious and interesting relique of bygone days; it is a large tank, paved at the bottom with black and white marble, and lined throughout with good Dutch tiles, of the time apparently, of William III. or Queen Anne, having a lofty French groined dome roof. Being supplied direct from the spring, which is perpetually running into it, so that it is always fresh, it is much used by the inhabitants in the neighbourhood, as it is supposed to be a good cure for rheumatism and other disorders, is a powerful tonic, and, from its colour, evidently contains a considerable trace of iron. The spring from which the bath is supplied has been traced, I believe, from Highgate and as it does not appear to be known to, or treated on by antiquaries who have written on these matters, I have been induced to direct your attention to it, in the hope that such a valuable spring may be rendered available for the benefit of the poor inhabitants of this great metropolis."

HEAD OF A STATUE, BY PHIDIAS.

We annex two illustrations of the very interesting discovery noticed in our Paris corrrespondent's letter of last week—the head of the statue of "Victory," by Phidias, which formed a part of the frieze of the Parthenon—and which was brought over to Venice, at the time of Morosini's invasion of Athens, in 1687. The barbarous workmen, who, under the orders of the ruthless invader, endeavoured to detach part of the pediment of the Temple of Minerva, loosened the whole, and it fell to the ground from a great height, leaving nothing but fragments like this head, which is in a remarkable state of preservation, considering the dreadful blow it must have received, part of the nose only and the back of the head-dress being fractured.

We mentioned, in our last, that the fortunate possessor of this gem of antiquity is M. Le Comte de Laborde. The discovery was announced in the Constitutionnel, in these very liberal terms:—

"Un precieux fragment d'une des principales statues de Parthenon, une tête de Phidias, est à Paris: elle appartient à un Français, à un homme de goût, et de savoir. Elle n'est point à vendre, et par consequent elle ne passera pas la mer, pour aller s'enfouir dans quelque château inaccessible de l'Angleterre."

M. le Duc de Luynes, M. Lenormant, and M. Raoul-Rochette, have no doubt as to this head being from the hand of Phidias. Like all the statues of the Parthenon, it is of the most beautiful Pentelic marble; its size is double that of life. The band which confines the hair is perforated for metal ornaments; and the ears are likewise pierced for rings.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.—BALLET OF LES DANAIDES.

Mythology and classical fable have ever been rich in furnishing subjects for Terpsichorean illustration; but we did not think that the tragic story of Danaus and his Daughters could have been made the groundwork of a ballet, until the genius and ability of M. Hoguet convinced us of the contrary.

The ancient tale has been nearly rigidly attended to. Danaus, an Egyptian King, being blessed with fifty daughters, had a brother in the male line who rejoiced in fifty sons. To consolidate the friendship of the families, it was determined that the fifty sons should marry the fifty daughters. But old Danaus being told by an oracle (or warned in a dream, as the ballet more poetically describes) that one of his sons-in-law would be the cause of his ruin, proposes to his daughters that they should murder their husbands "nuptiarum nocte." Forty-nine of them consent to the wicked deed, Hypermnestra alone saves her husband, Lynceus. There are various histories of Danaus—some to his credit, some to the contrary. The ballet-dramatist has chosen the most consistent with popular effect. To chain the guilty Danaus to an ever-burning rock, and consign the forty-nine suborned young ladies to the tortures of those three respectable old maiden sisters—Alecto, Magæra, and Tisiphone—has been found to suit the stage effect very well: but we read of another punishment to which they were condemned:—

"Urnasque frustra Danaides plenas ferunt."

Oh! thus it is with ourselves:
How often do we fill the future up
With brimful hope and eager craving joy,
Then find, like Tantalus, a fleeting cup
Which all our dreamy pleasure doth destroy!

FRENCH PLAYS.

The St. James's Theatre has been flourishing during the week, and has been open every night. M. Lafont has firmly established himself as a favourite, and regret is felt by the habitués of the theatre, as the period of his departure arrives. This accomplished actor took his benefit on Tuesday, performing in "Le Chevalier de St. George," a clever comedie-vaudeville, with a part which allowed him full scope to put forward all his powers of acting in pourtraying the different passions; and so effectively did he employ them that he was twice called before the curtain by the audience. M. Lafont is in every respect a finished actor; and the perfect ease he exhibits in every character is not less remarkable than his consummate knowledge of the stage and perception of the finer phases in the part he undertakes. Mdlle. Nathalie, who has played principally with him during his engagement, is also an acquisition to the company.

The great actor, M. Frederic Lemaitre, is advertised to appear on the 17th of the present month, together with Mdlle. Clarisse. Nothing can be more satisfactory than the arrangements of the ensuing season generally; and

SCENE FROM THE NEW PLAY OF "THE PRIEST'S DAUGHTER," AT SADLER S WELLS THEATRE.

Mr. Mitchell is deserving of all patronage for his exertions. There is a report that Mr. Macready is about to perform at this theatre on the off nights of the French performances.

SADLER'S WELLS.

Mr. Serle's play of "The Priest's Daughter," the plot of which we detailed last week, continues to be performed at this theatre with undiminished success. Our artist has chosen for illustration the last scene, in which Ambroise the Priest, having fallen a prey to despair at finding the plan for poisoning the Count defeated, he swallows some deadly poison himself, and at the conclusion of the piece he dies, repenting his own error and guilt, and blessing the promised union of his daughter and the Count; the group being completed by Madeline, in an attitude of despair.

PRINCESS'

We last week noticed the production of a lively "comedietta," "The Brigadier," which continues an attractive item in the bill of fare at this theatre. The hero (the Brigadier) is spiritedly played by Mr. J. Wallack, and is one Bras-de-fer, a soldier in the Royal Guards of Louis XV. The interest springs from his very close resemblance to the captain of his company, with whom, in the course of the piece, he changes habits, enabling his double to escape from an arrest under which he has been put by his colonel, and make his way to a convent, where the colonel's niece, with whom he is in love, is confined. In his new character, Bras-de-fer receives first the barber of the regiment, who being his rival with a little woman, to whom the soldier is, unknown to any one, married, makes a variety of complaints; and, secondly, has an interview with his wife, who comes to intreat the captain's pardon for their clandestine marriage, and a great deal of fun is produced by their ignorance of the real person whom they are addressing. Suddenly, however, the affair takes rather a serious turn, as the supposed captain is apprised that Bras de-fer has crossed the enemy's lines, and brought on himself the punishment of death, the real culprit being no other than the captain who has visited the convent, which was then occupied by Austrian troops; and having represented himself as being followed by a body of troops, has put them to flight, and taken possession of their position. Bras-de-fer has to sign his own death-warrant, forging the captain's name; and, moreover, the colonel's niece, delivered from the convent, comes to his quarters, takes him for her lover, and he finds himself on the point of being forced by the colonel to marry her. (The illustration represents this very effective scene of equivoque.) The real captain, however, contrives to get near him, and an exchange of clothes takes place, Bras-de-fer being let into the scrape for which the captain was under arrest. The affair concludes with the discovery that the enemy have been driven from their position in the convent, and Bras-de-fer is no longer considered as an offender, but as deserving of being raised to the rank of brigadier.

At this house, also, a translation from the French has been produced with success. The original is from the wonderfully prolific pen of M. Scribe, who last December brought out a two act comedie-vaudeville at the Théâtre du Gymnase-Dramatique, called "Rebecca," the adaptation of which has been entitled "The Carbonari," at the Princess'. The plot is by no means complicated, but at the same time exceedingly interesting. Rebecca (Mrs. Stirling), is the daughter of a jeweller in Parma. She is in love with the Marquis Palavicini (Mr. Fitzjames), a political prisoner in the citadel; and is also beloved by Ascanio (Mr. A. Harris.) His friends object to the union on account of her ignoble birth. In the meantime the Marquis is condemned to death, and he proposes to marry Rebecca, immediately before his execution, that she may be ennobled by his title. The situation here reminds us of a similar one in the first act of "Don Cæsar de Bazan." The ceremony is performed, when, to the dismay of all but Rebecca, the Marquis is reprieved. He immediately applies for a divorce, which is granted, and stated to be irrevocable, as taking place between a Christian and a Jewess. Before long, the Marquis, who begins to perceive the excellences of Rebecca, regrets the step he has too suddenly taken: when all is at last made right by Rebecca confessing that she had for some time past abjured her faith, and was now a Christian. There was a comic underplot cleverly sustained by Mr. Compton and Miss Emma Stanley, but the chief praise must be awarded to Mrs. Stirling for her admirable impersonation of Rebecca. The character was in every respect suited to her, and she did not neglect a single point to make it effective.

On Thursday evening the legitimate drama made its first appearance on these boards under the auspices of Miss Cushman, a lady concerning whose success high auguries have been drawn from her reputation in America, stamped by the expressed admiration of our first tragedian. The part selected by her for her début was that of Bianca, in Millman's play of "Fazio"—one that was calculated at once to determine her rank as an actress. Almost the first impression which Miss Cushman gives is that of a marked resemblance to Mr. Macready in face, and occasionally in her manner and the tones of her voice. She has a tall and well proportioned figure, a commanding deportment, and features which, although not regular, bear an impress of unusual intelligence. The qualities which distinguish her acting are, a complete identification with the character she assumes, impressivenes without rant, and a natural filling up of a well-conceived outline. The peculiar absence of anything like exaggerated declamation, which we are unfortunately too much accustomed to, might convey an impression of tameness, were it not that, where the situation demands heightening in the performer, she evinces that her generally subdued manner is the result of discretion rather than want of resources. The portrayal of tender grief, in the passages in which the affection of the wife is expressed, was the most effective part of her performance. In these, her voice, which is not always free from harshness, assumes a musical modulation, which greatly heightens the impression of the scene. In the impassioned speech to the Countess, where she pleads for her intercession in favour of Fazio, the overwhelming flow of her elocution completely carried the audience away with it, and at its conclusion was rewarded with three distintly-marked rounds of applause. At the fall of the curtain she was recalled with such marks of favour as leave little doubt of her taking back to America a genuine ratification of the fame she has earned in her native country.

We have little space to devote to the other actors in the play. Mr. Graham showed a careful study of the part of Fazio, and adequately seconded Miss Cushman's impersonation. The rest of the characters, which were filled from the regular company of the theatre, were respectable, but do not call for any particular remark.

ADELPHI.

As we predicted a fortnight since, the "Green Bushes" has proved a great hit at this theatre. The piece has been played night after night, and if any thing, with increasing interest, no less arising from the powerful construction of the drama, than the admirable manner in which it is performed. The house literally fills to overflowing at the commencement of each evening. The management has not, however, relaxed in energy. On Thursday a new two act piece was brought out, termed in the bills "a dramatic sketch," and entitled "The Soldier of Fortune." It is an adaptation, by Mr. Bourcicault of a comedietta, which enjoyed a large share of popularity in Paris last year, "Le Capitaine Roquefinette," here Hibernized into Capt. O'Rourke (Mr. Hudson), an Irish military adventurer of that daredevil class of which Don Cœsar de Bazan forms the chief. The "dramatic sketch" might be taken as a type of French pieces. It has all the neatness of construction, and ingenuity of intrigue for which the productions of the French dramatists are so remarkable; at the same time we cannot say a great deal upon the score of its morality. However, there is very little to find fault with, and it goes pleasantly on from beginning to end, to the evident gratification of the audience. Besides Mr. Hudson, the cast included Miss Woolgar, Miss Fortescue, and Messrs. Cowell and Selby, all of whom played with their usual excellence. Miss Woolgar's character was that of the Lake of Anjou, in which she was capitally dressed, and much applauded in her fencing. She is clever, and, with a little attention, may arrive at a high position in her profession. We should not omit to mention the effective manner in which Mr. Hudson sang an Irish song, "The Bould Soldier Boy." As we have stated, the piece went with spirit, from beginning to end, and was announced for repetition amidst general applause.

STRAND.

The burlesque of "Antigone" continues to be received with roars of laughter; and, by the look of the house, has the desirable effect of drawing capital audiences together to enjoy it. It is of the broad rather than the polished school of extravaganza; but is also exceedingly well written, and not a passing topic of the day is let off without a joke or allusion.

MUSIC.

MADAME DULCKEN'S CONCERT.

The second of Madame Dulcken's musical soirées took place on Wednesday evening. It was well and fashionably attended. The Duke of Cambridge was present for the greater part of the evening. Two new candidates for public favour made their first appearance on this occasion—a Mdlle. Schloss, a soprano singer, and Herr Ed. Meyer, a clarionet player. They were both successful. The lady has a beautiful voice, especially in its lower tones; good expression and execution, that show careful training. She sang the Scena and Aria from Freischutz, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and an air from the "Clemenza di Tito," and was loudly applauded in both. Herr Meyer is an exquisite performer: he produces a fine full tone, free from all harshness, while his execution is full, delicate, and finished.

The rest of the instrumental performances were—Mendelssohn's ottetto, for four violins, two violas, and two violoncellos; Beethoven's grand sonata in D minor, played by Madame Dulcken; and Weber's concert stück, for pianoforte and orchestra, all of which were executed with that spirit, carefulness, and intelligence for which the performances at these soirées have obtained so high and merited a reputation.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—This institution will hold its 107th anniversary dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern, on the 4th of April. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge will preside on the occasion.

MORE JUVENILES.—Thirty-six pigmy dancers have been engaged for her Majesty's Theatre by Mr. Lumley. They are to appear in a new ballet expressly written for them. With the Lilliputians, some Brobdignags of celebrity are promised to appear.

THALBERG AND PARTY.—The distinguished pianist and his companions have experienced a severe sea sickness in their late attempt to cross the Irish Sea, and have since directed their attention to another channel. This week they have preferred the terra firma of Birmingham, Leamington, Worcester, Cheltenham, Bath, &c.

Henry Johnston, the popular actor of former days, died on Sunday last after a long illness, at his residence, Gillingham-street, Vauxhall-road. He was in his 70th year.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE ROYAL COURT OF GUERNSEY AND MR. CARUS WILSON.—Mr. Wilson was brought up to the Court of QUEEN'S BENCH on Thursday, in obedience to the writ of habeas corpus. At the request of the Solicitor-General, the writ was read. It set forth at great length all the circumstances attending Mr. Wilson's contempt of the Royal Court of Guernsey, and his subsequent committal. It also stated that Mr. Wilson was frequently cautioned to be more guarded in his expressions, in order to prevent him rendering himself liable to a fine of £10, but he refused to take any notice of such cautions, consequently a sentence of imprisonment for contempt, according to the rules and laws of the Royal Court of Guernsey, was pronounced against him, and that the proceedings which had taken place were, in all respects, valid and legal, and according to the custom and laws of the island. The officers of the Royal Court also submitted that her Majesty in Council was the only authority that could be appealed to. At the conclusion of reading the return, the Solicitor-General said—I pray your lordships that Mr. Wilson be remanded.—Mr. Roebuck, on the part of Mr. Wilson, applied for a postponement in order to consider the case. Their lordships consulted together for a short time, but made no observation. The Solicitor-General: In the first place I move that the return be filed.—Lord Denman: You cannot do that; we are not sitting in term; we are sitting today as a single judge at chambers, and therefore have no power to order the return to be filed.—Mr. Roebuck: Then I submit, my lords, no proceedings can be taken under the writ until the return is filed.—Lord Denman: Yes, there can, and the very object of a writ of habeas is to facilitate all proceedings to which it refers. His lordship added that it was difficult to believe that counsel who were engaged in the early part of the proceedings should have deserted it now, unless there was something the Court was not made acquainted with.—Mr. Roebuck could only speak from his instructions.—Lord Denman: I may here state that I received letters some months ago, signed by Mr. Wilson: they were sent to me most improperly. It was a most unjustifiable act to address letters to a judge.—The Solicitor-General: My lords, the return is only an echo to the affidavits published months ago.—Mr. Roebuck: I am not prepared to argue the case.—The Solicitor-General trusted, if there was to be a postponement, the parties who had brought Mr. Wilson into that court would not be put to expense in keeping and maintaining him which the delay would occasion. Under the circumstances he had a disinclination to press the case on, but they ought to come to some arrangement as regarded the expense which would be occasioned by delay. He was willing to admit Mr. Wilson to bail until next term, and consent that the argument take place in his absence; and, further, he would only require Mr. Wilson's personal recognisance.—Mr. Wilson here had a short private conversation with Mr. Roebuck; after which, the learned counsel said he had a most extraordinary announcement to make to the Court:—Mr. Wilson told him that he refused to enter into any compromise whatever, and that he had rather be remanded to the Queen's Bench prison.—Mr. Wilson, in an under tone, made some remarks complaining of the treatment he had received.—The Solicitor-General said the defendant during his confinement had received the prison allowance, and had what extras he wished for at his own expense.—After some further argument, it was finally arranged that Mr. Wilson should enter into his own recognisance of £100 to appear in the Court of Queen's Bench on Tuesday, the 22nd of April next. Mr. Wilson having entered into the required recognisance, was discharged from custody, and immediately afterwards left the court.

THE RAINBOW TAVERN.—In the Court of Bankruptcy, on Wednesday, Mr. Argent, the late proprietor of the Rainbow Tavern, Fleet-street, appeared before the Court on his adjourned last examination. It was stated that considering he kept no regular books, the balance sheet he had furnished was as satisfactory a one as he could possibly make out. No creditors appearing to oppose or examine, after the usual questions he was declared to have passed.

EIGHT BOYS DROWNED.—The Glasgow Constitutional gives a melancholy account of the loss of eight boys, who were drowned in Duntillan Loch, near Shott's Kirk, on Tuesday week, by the breaking of the ice. The whole party of boys fell in, and not one returned to tell to the afflicted parents the loss of their children. On the following day the whole population of the neighbourhood assembled round the loch, where it was supposed the children had gone, and the eight dead bodies were found lying together near the spot where the ice had given way.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—(Friday)—There was a very limited supply of English wheat here this morning. Although the attendance of dealers was by no means numerous, the demand for all descriptions of the above grain was steady at fully Monday's quotations. In fine foreign wheat a fair average business was transacted, and the rates were firmly supported. The supply of barley being more than equal to the wants of the trade, the sale for that article was very dull, at previous currencies. Malt moved off slowly, yet prices were supported. Oats, beans, and peas, were held at previous rates.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 4230; barley, 5020; oats, 2360. Irish: wheat, ——; barley ——; oats, 9970. Foreign: wheat, 200; barley, 840; oats, 1110, quarters. Flour, 3210 sacks; malt, 4240 quarters.

Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to—, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Linseed has been in fair request, at full prices; but all other kinds of seeds have ruled dull, without alteration in value.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed cakes, English, £12 to £13; ditto foreign, £7 12s to £8 10s, per 1000.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 5d; barley, 33s 0d; oats, 21s 6d; rye, 30s 1d; beans, 35s 1d; peas, 35s 7d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 4s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 7s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—The market continues extremely firm for all descriptions of tea, and the late advance in the quotations is steadily supported.

Sugar.—There has been a large amount of business doing in sugars this week, and the rates have improved from 1s to 2s per cwt. The supplies in warehouse are extremely extensive.

Coffee.—West India qualities have met a very slow inquiry since our last, on somewhat easier terms. Mocha is in fair request, at full prices. Plantation Ceylons have advanced 2s to 3s per cwt; but good ordinary may be purchased at 51s to 51s 6d per cwt. Foreign coffees dull of sale, but not lower.

Rice.—Most qualities are still in slow request, yet prices have undergone no change.

Cotton.—Some large purchases have been effected in this article, upwards of 2500 bales having sold at extreme rates.

Rum.—All kinds of rum continue to meet a heavy inquiry, and may be considered 1d per gallon lower. Bengal, 24 to 30 per cent overproof, has sold at 2s 5d per gallon.

Fruit.—In currants very little is doing, at from 49s to 51s per cwt. Raisins are plentiful, at 45s to 46s for red Smyrna. Figs may be purchased on easier terms.

Oils.—Linseed oil is in request, at higher rates. In other kinds of oil a good business is doing.

Provisions.—There is more doing in Irish butter, at very full prices. The same may be said of foreign. The best Friesland is selling at 100s to 104s, and stubble Kiel, 104s to 108s per cwt. Bacon is in better request, at very full rates. Waterford sizeable, 40s to 42s; heavy, 38s to 40s; Limerick sizeable, 40s to 41s; and heavy, 37s to 39s per cwt., landed. For forward delivery we have no sales to report. All other kinds of provisions dull.

Tallow.—Russian is in better request, at full prices. P.Y.C., on the spot, is selling at 39s 6d to 40s; Siberia, 39s; Odessa, 39s; Archangel soap, 38s to 38s 6d per cwt. For forward delivery, 39s 3d to 39s 9d are the asking prices.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 15s; useful ditto, £4 16s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6. Oat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s; wheat straw, £1 18s to £2 per load.

Wool.—The public sales have passed off extremely well, nearly the whole of the parcels offered having found buyers, at an advance of from 2d to 3d per lb.

Potatoes.—For the time of year we have a good supply of potatoes offering. The demand is Hops (Friday).—There is an evident improvement here in the demand for all kinds of hops, the supply of which on offer is extremely limited, and, in some instances, the quotations have an upward tendency:—1844's: Sussex Pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £7 8s to £8 4s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £8 0s to £9 15s; Choice ditto, £10 0s to £12 12s; Mid Kent bags, £7 15s to £9 0s; East Kent ditto, £11 0s to £12 0s.

Coals (Friday).—Adair's, 17s; Carr's Hartley, 17s; Old Pontop, 17s; West Hartley, 17s Wylam, 15s 6d; Belmont, 19s; Hetton, 20s 6d; Stewart's, 20s 6d; Hartley, 16s 6d per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—Notwithstanding the supply of beasts on sale in our market to-day was but moderate, we have to report a very slow inquiry for that description of stock, at prices barely equal to those obtained on Monday. There were offering 70 beasts and 20 sheep from Holland, as also 100 Scots from Dundee, in fair average condition. With sheep we were scantily supplied. Prime old Downs sold freely, other breeds slowly, at late rates. In calves—the numbers of which were rather limited—very little was doing, yet the quotations were supported. Pigs found buyers at full prices. Milch cows sold heavily, at from £14 to £19 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; second quality ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 4s 4d to 5s 2d; prime small ditto, 5s 4d to 5s 8d; large hogs, 3s 6d to 4s 0d; neat small porkers, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; suckling calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each. Beasts, 643; cows, 185; sheep, 2840; calves, 142; pigs, 288.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—On the whole, the trade was inactive, yet the quotations ruled about stationary. Per 8lbs. by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime large ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; ditto small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 10s; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime do., 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal 3s 10d to 5s 4d; small pork, 4s 2d to 4s 6d. ROBERT HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market has displayed very little variation during the week. Consols made an advance of ⅛ on Tuesday, quoting 99½ ⅝ for money. The probable increase in the interest of money from the large sums that must be necessarily absorbed in the formation of the railways, has already influenced Exchequer Bills, which have receded to 56 54, and close at that price. The present downward appearance of the Consol Market is, no doubt, attributable to the same cause, coupled with the trifling amount of business transacted. The final quotation is 99½ ⅝ for money and 99⅞ for time. Three-per-Cent. Reduced, closes at 100⅛ and New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 103¾; Bank Stock, 211½; India Stock, 283½; India Bonds, 69 to 71.

The Foreign Market has experienced some fluctuations; extensive operations have been made in both Mexican and Spanish. The latter advanced on Monday to 28¾ to ½ for the Actives; Three per Cents. 41⅜ to ⅝; but sellers for the fall came into the market on Tuesday, and prices declined. Mexican suffered more severely; the non-arrival of any remittance for the dividend, and the continuation of civil war, rendered the market very heavy, which, on the following day, again receded from the effect of the previous day's news. The South American Stocks have all shared in the same depression, and the tendency of quotations is generally downward. Dutch Two and-a-half per Cents. fluctuated a trifle on Thursday; the closing price is 63⅛. Columbian last quoted 14¼; Mexican, 34⅜; Spanish Actives, 27⅞; Three per Cents., 40⅝; Dutch Four per Cent. Certificates, 98⅝.

The Share Market opened heavily on Monday, and has been increasing in heaviness during the week. The effect of the debates in the House of Commons, has been to withdraw, from the lines approved of by the Board of Trade, nearly all the benefit that was originally derived from it. The rejected lines, on the other hand, are looking up, and many are preparing for a parliamentary struggle, in which it appears probable some will succeed, notwithstanding their official rejection. The uncertainty of ultimate success, even though approved of by the Board of Trade, will be evident from the depression of the prices of those lines. As a proof of this, Churnet Valleys—a favourite line—close at 8¼, with a very unsteady market; and Rugbys are 3⅝. Birmingham Stock closes at 237 to 240; Birmingham and Gloucester, 134; Bristol and Gloucester, 58; Caledonian, 7¼; Cambridge and Lincoln, 3⅜; Cornwall, 4⅜; Direct Northern, 2¼; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 64 to 66; Eastern Counties, 17½; Eastern Union, 19; Great Western, 179; Brighton, 56⅝; South Western, new, 114; Glasgow and Dumfries, 1½; Croydon, 18; London and York, 6⅜; Lynn and Ely, 5¼; Manchester and Leeds, 138; Newcastle and Darlington, 71; North British, 13½; Northern and Eastern, 61⅜; South Eastern, 48¾; South Wales, 5¾; York and North Midland, 106; Great Northern of France, 5⅝; Paris and Lyons, 3; Paris and Orleans, 44⅜; Paris and Rouen, 42¼; Paris and Strasbourg, 2⅜.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The settlement in the share market, was extremely heavy, but passed off with tolerable facility. The operators for the rise, had rather the advantage. In the English and Foreign markets, there were no alterations worthy of record. Consols close at 99½ ⅝ for the account.

THE EDINBURGH TALES. Conducted by Mrs. JOHNSTONE. Part I. Consisting of 64 large octavo Pages. Published in Weekly Numbers, at Threehalfpence; and in Monthly Parts, containing Four Numbers, sewed, with a Wrapper, price 7d.—"We must give a word of hearty and unreserved praise to the "Edinburgh Tales. The first monthly part is before us, containing two complete tales by Mrs. Johnstone. It is amazingly cheap, but that is its least merit. The tales are delightfully told; naturally, cheerfully, with great refinement of feeling, and a skilful variety of manner. The character of Richard Taylor has touches Charles Lamb might have given, and the prudent heart of Miss Edgeworth would rejoice in young Mrs. Roberts' Three Christmas Dinners. We shall watch the progress of this undertaking with interest. The beginning is of the best promise."—Examiner.—CHAPMAN and HALL, 186, Strand; W. TAIT, Edinburgh. Sold by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

I. and II., at 24s each; Vols. III. to VI., at 20s. each. The work is printed so as to bind in Six Volumes. Persons desirous of becoming Subscribers are requested to apply to the Publisher, or to the Bookseller they are in the habit of dealing with in their own neighbourhood.—London: Published by assignment of the Executors of Dr. Adam Clarke, for THOMAS TEGG, 73, Cheapside.

DEDICATED, BY PERMISSION, TO THE MARCHIONESS CORNWALLIS.
Just ready, in 3 vols. small 8vo., with Illustrations,
THE HISTORY OF
MARGARET CATCHPOLE, A SUFFOLK GIRL.
This extraordinary female, born of humble parentage, underwent some of the most singular vicissitudes that perhaps ever marked the career of woman. She was connected with the captain of a band of smugglers that infested the Suffolk coast at the close of the last century, and committed a crime for which she was tried and condemned to death at Bury Assizes, in the year 1797; was reprieved, broke out of prison at Ipswich to join her lover, was retaken, sentenced again to death, and her punishment changed to transportation for life. Retrieving her character in Australia, she distinguished herself in many new adventures, obtained a free pardon, and married a wealthy settler, who left her sole mistress of an immense fortune.
 Those who may desire to become Subscribers to this work are requested to send their names forthwith to the Publisher, Mr. COLBURN, 13, Great Marlborough-street. The price to Subscribers only will be One Guinea.

THE BEST ALMANACK FOR 1845.
Now Publishing, 64 pages, handsome quarto, gilt edges (no Advertisements), with
EIGHTY ENGRAVINGS!
Price One Shilling, the
ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK, and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.
It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.
The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Almanack.
EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.
"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.
"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the Calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post, Nov. 20.
"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries; and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15
"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets, as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.
"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.
"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy."—Era, Nov. 24.
"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish almanacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper."—Gardeners' Chronicle.
"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.
 For a detailed List of Contents of the Almanack, see the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, November 16.
Published at the Office of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, 198, Strand.
 Country Booksellers supplied through a London Agent only.

HOW TO LIVE.—Price 1s.; by post, 1s. 6d.,
WHAT to EAT, DRINK, and AVOID; addressed to the Nervous and Dyspeptic.
By R. J. CULVERWELL, M.D., M.R.C.S., &c.
SHERWOOD, 23, Paternoster-row; CARVALHO, 147, Fleet-street; HANNAY, 63, Oxford-street; MANN, 39, Cornhill; and the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand.

PERFECT FREEDOM FROM COUGHS IN TEN MINUTES AFTER USE, is insured by DR. LOCOCK'S PULMONIC WAFERS. They have a most pleasant taste. Price 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 11s. Agents, DA SILVA and Co., 1, Brideane, Fleet-street, London. Sold by all medicine vendors.

TO LADIES.—PETT'S POUDRE des DAMES, or Depilatory, justly esteemed as the only preparation for effectually removing superfluous hair in eight minutes. Its great recommendation is the simplicity in applying it, and the ingredients of which it is composed, being perfectly innocent, leaving a pleasing softness on the skin. Price 4s. 6d. Prepared solely by J. PETT, Perfumer to the Royal Family, 243, Regent-street, and sold by every respectable dealer in perfumery.

VAUXHALL COMPOSITE CANDLES, 8s. 6d. per dozen. PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES, 10s. 6d. per doz. GENUINE WAX CANDLES, 28s. per doz. These three sorts of Candles are all precisely alike in their burning qualities, but the Vauxhall Composites are rather softer than the Price's Patent, and thence the difference in price. Even those who are compelled to study economy alone, should burn them in preference to Tallow dips. Patent Cocoa Nut Lamp Oil, warranted equal in every respect to the finest Sperm, 4s. per gallon.—WM. MARCHANT, 253, Regent-circus, Oxford-street.

VAUXHALL COMPOSITE CANDLES, 8½d. per lb.—PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES, 10½d. per lb. These are the London cash prices, but the Country ones vary with the distance from town. Both sorts burn exactly as well as the finest wax, and are cheaper, allowing for the light, than Tallow Moulds. Sold wholesale to the trade by Edward Price and Co., Belmont, Vauxhall; Palmer and Co., Sutton-street, Clerkenwell; and William Marchant, 253, Regent Circus, Oxford-street. Until these Candles become generally sold throughout the country, EDWARD PRICE and Co. will supply any private families unable to obtain them in their own neighbourhood, with a quantity not less than £5 worth, direct from the factory. On a line being addressed to Belmont, Vauxhall, enclosing a Post-office Order for £5 (payable to Edward Price and Co., not to Edward Price or Mr. Price), they will forward a box of the Vauxhall Composite, or of the others, or a mixed box as may be directed, to that exact amount.

A CERTAIN CURE for SCROFULA or KING'S-EVIL, by HOLLOWAY'S PILLS and OINTMENT—A FRIGHTFUL CASE!—A young man named Bowman, a shoemaker, living in James-street, Manchester, had been afflicted from childhood with the most malignant kind of Scrofulous Ulcers covering various parts of his body; besides other sufferings, they had deprived him of the use of his left leg; yet, extraordinary to relate, this poor fellow has not only had all the ulcers soundly healed, but has likewise regained the complete use of his limb by means of these two wonderful medicines.—Sold at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment, 244, Strand, (where advice may be had gratis), and by almost all respectable vendors of medicines throughout the civilised world.

DRESS COIFFURES.—As it has become necessary, in accordance with the prevailing mode, to dispose the Hair in effective masses, or in conspicuous nœuds, a certain body of hair is essential to afford the coiffeur the means of producing the arrangement. Thinness or weakness of the Hair is, in these cases, a complete obstacle, and it is only to be effectually remedied by the application of OLDRIDGE'S BALM of COLUMBIA, which prevents the Hair from turning grey, and the first application causes it to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off and a few bottles restore it again. Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine. Oldridge's Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

HARD'S FARINACEOUS FOOD for INFANTS and INVALIDS.—"I have carefully examined and repeatedly prescribed Hard's Farinaceous Food, which is prepared from the most nutritious of the cereal grains. It combines both nitrogenized and non-nitrogenized alimentary principles, and forms a very valuable food for Children and Invalids.
"JON. PEREIRA, M.D.F.R.S. (Assistant Physician to the London Hospital.
"47, Finsbury-square, July 1, 1843."
 See also Pereira's "Treatise on Food and Diet," pages 309 and 473, &c.
Sold by all respectable druggists, in 1s. and 2s. packets, also in tin cases, 7s. 6d. each; and as a caution against fraudulent imitations, please to observe none are genuine unless signed "Jas. Hards," and manufactured at the Royal Victoria Mill, Dartford, Kent.

TO ALL CONSUMERS OF TEAS AND COFFEES THROUGHOUT THE UNITED KINGDOM.
THE BRITISH HONG-KONG TEA COMPANY inform the Nobility, Gentry, Clergy, and Families generally, that in addition to their large Wholesale business, they have now opened those extensive and commodious Premises, Nos. 12 and 13, Nicholas-lane, King William-street, City, as a Wholesale and Retail Establishment, for the supply of none but genuine and superior class Teas and Coffees, at an unprecedented smallness of profit.
In consequence of the enormous quantity of spurious trash now imported under the name of Tea, there never was a period when the public required, with a view to both health and economy, to be more careful in the selection of this important article, and more upon their guard against advertisers at extremely low prices.
From their long experience in all branches of the Tea and Coffee trade, the extensiveness of their transactions, and the arrangements they have made for securing the choicest growths of Teas and Coffees the world produces, the Company feel confident that nothing is wanting, but a trial of their pretensions, to ensure them that patronage it will be their constant aim and highest ambition to merit.
The Company invite attention to their Explanatory Pamphlet, containing a full description of all the various sorts of Teas and Coffees imported, and sold by the Company, with prices, &c., which will be sent post free, on being applied for; but the following are confidently recommended.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are apprised that Agents continue to be appointed in London and Country Towns by the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY, for the sale of their celebrated TEAS (Offices, 9, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate-street). They are packed in showy leaden canisters, from an ounce to a pound, with the prices and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is occasioned by the sale; the license is only 11s. per annum, and many, during the last nineteen years, have realised considerable incomes by the Agency, without 1s. let or loss. Application to be made (if by letter, post-paid) as above.

FOR WINTER WRAPPERS, GREAT COATS, and OUTSIDE GARMENTS of all kinds, see Berdoe's Ventilating Waterproof Clothing Establishment, 69, Cornhill, where an inspection is confidently invited of a large and superior stock of first-rate garments of the above description, at reasonable charges, and really waterproof; also of Berdoe's well-known Frock for all seasons (which has stood the test of more than six years' extensive trial, and completely superseded the "Mackintosh"). Shooting Jackets, &c.—The above made to measure, at the same charges, in a few hours
W BERDOE, Tailor, Waterproofer, &c., 69, Cornhill (North side).

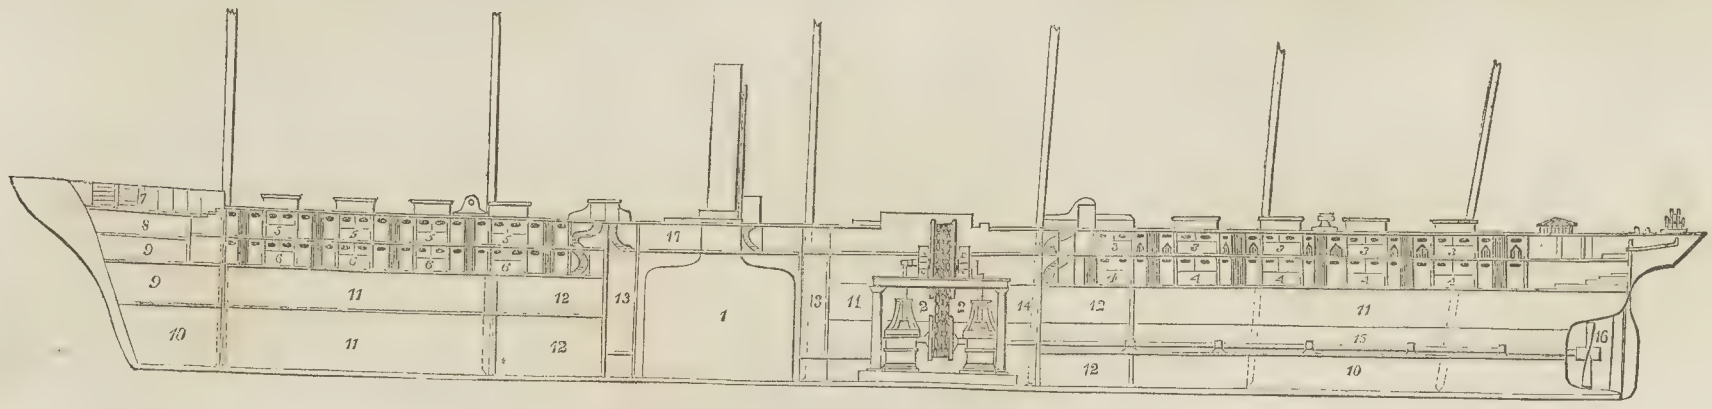
GOWLAND'S LOTION.—This well-known and highly-appreciated appendage to the British toilet, has for nearly a century past maintained unrivalled reputation as a perfect remedy for all impurities of the skin, together with the valuable properties of a preserver and sustainer of the complexion of the most genial nature, removing every trace of sallowness and discolouration, and promoting the transparency and brightness of the skin, which constitute the peculiar graces of a fine complexion. "ROBERT SHAW, London," is in white letters on the Government Stamp, without which none is genuine. Price 2s. 9d. and 5s. 6d.; quarts, 8s. 6d. Sold by all Perfumers and Chemists.

LOGAN and GILLO'S NOVARGENT or SILVER SOLUTION, re-silvers worn out Plated Articles, by instantly depositing a Coating of Pure Silver on the surface. It has been highly approved by Dr. Ryan, Professor of Chemistry to the Royal Polytechnic Institution. Sold wholesale by BARCLAY and SONS, 95, Farringdon-st., London; and JOSEPH RODGERS and SONS, 6, Norfolk-st., Sheffield; and to be had in bottles, with full directions, at 1s. or four in one 3s. each, of all the principal Chemists, Silversmiths, and Furnishing Ironmongers.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.—The Genuine are all signed on the wrapper, by the inventors.

SUPERIOR LOOKING GLASSES and Splendid Gilt PICTURE FRAMES.—CHARLES M'LEAN, 78, Fleet-street, respectfully informs the trade, artists, upholsterers, and the public, that they can be supplied with LOOKING GLASSES and PICTURE FRAMES, of the very best manufacture, at prices never hitherto attempted.—May be had gratis, and sent free of post to any part of the Kingdom, large Sheets of Drawings, representing the exact patterns and prices of 100 different sized picture frames, and 120 looking glasses, elegantly ornamented with designs made expressly for this manufactory. The trade supplied with frames in the compo. Fancy wood frames and mouldings, and room borderings. Old frames repaired and regilt. Glasses re-silvered. 30,000 frames kept seasoned for immediate delivery. All goods not approved of in three months taken back, and money returned.

MOURNING—Court, Family, and Complimentary.—The Proprietors of the London General Mourning Warehouse, Nos. 247 and 249, Regent-street, beg respectfully to remind families requiring mourning attire, that every article of the very best description, requisite for a complete outfit of mourning, may be procured from this Establishment at a moment's notice. Widows' and Family Mourning is always kept made up, and a note particularizing the mourning required, will insure immediate attention either in town or country. Ladies requiring Silks or Velvets for Dresses, Mantles, Cloaks, &c., are particularly invited to a trial of the new Corbeau Silks and Velvets introduced at this house. They will be found not only more durable, but the colour very superior, unaffected by the strongest acid or even sea-water Black and Grey, and Fancy Mourning Silks, Cashmeres, Plaids and Merinos of every description. The Show Rooms are replete with every novelty for mourning, in millinery, flowers, Tulle and Nett Sleeves, Collars, Berthes, Headdresses, trimmings, &c., &c.—W. C. JAY and Co.



CLOSE OF HOLIDAYS.—Now that the season of annual festivity is about to terminate, and the respective boarding-schools be re-instated by the busy throng of youthful aspirants, the personal comfort and attractions of whom become naturally an object with friends and relatives of great solicitude, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for accelerating the growth, and for preserving and beautifying the Hair; ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for preserving the Skin and Complexion, and removing Cutaneous Eruptions; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, for beautifying the Teeth, and preserving the Gums, are universally considered indispensable in the requisite accompaniments of the decorative repository. The august patronage conceded by all the Sovereigns of Europe to these creative renovating specifics, and confirmation, by experience, of their infallible efficacy, have characterized them with perfection, and given them a celebrity unparalleled.
CAUTION.—Beware of SPURIOUS IMITATIONS under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty). See that the word "ROWLAND'S" is on the Wrapper of each article. For the protection of the public from fraud and imposition, the Hon. Commissioners of Stamps have directed the Proprietors' Signature to be engraved on the Government Stamp, thus—"A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden;" which is affixed on the KALYDOR and ODONTO. Sold by the Proprietors, and by Chemists and Perfumers.— All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

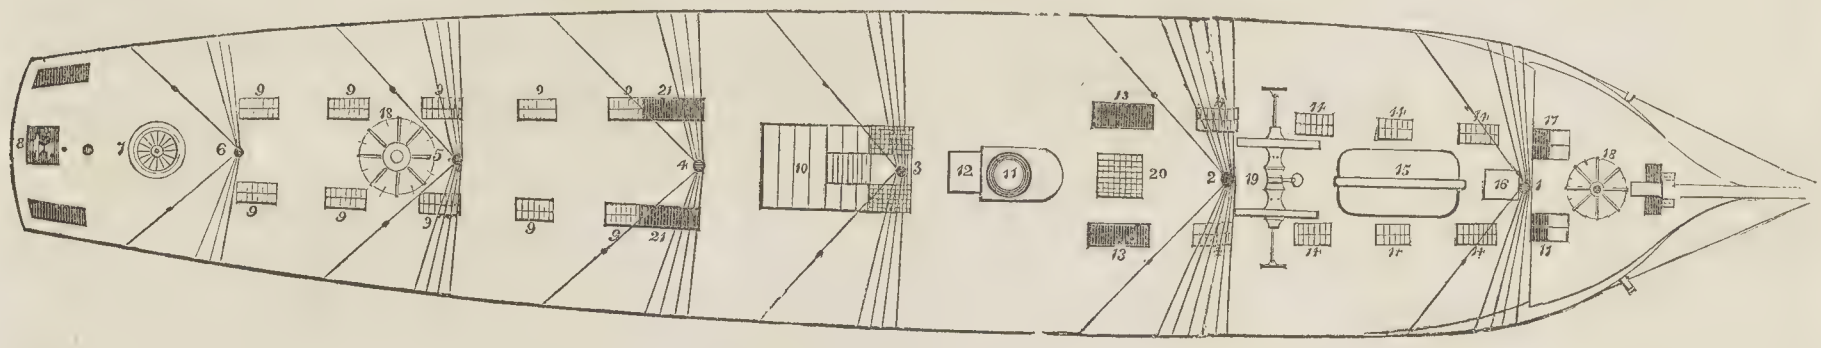
INTERIOR OF "THE GREAT BRITAIN" STEAM-SHIP.

This stupendous steam-ship has been inspected by crowds of visitors during the past week. She continues moored off Blackwall, close to the terminus of the Railway, of which economical access thousands have availed themselves.



Although we have already illustrated the construction of this "interesting monster" (see Nos. 63 and 138 of our Journal), there remain to be described her interior fittings. Their style partakes of that plainness and simplicity which characterizes the entire vessel. In this respect consists her claim to admiration, as well as in the vastness of her proportions, and the rigid utilitarianism with which not one inch of space is thrown away. In illustration of the latter, we annex two engravings, in which the situation of the machinery, and the general interior accommodation, are clearly seen at one view

The third Engraving shows the Promenade Deck of "The Great Britain." The most noticeable peculiarity here, is the range of "lights" on each side of the vast apartments: these, in form, resemble "cucumber frames," and like them, are glazed, and admit the light to the Saloon and Cabins beneath. This Promenade is sheltered by the upper deck from the air, and will, accordingly, prove a very convenient resort for the passengers during inclement weather.

The fourth illustration shows the Saloon of "The Great Britain." In this vast apartment, which is the main room, 300 persons can dine. There is little by way of ornament either in this Saloon, or in the Promenade. In both, the sides, roof, and supporting columns, are imitative wainscot with a slight moulding around the tablets, on which are neat allegorica figures.

Probably, we cannot better conclude than by the following passage from a very able précis of the structural merits of "The Great Britain," in the Athenæum:—

"But we must descend from our promenade on the deck into the huge caverns, the cauldrons below. The first peculiarity noticed, is the engine and the enormous chain and chain-wheel for driving the screw. Four separate steam-engines drive round the axis of this monstrous wheel—two at one end of the axle, two at the other—the wheel between. The cylinders are placed apart at the bottom of the vessel, and the piston-rods, which issue out of them, converge to the end of the cranks of this wheel. Each pair of engines works one crank, and the two cranks are placed at right angles; but the chain is the extraordinary thing; there are grooves on the wheel—at the end of each link of this huge chain there are teeth projecting into these grooves, so that as the wheel revolves the chain is compelled to revolve with it; at the bottom of the vessel, immediately below the great wheel, lies a little wheel or pinion, having grooves cut in its circumference of the same size, and at the same distance from each other, though much less in number than those of the large wheel. The same chain passes round both wheels, and while the large wheel revolves by the power of the engines once, the small one revolves as much oftener as it is smaller. The small wheel has for its axis, the axis of the Archimedes Screw, which is attached to the after end of the axis, and protrudes through an aperture at the stern into the water. Its revolutions give motion to the vessel by their reaction on the water. Such is the Vital Principle of this Monster of the Deep."

No. 147.—Vol. VI. FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1845. [Sixpence.

THE PREMIER'S PLAN.

SIR ROBERT PEEL brought forward his second great proposal of Commercial Reform on Friday last. Many anticipations had been indulged in respecting it, but few could have been sanguine enough to have expected one either so large or so comprehensive. All were prepared to hear that the Income-tax would be continued—the Queen's Speech contained a sufficient intimation of it; and the country at large fully expected a partial reduction of some taxes and a complete remission of others, as the return for the immense sum which that impost pours into the Exchequer. But there were not many, we apprehend, who thought the Premier would do so much in so many different directions. It surprised the House of Commons when announced; it both surprised and pleased the country when made generally known, and though a little consideration and some discussion, scarcely yet got beyond the first stage, have somewhat lessened both the surprise and the satisfaction, yet the plan must still be termed a bold measure, not at all inferior to that in which the Premier came forward in 1842, as the assertor of commercial principles, long approved as theories, but only partially applied in practice to our tariff,—the fact being the more astonishing from the circumstance of Sir Robert Peel being raised to power, and sustained in office by the support of men to whom those principles are most unacceptable. The advocates of protection made him their chief, and he is striking the deepest blows ever a Minister struck at the very roots of the protective system. They called him in to do their will, and he has done nearly the reverse. The King of Moab, when he pointed to the Jewish hosts, and commanded the prophet—"Come, curse me Jacob, and defy me Israel," expected not the answer of the seer, who, speaking only by the spirit within him, instead of denouncing, uttered a benediction; "What hast thou done? I took thee to curse mine enemies, and behold thou hast blessed them altogether?" Some such feeling of disappointment, not unmingled with anger, must be excited in a party who have given strength and position to a man for one purpose, and find the power they have bestowed used for another. And the feeling is perceptible enough among the ranks of the Premier's own supporters. During the whole of his elaborate address, in which he brought forward his plan, they listened in a silence that was far more that of astonishment than approval. As inroad after inroad was made into the old theory of commercial legislation—as tax after tax on the import of the raw material, or the export of the manufactured article, fell beneath the doom of the Premier—the prevailing sentiment among the occupants of the benches behind him was evidently that of wonder as to what was to come next. To give a stimulus to employment, more scope to industry, a freer field to capital, greater play to skill, science, and modern discoveries, as applied to manufactures—all these were avowed by Sir Robert Peel to be the objects he had in view in framing his scheme. Commercial intercourse, foreign trade, increased exports, manufacturing activity and manufacturing greatness—all these were the topics continually dwelt on by the Minister. And around and beside him were closely ranged the men of land—the lords of broad acres—the county members—those who form that powerful body—the landed interest; those who look on Free-trade principles with more than suspicion, and on the opinions and acts of the Anti-Corn-law League with something greater than dislike. When they saw the leaders of that body, the Free-traders in general, and almost the Opposition at large, cheering triumphantly as the Minister proceeded, as elated by the course he was taking, as if it were a victory of their own—what must have been their impression? We see it in the debate of Monday last in the open complaints of the Tyrells, the Mileses, the Bankses, of the neglect they have suffered from their own chief, of the silence in which agricultural grievances and depression have been passed over, deepening at last into a distinct threat of rebellion and opposition.

Yet such are the combinations of parties on this question, that the discontent will be ineffectual, and the opposition without result. Whenever Sir Robert Peel has seen a chance, or, to speak more correctly, a certainty, of depriving his opponents of power, by anticipating and giving effect to their policy, he has always done so, no matter how strongly he may have before opposed it, or how distasteful the course might be to the less pliant and accommodating of his friends. The Whigs for years and years laboured to carry Catholic Emancipation; they wrote, spoke, divided, and were beaten, only to go over the same process again, till, by constant iteration, an overwhelming mass of public opinion was enlisted on their side. Up to that time Sir Robert Peel had been one of the most strenuous opponents of the measure, but just as the Whigs expected his adherence to a principle which would have overthrown him, he veered round to the other point, and dexterously carried their policy into effect. In the same manner, the labours of Romilly and others were for years directed to a reform of our criminal code; they prepared the public mind for the change; but it was Sir Robert Peel who made use of their labours, and reduced their theories to practice, and now he is doing the same with Commercial Reform. For how many years have not Free-trade members quoted Adam Smith, and lectured the house on political economy? and in vain. But the same principles have obtained strength and support out of doors, and now the measures of the Government are avowedly in some respects founded on them. On the question of Commercial Reform, Sir Robert Peel is evidently taking the wind out of the sails of the Liberals; they may talk a question into importance, but he gives it practical life and action. He is the man of the time, clear-sighted, prudent, and, to reverse what was said of Burke, by no means "too fond of the right to pursue the expedient." To him it is useless to quote Hansard, and array past opinions against present acts. His policy is the adaptation of present things to present times. What Sir Robert Peel did, or said in any former year, is of far less import than what it is necessary to say and do now. He is a man of tact and talent too; many have the last, but, lacking the first, find the other almost useless. The difference is easily perceptible; talent alone often deserves success, but, join it to tact, and it does more—it succeeds.

Thus, having done as little for Free-trade principles, by former advocacy, as any man, Sir Robert Peel is now promoting it more effectually than all his predecessors! Look at the plan itself—duties on the import of raw materials of manufacture abolished; a sound and excellent principle: all duties on exports abolished also; another good principle asserted and acted on: more than four hundred articles swept away from the Tariff altogether; and one mischievous and oppressive branch of the Excise—that on Glass—quite done away with! True, all this is not granted without its price; the Income-tax is still continued; but, seeing that in the whole House of Commons not sixty votes could be collected against even the most reasonable modification of that tax, we may feel thankful in the recollection, that, while much has certainly been taken, much has also been given in return.

SLEDGE DRIVING.

Her Majesty's sledge journey at Brighton, and the preparations made for a similar mode of exercise by the Court at Windsor during dry and wintry weather, has had the effect of calling public attention to the subject of sledge conveyance. By many it is considered to be a very perilous mode of transit, and that in the trip which her Majesty made across the Southern Downs, she must necessarily have been exposed to much danger. This, however, is in no degree the case, for the vehicle used on the occasion was similar in construction to the one here engraved, which being sufficiently broad to permit two horses abreast to be harnessed to it, is also too broad to permit an OVERSET by any of the ordinary exigencies of travel. The Queen's sledge is, of course, a lighter and more elegant structure than the one in our engraving; but in all essential respects, it has been followed as a model. Carriages of this kind, for two ponies, may be very safely driven on dry grass lands during the fine days of early spring, and will afford a high treat to those who wish to combine the smoothness of railway with the social and picturesque circumstances of coach-road transit in their carriage airings. Apart from any temporary interest, our Engraving will be admired as a very spirited representation of a journey in which the utmost powers of the sledge are tested. The scene is associated with the capture of one of the turbulent princes of Northern Germany, and has been copied from a picture by Lessing. The picture also illustrates the usual mode of dispatching expresses in Germany.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Every hour announces here the arrival or departure of some of the great vocal or dramatic artists who are destined to sustain the honours of your operatic or theatrical season. Paris may, therefore, be said to possess in transitu all the great European names who confer distinction on the stage. How strange, at the same time, that we should find in the ranks of private fashionable life, a young lady whose dramatic talents, according to the opinions of the best judges, exceed anything that has appeared of late years on British theatrical boards: we allude to the recent displays of Miss Mac Tavish, at the private theatricals of the British Embassy. Certainly the education of this young lady at the Roman Catholic Convent of New Hall was not calculated to foster dramatic talent, but nature has proved stronger than the rigid lessons of the pious nuns; and Miss Mac Tavish, if she had been placed in a less prosperous situation, would have reached the very highest place in professional life; but, happily for her, she is the niece of the late Marchioness Wellesley, and thus is placed under the immediate protection of Lord and Lady Cowley, at whose request she appeared on the private stage of the Embassy. I hear that Macready was so enchanted with her acting, that he pronounced an opinion in all respects agreeing with that formed by those who had the satisfaction of being part of the fashionable audience invited by the Ambassadress.

It is much regretted by our beau monde that those theatricals, which presented Lady Seymour and Lady Dufferin on the same boards with Miss Mac Tavish, should have ceased; and an earnest hope prevails that they will be resumed after Easter. There can be only one person pleased at their discontinuance, and that is the Marquis de Castellane, at whose house private theatricals have been the rage. The Marquis has a theatre fitted up with all professional appurtenances. All it wants is an audience, as the fashionable has abandoned him for the greater attraction of the Embassy.

Religion and love have just joined hands here in a remarkable manner. The grand niece of General Guilleminot has conquered the heart of the Arab chief, Yussuff Bey, Colonel of Spahis, and the truths of Christianity have at the same time enlightened the benighted mind of that son of Ismalism. The marriage is to be celebrated with great pomp on the 27th, the recantation of the errors of Mahommedanism, and adoption of the Christian faith, having already taken place in the presence of the family of the bride. Honours and distinctions are lavished on the converted son of the desert, and he is to be instantly promoted to the rank of Marechal de Camp and Military Commander at Oran. The countrymen of Yussuff Bey, who lately visited this metropolis, were greatly admired for the native dignity of their manners and manly grace of person, set off by the originality and elegance of their costume. Many a fair heart, no doubt, felt the influence of the dark eye of the desert; but Mdlle. Weyer is the only ornament of our society who has ventured to trust her future happiness to its protecting care. The sponsors who honoured Yussuff Bey on the occasion of his baptism were Monsieur and Madame Genty de Bussy.

Admiral Dupetit-Thouars, whose proceedings at Tahiti so nearly compromised the peace of Europe, and almost led to war between England and France, continues to pursue the prudent line of conduct which he evidently laid down on his arrival in this country. He avoids society in general, and confines his visits to the houses of a few select and intimate friends. He declines all political conversation, and though not pleased with the manner he has been treated by the Government, refuses to be made a tool of by any branch of the Opposition. His private fortune is inconsiderable, and he has relatives who are totally dependent on him for support, and it would not suit his private interests to quarrel with the Government, but he has, nevertheless, maintained his dignity in a remarkable manner, and he has not only not sued for favours, but declined some that were offered to him. It is said, that he has refused communicating with any member of the Cabinet but the Minister of Marine, under whose orders he is officially placed, and that he has rejected an offer of a ship, saying, that the command he desires is under the order of the Prince de Joinville—of course, I am speaking of the conduct of Dupetit-Thouars since his arrival at home, and by no means justify his proceedings at Tahiti.

The Carnival has happily terminated for the repose of the Boulevards bordering on the theatres where its demoralising scenes nightly took place. It was ludicrously amusing to see the close of the last ball at the Academie Royale. The crowd of masks remained to the last moment permitted by the police, unconscious of the storm which raged out of doors, and when they rushed by hundreds, I should say thousands, into the open air, they were covered instantly with thick flakes of snow. In vain they demanded re-admittance to the theatre, the doors were barred against them, and they were seen rushing singly, or in groups, like whitened spectres claiming shelter and hospitality at the different restaurants. As to fiacres, all that appeared were insufficient to meet one hundredth part of the demand, and many a fine costume of Marquis or Duchess was ruined by that night's exposure.

The approaching visit of the Princes of the Blood to Britanny excites a good deal of sensation in that province. Several of the great families indisposed to the present dynasty, reside there, and the people in general participate in the feeling of their near neighbours of La Vendée, but prejudice is wearing away, and, no doubt, the visit of those distinguished young Princes will dissipate much of what remains. The Prince de Joinville and the Duke d'Aumale are the Princes alluded to. They are to travel "incog.," and in the character only of landed proprietors of the province visiting their estates. And estates they have of immense extent—the property of Carheil, belonging to the Prince de Joinville, being valued at two millions of francs, and that in the district of Chateaubriand, appertaining to the Duke d'Aumale, being part of the immense succession left him by the Duke de Bourbon. Those Princes are esteemed and beloved by Frenchmen in every part of the country where they have hitherto appeared, and I have no doubt their urbanity and solid qualities will produce the same effect in Bretagne. In fact, the Royal Family are doing everything to make themselves popular, both in the circles of the fashionable world, as well as among the general masses of society. The Duke de Nemours, whose recent tour produced so much good among the people in the south and east of France, has gained golden opinions in the Faubourg St. Germain, by his splendid receptions of this season. Nothing can exceed the elegance of these soirées, as none can be present except by special invitation, and several persons who from habit are welcomed at court, have not the facility of appearing. In fact they contain the élite of the fashionable world, such as are termed exclusives in this country, or the creme de la creme at Vienna. Music is the grand attraction of these receptions, and concerts are arranged which combine all that is eminent in vocal or instrumental art.

FRANCE.

The affairs of Switzerland occupy the most prominent position in the Paris papers this week. Several of the Cantons are still in a very disturbed state, and apprehensions are entertained of serious outbreaks. The Moniteur of Tuesday contains the following telegraphic dispatch:—

"Besançon, Feb. 17.

"The Council of State of the Canton of Vaud has abdicated en masse. A general popular meeting, assembled upon Montbesson, at Lausanne, has established a provisional government, composed of nine members, of which M. Druey, Councillor of State, has been named president. These events have taken place because the grand council had not paid sufficient deference to the prayer of the 32,000 petitioners for the expulsion of the Jesuits, and occurred upon the days of the 14th and 15th of February."

In order to enable our readers to understand the question at issue, it may be as well to explain that the canton of Lucerne insists on placing the Jesuists at the head of the national education. Berne however is opposed to this proposal, and the people of that canton are in arms to expel the Jesuists by force. Zurich takes the same view, and supports Berne in its determination.

The Paris papers of course discuss the financial proposals of Sir Robert Peel, but the only part of his speech which seems to attract particular attention, is that in which he alludes to the augmentation of the navy.

The weather is very severe in Paris and other parts of France. A heavy fall of snow took place on Saturday, and on Sunday morning a man was found frozen to death on the road between Paris and Saint Denis. He was known to have been somewhat overcome with liquor in the evening, and probably had fallen or laid himself down to sleep. His body was as stiff as if it were made of wood. The Spectateur de Dijon states, that on the 6th, a phenomenon took place at Flavigny, such as has not been seen since the famous Christmas night, twenty-four years back. The thunder was heard to roll loudly, and flashes of lightning were seen in the midst of a heavy fall of snow.

Two Englishmen, possessed of very large sums of money in English and French bank notes, for the possession of which they could not satisfactorily account, were arrested in Paris on Friday last. It was at first reported that some of the notes stolen from Messrs. Rogers and Co. were found upon them, but our Paris correspondent assures us that this was not the case. It is supposed, however, that the prisoners had been connected with some robbery on a great scale in England.

M. Debelleyme presented to the Chamber of Deputies, on Tuesday, the report of the Committee on the Secret Service Money Bill. The committee, he said, had heard in succession the Ministers of War, of Justice, of the Interior, and of Foreign Affairs, and the majority had declared itself satisfied with the explanations they had entered into with regard to the foreign and domestic policy of the Government, and recognised that the system pursued during the last four years had consolidated peace, and powerfully contributed to the development of the national wealth, by the confidence and security it had inspired. The majority had likewise considered that the allowance required in the budget for police purposes was insufficient, and that an additional credit was necessary to enable the Government to continue that active surveillance so indispensable to the preservation of those beneficial results. The majority had accordingly been of opinion that it behoved the Chamber to give the Cabinet a mark of its confidence by adopting the project of law. The Chamber decided that the discussion should commence on Thursday.

SPAIN.

We learn from Madrid, that on the 12th inst. the Senate adopted seven articles of the Clergy Dotation Bill, without any amendment. As respected the national property already sold, the Minister of Finance renewed his former declaration, that the Government would tolerate no encroachments on acquired rights, which should be held sacred. There was no political news.

PORTUGAL.

We have Lisbon letters of the 11th inst. A stormy discussion on a measure for the establishment of Savings Banks, in the Chamber of Deputies, conferring exclusive privileges on a new company of capitalists specially favoured by the Government, was considered to have damaged the Ministry more than any former discussion, the privileges being looked upon as benefits conferred on a company on which depends the existence of the Ministry, and not provisions for the protection of the people who deposit their savings in these establishments.

The King of Prussia has conferred the order of the Black Eagle on his Majesty King Ferdinand.

An unexpected change for the better gave some hopes of the recovery of Senor Silva Carvalho.

A new loan of 1500 contos for the immediate necessities of the Government was said to be negotiating, and a new financial statement by the banker Roma, undertaken at the instance of the Minister, about to be submitted to the Chamber, exhibiting not a surplus revenue, but a deficit, rendering another loan to a large amount necessary.

It appears that Dr. Kalley, who has compromised his differences with the Government on condition of being allowed to reside at Madeira, was about to embark for that island.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock.

The Marquis of NORMANBY presented a petition in favour of the Health of Towns Commission, and inquired if the Government had any intentions to bring in a measure to ameliorate the present evils, and also to do away with burial clubs.

The Duke of BUCCLEUCH replied that the Government had it under consideration, and would probably propose some measure attaining the advantages proposed by the noble marquis.

After a few words from Lord Campbell, the Marquis of NORMANBY gave notice that he should move, on a future day, for a return of the order appointing the Deputy-Inspector of Ireland, in the room of the late Mayor of Galway.

The house then adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S BUDGET.—REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

Sir ROBERT PEEL this evening submitted his financial statement to the house, which was excessively crowded in every part. Sir Robert, after the accustomed appeals to indulgence on the score of the difficulty of the task, proceeded to submit his estimate for the forthcoming year, and as he had no right to assume that the house would consent to continue the Income-tax, he stated his calculations without taking that tax into account. The total revenue up to April, 1846, including one half-year's Income-tax, payable next April, which he had a right to calculate, and which amounted to £2,600,000, and also including £600,000 China money, would amount to £51,100,000, while the total charge would be £48,557,000, leaving a surplus of £2,543,000. If, however, they deducted the Income-tax and the China money, there would be a deficiency of revenue as compared with the expenditure of the country. He then proceeded to show that the Government was justified in asking for an increased vote on account of the public service, and adverted to the visits of three Sovereigns to this country, whom her Majesty had received in the most munificent manner, and although, notwithstanding that no increase of revenue had been given to her on her marriage, and Heaven had blessed that marriage with four children, necessarily adding to the charges on the Civil List, yet had no demand been made for a single shilling towards all the expenditure to which her Majesty was necessarily exposed by these Royal visits. Every charge was defrayed by the economy with which her Majesty managed her own resources. The right hon. baronet next proceeded to demonstrate that it was utterly impossible to reduce the army. The navy it was absolutely necessary to increase by 2500 men more than were now employed, and by 4000 men more than were provided for by last year's estimate. Owing to the increase of our colonies there was a necessary demand for an increased navy for the protection of our commerce. This increase of 4000 men would imply an increased expenditure of £184,000. He should also have to propose a vote of £187,000 for the basins for building a steam navy. The proposed increase in the navy and consequent increase in the ordnance estimates would amount to nearly one million. The total expenditure would be then about £49,690,000. For this sum the revenue would provide, even without the Property-tax; but he thought now was the time to make a great experiment as to the effect of a judicious reduction of taxes. It was therefore proposed to continue the Property-tax for a further period of three years; and should this be assented to by the house, the revenue for 1846 would in that case be £53,100,000, leaving out the casual China money. Deducting from this the expenditure as estimated, they would have a surplus of £3,409,000; and then arose the question in what manner this sum could be most advantageously applied in the relief from taxation. By the measure of last year, the duty on our colonial sugars was fixed at 25s. 3d., and foreign free labour at 35s. 9d., and they now proposed that on colonial the duty should be 14s., being a reduction of 11s. 3d.; on British India 18s. 8d., and on foreign free labour 23s. 4d., thus maintaining a discriminating duty of 9s. 4d. With respect to clayed sugar, they proposed to fix a duty of 16s. 4d. on British clayed, 21s. 9d. on Indian, and 28s. on foreign free labour. On refined sugars they proposed to fix a duty of 18s. 8d., and 24s. on double refined. This reduction of duties would amount to about 1½d. per lb., but its effect would be to reduce the price 1½d. to the consumer. He estimated that this would cause a probable loss of £1,300,000. He also proposed to abolish all export duties, without even excepting coals. The reduction of the export duty on coals would occasion a loss of £118,000. Of 813 articles, subject to export duties, they proposed to abolish the duties on no less than 430, which must necessarily be a great advantage to commerce. The articles were chiefly raw materials—silk, hemp, flax, furniture, woods, animal and vegetable oils, ores and minerals, with the exception of copper ores, dye-stuffs, drugs, staves, &c. From these he estimated there would be a loss of £320,000. The duty on cotton also fell most heavily on the coarsest fabrics, and of course upon the poor. He proposed to remove the whole of this duty, which implied a loss of £680,000. In the excise he proposed that the duty on one article, about which there had been no clamour whatever, should be abolished; he meant the auction duty, which pressed most heavily upon those who were most distressed. This would imply a loss of £300,000; but as he proposed to fix the amount of licence to be paid by auctioneers at £15, he thought there would be an increase of £50,000, making the real loss only £250,000. The duty on glass they also proposed to abolish, a tax which created the most perpetual and vexatious interference of any tax in existence. This would imply a loss to the revenue of £612,000. They would, therefore, have a surplus of revenue of £3,409,000, and these reductions would amount to £3,338,000, which would nearly absorb the whole amount. Sir Robert Peel here gave a summary of the various reductions he proposed, which may be thus stated:—

Estimated loss on sugar	£1,300,000
The estimated loss on coal	118,000
The loss on the duty of minor articles imported, being the raw materials of manufactures..	320,000
The estimated loss on cotton wool	680,000
The estimated loss on auction duty	250,000
The estimated loss on glass	640,000
The total loss to revenue, if the reductions are sanctioned by the house, will be	3,338,000
Which will nearly absorb the estimated surplus of.. ..	3 409,000

The right hon. bart. said the experiment he proposed was a bold one, but looking to the results of former experiments, and the increase in the customs' duties during the last year, he believed it would be found to be successful. He believed the repealed taxes, by the stimulus they would give to commerce, would so far increase the general prosperity of the country as to counterbalance the continuance of the Income-tax for a further limited period. Sir Robert Peel's speech elicited much cheering from both sides of the house. Several hon. members, Whig and Conservative, spoke in general approbation of the plan; but as Sir R. Peel did not call upon the house to express any positive opinion until time had been given for consideration, it was arranged that the subject should be further discussed on Monday, and the house adjourned till that day.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

THE RAILWAYS AND THE BOARD OF TRADE.—The subject of the recent decisions of the Board of Trade was again brought before the house, Lord Brougham having impugned the system adopted, and made some observations relative to the purchase of 204 shares in the South Eastern Railway by Mr. W. O'Brien. Lord BROUGHAM said, the name of Mr. W. O'Brien was published as the purchaser of the 204 shares, in order that the balance might be made up by anybody who chose to complete the bargain; but the instant his name appeared as a purchaser, the value of the shares mounted up. Mr. W. O'Brien's name had a talismanic effect; but if he (Lord Brougham) or any other noble lord, except his noble friend the President of the Board of Trade—not that he meant to say his noble friend had ever dreamt of anything of the kind—had purchased South-Eastern Railway shares, there would have been no sensible increase in their value, no such a change would have taken place. Lord Brougham, after stating that he "wondered" if it was true that the South-Eastern Railway matter had been decided by the smallest majority of the board, that two of the members of it voted one way, and two the other, his noble friend the President of the Board of Trade, as chairman, having the casting vote, said he should early in this session, bring in a bill on the important question of railway legislation.—Earl DALHOUSIE defended the conduct of Mr. O'Brien as a member of the Railway Board, and, in allusion to Lord Brougham, said, the noble and learned lord might be right or not; he might wonder whether it was the fact or not; but it was his (Lord Dalhousie's) duty to leave the noble and learned lord to wonder on. (Laughter.)—Lord BROUGHAM said he should not wonder any longer; he was quite satisfied.—The Earl of DALHOUSIE said that, with respect to the wonder the noble and learned lord had expressed as to the right of the Railway Board to decide, it certainly was a matter of wonder to him (Lord Dalhousie) that any noble lord who had the knowledge of business that his noble and learned friend possessed should express his wonder in such a matter.—A desultory conversation ensued, in the course of which the Duke of WELLINGTON highly complimented Captain O'Brien (the brother of Mr. W. O'Brien) as an officer and a gentleman.—The matter dropped without any result, and an adjournment took place at an early hour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE BUDGET.—THE INCOME TAX.—After a discussion upon the subject of the decisions of the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, which, like that in the Lords, led to no result, the house resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means, Lord JOHN RUSSELL proceeded to comment upon the budget. He spoke earnestly against the Income-tax, which he said led to vexation and fraud, and argued that nothing but a great emergency could justify its imposition. Lord John Russell next said, that Sir R. Peel, in proposing its continuance, totally abandoned the grounds upon which he had originally proposed its imposition. He, however, expressed his satisfaction that Sir R. Peel had turned his attention to the navy, which he had hitherto neglected; he also approved of the abolition of the tax on cotton wool and of the excise on glass, but he altogether disapproved of throwing away £300,000 by the abolition of the auction duty, while the duties on fire insurance and on soap still remained. Lord John Russell contended that we ought to have no protecting duties at all. All legislation should be for the purpose of repressing crime, preserving order, and providing for the defence of the state, and not for the purpose of meddling with the right of the subject to dispose of his labour and of the products of his industry in the best market. Lord John Russell next touched upon the sugar duties, and insisted that Sir R. Peel was about to sacrifice £1,300,000 upon false principles. Such a sacrifice would be unnecessary if a re-adjustment of the sugar duties were made on proper grounds. Instead of this they were now about to place the Income-tax upon a footing which must render it permanent, for it could not be got rid of without rushing into a national insolvency. For his own part he was for a short Income tax and a total abandonment of all monopoly, yet the right hon. baronet had so framed his proposition that he could not see how he could oppose the re imposition of the Income-tax for three years, because it was in fact rendered necessary by the nature of the proposed reductions. Under these circumstances he would not propose any amendment.—Mr. ROEBUCK, however, took a different course, for after arguing that the Income-tax was a most unjust one, he proposed an amendment to leave out from the resolutions the words, "professions, trades, and offices," not in order to exempt them altogether, but that they might be hereafter rated upon a graduated and more equitable principle. A long discussion ensued upon the general proposals of Sir R. Peel. Several hon. members expressed their disapproval of the Income-tax. The only speech of importance, was that of Sir R. PEEL, who gave his opinion that the agricultural interest would be more generally benefited by the result of the present proposed measures than if he were to take away any portion of the local taxation which was now sustained by the farmer, and place the charge upon the consolidated fund. The noble lord (Lord J. Russell) had described the Income-tax as the most odious, the most vexatious, and unequal tax that ever was imposed, and had surprised him (Sir R. Peel) much by adding that he meant to vote for it. He could not help, when he perceived how strongly the noble lord condemned the tax, feeling grateful for the compliment which he paid him (Sir R. Peel) in supporting its imposition for three years longer. He did not know whether the noble lord was not influenced by the feeling that should he be on the Ministerial benches some two or three years hence the £5,000,000 however derived, would be a very grateful sum to deal with; but he believed that the noble lord really felt also that, in the circumstances of the country, the continuance of the tax was calculated to prove ultimately beneficial. Sir R. Peel then made some allusion to the arguments of the other speakers, naively remarking that he considered it ungracious to say much in reply to those who were about to support him in the most eloquent of all ways—namely by their votes.

On a division the numbers were—

For Mr. Roebuck's amendment	55
Against it	263
Majority against the amendment	—208

The further discussion of the subject was postponed till Wednesday, and at half-past one o'clock the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The house met to-day, but it sat only for about a quarter of an hour, during which time nothing occurred deserving of record. An adjournment took place, as usual, until Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN IN CALICO PRINT-WORKS.—Lord ASHLEY moved for leave to bring in a bill to regulate the labour of children in the calico print-works of Great Britain and Ireland, and supported his proposition by making various statements as to their condition. The works in which they were employed were situated in Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, the west of Scotland, in some parts of Ireland, the neighbourhood of London, Dublin, &c. Lord Ashley stated, from information drawn from reports and obtained by himself, that in calico print-works and bleach fields there cannot be less than twenty-five thousand young persons employed who are under the age of thirteen, a large proportion being females; that they go to work as early as the ages of four and five, but the majority between eight and nine; that though there are many instances where they are taken care of, their hours of labour are generally of long duration, by night as well as by day, and unfavourable to their physical growth and moral training; while many of the processes in which they are engaged are disagreeable and noxious, requiring high temperatures, and so forth. The noble lord entered into various details to prove the accuracy of his information, and explained that the object of his bill was to abolish night work for females of whatever age, and for both sexes under thirteen; and that after October, 1846, the hours of day work for young persons under thirteen should be eight hours daily on six days of the week, or twelve hours on alternate days, with two hours for schooling in the one case, or three hours on the alternate days, in the other case. This, he contended, would not interfere with the profitable operations of capital, while it would be a great boon to the youth employed in these departments of industry.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM did not oppose the introduction of the bill, but warned the house of the danger of interfering rashly with important interests, exposed to great competition. Sir J. Graham examined some of the statements of Lord Ashley, and seemed to be of opinion that they afforded proof that the labour of children in print-works was lighter, more agreeable, and more healthy than in other manufacturing employments. There was also this essential distinction, that, in certain stages of the process, continuous labour was absolutely essential, otherwise the material would be destroyed; and though the labour was fluctuating, yet at certain periods the demand, especially when a new pattern was produced, compelled incessant and unremitting efforts to supply it. Without inspectors such a law as the one proposed would be so evaded as to be a dead letter; and, before he consented to it, he must have a line drawn, which would enable them to see how much further in this end of legislation it was necessary to go. But as the noble lord urged his proposal with much moderation, he would not oppose the introduction of his bill, to which the Government would give their best consideration.—The bill was accordingly brought in.

THE SPY SYSTEM AT THE POST OFFICE.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE renewed the complaints which he had made last session regarding the practice of the opening of letters. He characterised the report of the secret committee appointed as of an evasive and unsatisfactory character, and objected to the constitution and secrecy of the committee, from which he had himself been excluded; and all his allegations had not only been left uncontradicted, but the report would justify the suspicion that the committee had been instructed to go into a certain room in order to explain nothing and mystify everything. The report was full and explicit respecting the practices of early days, and the perusal of the first portion of it would create an impression that when it came down to modern times it would be exceedingly interesting; but the committee's ardour of research evaporated on arriving at the nineteenth century, and they had altogether evaded the tracing of the progress of letter opening warrants. It had been stated that the secret letter department of the Post-office had been closed; but he believed that, as the lawyers said, it was the venue that had been changed, the practice still existing; nothing but an act of Parliament could deprive Ministers of the power. The report justified his allegation that more letters had been opened by the present Government than by their predecessors; and he could prove that Mr. Mazzini's letters had been opened, for the inspection of persons high in office, prior to the time when it was stated a general warrant had been issued, and subsequent to the date at which it was reported to have been closed. The communication of the nature of these letters to foreign powers had been denied by the Earl of Aberdeen, and was admitted in the Lords' as well as the Commons' reports; and the fact, impeaching the honour and character of England, implicated our Government, in having betrayed to a violent death the misguided men who had attempted to raise a revolution in Calabria. It should be inscribed on their tombstone, that they fell in the cause of liberty and their country, through the treachery of Britain. Mr. Duncombe then asserted that his own letters had been detained and opened, under the authority of Sir James Graham—a personal insult, as well as an insult to the constituency which he represented, for if his correspondence were not to be free, he was unworthy the position he held. Mr. Duncombe proceeded to say, "I asked the right hon. baronet whether he opened the letters of a member of that house, and I now find that the Secretary of State, while he was guilty of the meanness and baseness of opening my letters, had not the courage to avow it." (Hear, hear, and loud cries of "chair, chair.")—The SPEAKER: The hon. member has applied expressions to another member of this house, which, I am sure, on reflection, he will be glad to explain.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE: I applied the expressions to the right honourable gentleman in his ministerial capacity, and in that alone, and to these remarks I adhere, and so they shall remain, (hear, hear.)—Mr. Duncombe concluded by moving "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the mode in which letters have been detained, opened, and resealed at the General or at any Provincial Post-office, and also into the circumstances under which every warrant for that purpose has been issued by any Secretary of State, from the 1st day of January, 1840, to the present time; the said committee to report their opinion thereon to the house, and also whether it is expedient that the practice should be continued. That the report and evidence of the secret committee of last session relative to the Post-office be referred to the said committee." Sir JAMES GRAHAM referred to the investigation that had already taken place as quite sufficient for any parliamentary purpose. There was not, he said, a single subject now brought under discussion by the honourable member that was not also a subject of his (Sir J. Graham's) evidence before the committee. He kept back nothing—he concealed nothing. If his conduct were mean and base, it was, at least, brought fully under the judgment and knowledge of the committee. If his conduct were amenable to the charge of baseness and meanness, he had, at least, the courage to make a full and perfect disclosure of it to the committee; and, in the full possession of all that knowledge, the committee acquitted him of baseness and meanness. Such epithets, whether consistent or not with the duties and position of members of that house, were, when used under the circumstances he had now to deal with, a matter to him of very great indifference indeed. The real practical question was, whether the house was to repeal or to revoke that power which the statute had given to the Secretary of State ever since the days of Queen Anne? They did not require further information for this—every thing which inquiry could give was now before them. If their opinion was that, upon the whole, this power was not necessary for the public safety, then the right course was for them to repeal the statute; or, if they should be of opinion that some farther checks were necessary, then it would be for the house, not to repeal the statute, but to impose the necessary checks. Sir James Graham concluded by saying, that if it was their opinion that it was for the good of the public that the Secretary of State should be entrusted with this power, it would be incompatible with the honourable, and fearless, and advantageous exercise of it, that he should be called upon by the house publicly to declare all the reasons and circumstances which have led him to exercise those delicate duties imposed upon him.—Several hon. members having spoken on the subject, Sir R. PEEL defended Sir J. Graham, and said all that Ministers had done in the exercise of the power possessed by them, both with respect to Mr. Mazzini and Captain Stolzman, had been laid fully and without reserve before a committee in which there was a majority of their political opponents; and that committee had fully acquitted them of any abuse of that authority.

The debate on Mr. Duncombe's motion was continued till nearly one o'clock, and was then adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

THE INSURRECTION IN ITALY.—Mr. M. MILNES put some questions upon the subject of the insurrectionary movement in Italy, in answer to which—SIR R. PEEL stated that when the British Government last year received information that an insurrectionary movement was contemplated in the Italian States, they felt it their duty to put the Austrian and Italian Governments on their guard, and particularly as this movement was organised by individuals residing at that time in possessions under the protection of the British Government. The Earl of Aberdeen did convey to the Austrian Government, from time to time, the general report of any information which he received in respect to the proceedings of those who had designs against the tranquillity of Italy; but he communicated no letter which he had received, or extracts from any letter, neither did he state the name of any individual within the power of the Austrian Government. He never communicated either to the Austrian or Neapolitan Governments, or to the authorities at Rome, respecting any particular designs meditated at Corfu, because he never suspected that any such attempt as had been made was in contemplation.

PROPOSAL TO EXTEND THE PROPERTY-TAX TO IRELAND.—The house resolved into a Committee of Supply, when Mr. ROEBUCK, by way of amendment to the proposal of Sir R. Peel, moved that the Income-tax should be extended to Ireland. He said that Sir Robert Peel had given his opinion that all should pay this tax according to their ability, and the right hon. bart. should show why those men in Ireland, who had the means of paying the tax, should not. Mr. Roebuck spoke of the agricultural members as having, with bating breath and pitying tones, complained of their condition to the right hon. bart., and went to him and reproached him, like a child which had fallen over a footstool, to kiss the sore place. (Laughter.) But Sir R. Peel had not expressed any sorrow for their griefs. They had created him—they had brought him into existence—they had breathed into his nostrils the breath of life—(Laughter)—and what was the return they met with? Why, the creature, who had life only by their means, turned round upon them, and was ready to strangle his creators. The spirit was destroying the creator that had given him life. He trusted that the landed gentlemen would no longer crawl on their bellies—(Laughter)—but would pluck up their courage, and assume a different position. Mr. Roebuck remarked upon the absence of the Irish members, who he said had deserted the spot on which alone the battle of the people of Ireland must be fought. (Cheers.) He did not accuse the leading Irish member, Mr. O'Connell—he did not mean him individually, but the whole of his followers, who, like him, had ran away. They had done so because in that house they felt they were unable, from their own personal insignificance, to gain the attention of honourable members. That he took to be the rationale of Conciliation Hall.—Mr. SHEIL defended the absent members, but said he did not agree with them in their reasons for absenting themselves. He opposed the amendment. He thought it right to inflict the stamp duty on Ireland, but he thought it extremely imprudent and unjust to extend the Income tax to Ireland. If a heavy tax were levied on Ireland in the form of an Income-tax, that tax would go into the Exchequer of this country, and would not be spent in Ireland.—Sir J. TYRELL and Mr. W. WILLIAMS supported the amendment.—Mr. Ross. Mr. Bellew, Lord Bernard, Mr. Newdegate, and Sir H. W. Barron, opposed it. The latter hon. bart. took up Mr. Roebuck's allusions to Ireland in strong terms. Sir W. Barron said he would take the liberty of telling the honourable member that it showed gross ignorance on his part, as well as presumption, for him to dare to use this language. He would tell him more—that he would not have dared to do it if they had been present. (Laughter, and cries of "Hear, hear!") He said, without fear of contradiction, that he would not have dared to use the language if they had been present; and he would leave the country to judge what they would think of a man who would say, in the absence of gentlemen, what he dared not say in their presence. (Cries of "Order!")—The CHAIRMAN stated his opinion that the honourable member's observations were out of order.—Sir H. W. BARRON: I am not aware that they are, Sir. (Great laughter, and cries of "Hear!")—The CHAIRMAN reiterated his opinion that the honourable gentleman was out of order.—Sir H. W. BARRON would humbly bow to the decision of the chair. But he must state that when the honourable member for Bath alluded to the taxation of Ireland, he showed the grossest ignorance of the question.—Col. CONOLLY accused Mr. Roebuck of misrepresentation, and said his remarks tended to revive those excited feelings which were fast subsiding. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER assigned, as a principal reason for opposing the amendment, that, by imposing a Property-tax on the English people, he could realise out of the proceeds of that tax the largest possible amount to the Exchequer, at the least possible expense in collection. The expense of the machinery was very small, whilst the produce to the Exchequer was very large. But in Ireland no such means of collection existed, and he should find it impossible to collect such a tax without creating new machinery of an expensive character—paid assessors, collectors, and commissioners of appeal, which, in proportion to the amount produced, would have constituted the most expensive machinery for collecting a tax ever inflicted on any people whatever.—Mr. HUME assured the house he had not intended to have said a word about extending the Income-tax to Ireland; but after the speech made on Tuesday night by Colonel Conolly, he had altered his mind, and now thought Ireland ought to be made to pay as well as England and Scotland.—Sir ROBERT PEEL addressed Mr. Hume in a pleasant tone upon the inconsistency of changing his mind merely in consequence of a speech. He then complimented him very highly. I admire the hon. gent. (said Sir R. Peel) for the industry and zeal which for so long a period he has displayed (hear, hear); and whatever difference there is between us in political opinion, I shall always say that the hon. gent. has rendered great public services to the country. (Loud cheers.) I am a political opponent of that hon. gent., who never gave me a vote in his life, but I anticipate the judgment which will be passed on him by a grateful posterity, when I say that the hon. gent., instigated by honourable and disinterested motives, has been the means of procuring many great reductions of the public burthens. (Loud cheers.) Sir R. Peel, in opposition to the amendment, entered into some financial statistics, to show that England would gain by the proposed remission of taxation in a much larger ratio than Ireland.—Mr. Sergeant Murphy, Mr. Blackstone, Col. Rawdon, Mr. Curteis, Mr. Wallace, Col. Sibthorp, Lord Palmerston, Mr. S. Crawford, Mr. Darby, and Lord Castlereagh addressed the house.—A division then took place.—The numbers were:—

Against it	275
Majority	—242

The committee then divided on the original resolution.

Ayes	228
Noes	30
Majority for the original resolution	—198

Adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The house sat but for a short time, and nothing of importance occurred. Some questions were put by Lord CAMPBELL and Lord BROUGHAM, as to the time when the new house would be finished, in answer to which Lord WHARNCLIFFE said there was not much probability of their lordships having the use of the house during this session. The roofing, he believed, was partly finished, but he would undertake to make some inquiries upon the subject.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

ITALIAN REFUGEES.—Some further questions were put to the Government upon the subject of the insurrection in Italy, to which, Sir R. PEEL gave answers somewhat similar to those of the day before.—In the course of the conversation, Mr. T. DUNCOMBE asked, Did the Austrian Government give you any notice of the Baudieras being in Corfu?—Mr. HOPE said the Government received no notice whatever.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE: Why, it was in Mazzini's letters! (Great laughter.)

Mr. MACKINNON obtained leave to bring in a bill for the prevention of the nuisance of smoke arising from the furnaces of factories.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE ON THE POST-OFFICE SPY SYSTEM.—On the motion of Mr. T. DUNCOMBE the order of the day for the adjourned debate on the Post-office inquiry was read.—Mr. M. MILNES rose, and addressed the house, severely censuring the conduct of the Committee. A long debate ensued, in which several hon. members took part; Lord HOWICK moved an amendment calling for a committee of inquiry into the fact, alleged by a member of that house, of letters addressed to him having been detained and opened at the General Post-office.—Mr. DISRAELI seconded the amendment in a sarcastic and telling speech against the Ministry.—At a late hour an adjournment of the debate was moved, but, on the division, was negatived by 269 to 29.—Mr. BRIGHT moved another adjournment, to which Sir R. PEEL, a large number of members having left, assented, and the house adjourned at a quarter past one.

LORDS.—MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS.

SERVICE OF PROCESS BILLS.—Two important measures have been introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Campbell, entitled "Courts of Common Law Process Bill" and "Courts of Common Law Process (Ireland) Bill." These bills have the object of remedying the defective state of the law at present existing, by means of which no one can recover judgment against any person resident out of the jurisdiction of her Majesty's superior courts of common law at Westminster, except by proceeding to outlawry, or by writ of Distringas. By these bills, however, power is proposed to be given to the Court or Judge, to direct service of process on persons resident out of the jurisdiction of the Courts; and the Court is to order within what time the defendant shall appear and plead. Any service abroad is to be as effectual as if made within the jurisdiction.

COMMONS.—MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS.

LONDON AND YORK RAILWAY.—On Tuesday the bill was brought in, and read a first time.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS.——THE SUGAR DUTIES.—Mr. M. Gibson gave notice that he intended to move a resolution to the effect that no arrangement relative to the sugar duties would prove satisfactory to the people without an equalisation of the duty on foreign and colonial sugar.—In answer to a question from Mr. Labouchere, Sir R. Peel said he did not intend to propose that the alterations in the sugar duties should extend beyond the 5th of July, 1846.—Lord J. Russell gave notice that on the order of the day being read for a committee of ways and means for the purpose of proposing the sugar duties, he would move a resolution by way of amendment, "That it is the opinion of this house, that the plan proposed by her Majesty's Government in reference to the sugar duties, proposes to keep up a distinction between foreign free-labour sugar and slave-labour sugar, which is impracticable and illusory, aggravates the evil of protection given to the colonies at the expense of the consumers, and tends so greatly to impair the revenue, as to render the removal of the Income and Property-tax at the end of three years extremely uncertain and improbable."

ALLOTMENTS.—Mr. Cowper gave notice that on Tuesday, March the 4th, he would move for leave to bring in a bill for the allotment of field-gardens.

THE BURDENS UPON LAND.—Mr. Ward renewed his notice of motion for a committee of inquiry into the peculiar burdens upon land, and the exemptions from taxation claimed in respect of them, for that day fortnight.

THE WINDOW-TAX.—Lord Duncan gave notice of his intention on Wednesday next to bring forward the following motion:—"That the taxes levied on windows were a great burden on the country—unjust and unequal in their operation, most oppressive on those who had to bear them, and ought therefore to be immediately repealed."

ART UNIONS.—Mr. WYSE gave notice of his intention to revive his motion for the appointment of a Select Committee on Art-Unions.

THE CORN-LAWS.—Mr. COBDEN gave notice of his intention to move for a Committee to inquire into the operations of the Corn-laws on tenant-farmers.

RAILWAYS.—Mr. WALLACE gave notice that on the 6th of March he would call the attention of the house to the existing traffic on railways, and the regulations respecting third class trains; and that he would move an address to her Majesty for the appointment of a Royal Commission, to inquire into the state of railway travelling in Great Britain and Ireland, and the best means of improving the system.

NEW ELECTION.—On Tuesday Mr. Fitzroy took the oaths and his seat for Lewes.

NEW WRITS.—On Tuesday new writs were moved for East Kent, in the room of Sir E. Knatchbull, who had accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds (cheering), and for the borough of Thetford, Mr. W. B. Baring having accepted the office of Paymaster of the Forces, in the room of Sir Edward Knatchbull.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

DEATH OF GENERAL SHARPE.—This gallant and venerable officer died at Leamington Spa on the 12th inst., at an advanced age. The deceased had seen a great deal of service. His commission as general was dated January, 1837.

RETIRED NAVY LIST.—It is said to be the intention of Government to make a retired list for the navy, in all its grades, after each officer has reached his 60th year.

The Victoria and Albert and the Rattler were paid advanced pay at Portsmouth on Tuesday. Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence joined the yacht on Monday. The Rattler went to Spithead on Tuesday evening, and the Royal yacht and the Black Eagle, Master Commander Cook, went out of harbour on Wednesday morning, and the three steamers left Spithead about one o'clock, P.M., that day, for Plymouth, on their trial cruise; it is said the Firebrand, Capt. Hope, will join them off that port, to be tried with the squadron.

The batteries and defences at Portsmouth are about to be strengthened, especially those commanding the entrance of the harbour. Four additional 32-pounder guns have been mounted on the King's Bastion, and it is understood that some new works will be shortly commenced along the beach between Southsea Castle and the lines.

The Pasha of Egypt has given instructions to Mr. John Galloway to commence the railway from Cairo to Suez.

A MAN KILLED ON WATERLOO-BRIDGE.—On Wednesday forenoon, as a loaded waggon belonging to Messrs. Mumford, corn-merchants, was proceeding from the Surrey to the Middlesex side of Waterloo bridge, a man in attendance on it very foolishly rested himself on the shaft, and from some cause unknown he fell into the road. A cry was raised to stop the horses, but before that could be accomplished, the fore wheel had passed over both the poor fellow's thighs. He was soon raised from the ground by some persons passing; but, after uttering two or three groans, he expired.

DEATH OF THE EARL OF EFFINGHAM.—This nobleman, we are sorry to say, died at Brompton last week. The deceased, Kenneth Alexander Howard, Earl of Effingham, and Baron Howard of Effingham, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, was only son of Mr. Henry Howard, of Arundel, and the Hon. Maria Mackenzie, second daughter of Kenneth Viscount Fortrose, eldest son of the Earl of Seaforth. He was born November 29, 1767. His lordship, who had been in the army nearly 60 years, had eminently distinguished himself in that branch of the service. The noble Earl was for some years Colonel of the 70th Foot, but on a vacancy occurring in the 3rd (Buffs) in January, 1832, his Lordship was appointed to that regiment, which he has held ever since. The title now devolves on Lord Howard, the Earl's eldest son.

An accurate account has been compiled of all the newly-projected lines of railway, with the estimated amount of capital required for their completion, with the decision of the Board of Trade up to the 6th inst. By this return it appears that the number then sanctioned by the Board of Trade was 29, lines rejected 31, postponed 14, and not then decided upon 80, making a total of 154. The estimated capital of the English railways sanctioned by the Board is £10,240,000, not reported upon £47,800,000, those postponed £1,810,000, rejected £20,830,000; Irish railways—sanctioned £5,235,000, not yet reported upon £5,780,000, postponed £520,000, rejected £1,500,000; making an aggregate of £94,770,000. This is exclusive of small branches and connecting links, which will probably require about ten millions additional capital.

SONNET TO INNOCENCE.

Say whence is Innocence? that shines so bright
Bedecked as 'tis in robe of snowy white,
Whence doth it come with purity combined?
When best displayed within the Human mind

'Tis found in infancy but not retained
'Tis lost in womanhood—and 'tis neer regained,

Awhile 'tis seen and then it disappears
Lost 'mid the turmoils of man's riper years.

Round infancy it allways hath entwined
Thoughts best adapted to its youthful mind;
From vice and wickedness 'tis always free,
And in Life's early years 'twas seen in thee,
Say whence it springs—I answer from above,
A sacred symbol of eternal Love.

THE ISLAND OF VICTORIA OR HONG KONG.

A letter from Victoria, dated Oct. 22, 1844, gives an account of the improving state of that island since it has been conceded to the English. The writer says—"Many large, solid, and really magnificent mansions have been erected by some of the merchants for their own residence and the transaction of business. In addition to the present Chinese quarter, which has already existed some time, another town is springing up, as if by magic, street upon street, and is fast approaching its completion. In proof of the progressive prosperity of the colony, a plot of ground may be seen, which, when the island was first appropriated, leased for £20 per annum; a short time ago an adjoining and similar lot put up to auction by Government was leased for a rent of £240 per annum. Again, a small house which cost 1000 dollars building lets for 750 dollars per annum; and such is the demand, that a very moderate sized house lets for £32 a month unfurnished."

THE FINE ARTS.

The number of foreign artists now studying in Rome amounts to 405 300 of whom are painters, 58 sculptors, 39 architects, and 7 engravers; 158 of those artists are Germans, 25 French, 33 English, 17 Russians, 7 Poles, 13 Swedes and Norwegians, 31 Danes, 19 Belgians, 3 Dutch, 11 Hungarians, 10 Spaniards, 7 Portuguese, and 14 Americans. The Italian artists are 542 in number, beside 2,000 mosaic-work makers.

THE GOVERNESS.—BY CHARLES PIESSE, ESQ.

This, an orphan, and desolate,
Treat her then kindly;
Think of your little ones—
View her faults blindly.
What though a governess?
'Tis a title of honour!
Should you then love her less,
Or tread upon her?

Her blood, as your own,
Is as gentle and pure;
And not long since her home
Seemed as certain and sure.
But death, in one day,
Claimed her father and mother;
Se is now the sole stay
Of a sister and brother.
Treat her not haughtily,
Speak to her kindly:
Think of your little ones—
View her faults blindly.

Like her now—all motherless,
Your child may yet seek
The place of a governess,
Humble and meek.
Thus ere death, your own daughter
All friendless may be,
As the poor girl who taught her
To lisp on your knee.

Should her robe be more coarse,
Is her skin the less fair?
Does her voice sound more hoarse
Than your daughter's? Declare.
If her smile's not so glad
As you'd have it to be;
Think, that countenance sad
Speaks the heart's misery.
Treat HER then with courtesy,
Honour, and gentleness;
Be affable to her,
BECAUSE she's a governess.

POPULATION OF ALGIERS.

In a work just published, entitled "Algeria, Past and Present," by Mr. Blofield, the author gives the following analysis of the population of Algiers:—Moors 17,000; Jews 5,000; Turks 4,000; Negroes 2,000; Kabyles and Arabs 1,000; Biskirs, Mozambites, &c. 1,000; Europeans 30,695.

DISREGARD OF AN OLD ADAGE.

A printer's urchin in Plymouth picked up £150 in the streets, and, with the notorious honesty of his craft, returned it with all possible speed to its owner. The overjoyed loser gave him 2s., or nearly ⅔ per cent! The imp muttered "Do you call this 'giving the Devil his due?'"

AN ICE TREE.

Numbers of persons have visited Fountain-court, Temple, during the frost, to witness the novel and beautiful sight of an ice tree. A mass of incrustations of icy particles having been formed on a tree, the tree had literally the appearance of being composed of ice. It is a dwarf tree, whose branches have a tendency towards the earth, situated on the edge of the fountain, and is completely incrusted with icicles, formed by the spray wafted by the wind. Its ramifications and tortuous windings are most beautiful, and its gracefulness beyond description, combining most elegant and most beauteous forms; in fact, its appearance is that of a tree formed of the most transparent glass.

RIME OF THE FROST—A SEASONABLE SONG.

By James Bruton, author of "Bathing," &c.

"The winter of our discontent"
Is now, or I mistake,
And if a bard did sing of frost,
It must be with a "shake!"
All slovenly must be his strains,
With thee he can't lose time;
For who, when rime is on the panes,
Takes pains upon the rhyme?

A "quaker" bard I'm now, but I
Would rather be by turns,
One of those called ancient "Scalds,"
Or else a modern "Burns!"
Ungenial clime, ungenial time,
A change who prays not for?
And if I were a "scald," indeed,
My prayer should be to—"Thor!"

To get the blood to circulate,
I jump like Monsieur Gouffe;
Bent double, and near Twining, oft
I find I'm getting coughy!
The question seems half quizzical,
For small's the diff'rence found,
Of "Will you have your berry in whole?
Or have your berry in ground?"

I'm so susceptible of cold,
That each breath gives a "crick,"
And cold I catch if I go out
Without my wa king stick!

A purple or a crimson hue
Some like—it is my dread;
That "leading article," my nose,
I do not want it rad!

To have a snowball in your ear's
A pleasant thing, no doubt;
But anything but merrily
I wring my old ear out!
Then urchins pelt one on the ice,
'Till quite as sour one looks
At being white-balled on a Pond,
As if black-balled at Brooks'!

"If frosts is out, then rains is in,"
And colds, and damps, and fogs,—
A sort of penny-pieman's time,
When it rains "cats and dogs."
The Dickens in the weather is—
With cough I bark and bellow;
And though I'm much inclined to wheeze (w's)
I find I am not Weller!

May gentle Spring come soon again—
The Goddess, I adore her!
Come not like Spring the pugilist,
Though you come with a Floorer!
Already I see many a bush
A budding blossom shows;
And I can judge that from its stalk
It's coming unto "blows!"

INSCRIPTION ON AN AMERICAN TOMBSTONE.

"Sacred to the remains of Jonathan Thompson, a pious Christian and an affectionate husband. His disconsolate widow continues to carry on the tripe and trotter business at the same place as before her bereavement."

THE CROWN OF THORNS.

There still exists a thorn in Palestine known among botanists by the name of the Spina Christi, or thorn of Christ, and supposed to be the shrub which afforded the crown worn by our Saviour before his crucifixion. It must have been very fit for the purpose, for it has many small sharp prickles well adapted to give pain; and as the leaves greatly resemble those of ivy, it is not improbable that the enemies of the Messiah chose it from its similarity to the plant with which emperors and generals were accustomed to be crowned; and hence, that there might be calumny, insult, and derision, meditated in the very act of punishment.

DRIVERS OF PUBLIC VEHICLES.

It appears that there are in the metropolis 1,793 omnibus conductors, 1,662 drivers of cabs, and 4,546 drivers of hackney coaches and omnibuses.

THE FINE WEATHER OF 1844.

There were 25 fewer rainy days in 1844 than in the preceding year, and 22 fewer than the average of the nine preceding years.

THE WIFE'S COMPLAINT.

Oh! then Railroad Speculations! and this mania after gain,
I think the time is fully come, when wives may now complain,
Talk of German Wool and Polkas, mesmeric tastes and singing,
What are they to the fearful ills from Speculation springing.

My husband, once he was so gay, but he's so altered now,
He looks as if he bore the weight of Nations on his brow,
I had but note his countenance, th' expression there will tell,
Without my ever asking him, if things are going on well.

His head seems quite bewildered, 'twas but the other day
Instead of Boys, he bid me send "the Glo'sters' out to play;"
And when I asked for dinner, would he like beef-soup or fish?
He said, "My love, some Exeters, or any shares you wish."

To watch him with the newspaper, a terror 'tis to me,
He reads, and mutters, "Sheffield's up, and Midland's down, I see,"
"Great Westerns', what a rise they've made, oh, had I kept that lot,
On an advance like this, I should, two thousand pounds have got."

'Twas only yesterday I asked new covering for the hall;
He turn'd and said, "The woman's mad, and there's been such a fall—
A diff'rence of five hundred pounds, to me, on what they cost."
'Tis strange, I never hear of gains, but only what he's lost.

But then if things are going well he is so pleased and kind,
And answers yes to all the wants my memory can find;
A silver urn, a ten-pound note, my girls new frocks to get;
But, somehow, things are sure to change, and I've not had them yet.

Again, he knows so queer a set, 'tis seldom "How d'ye do,"
But, "Well, Sir, shares are looking up—in Dovers nothing new—
Good time to buy South Westerns, now they've had a little fall;
Perhaps should you near my office pass, you will give me a call."

I really hate the name of shares, and railroads I detest,
For dabbling in these ruinous things destroys my husband's rest;
Tantalus like, he thirsts for gold, which when within his grasp,
Eludes the touch, and for a time the happy chance is past.

Of all the ills which break man's rest, and causes anxious thought,
Oh! none are equal to those cares by Speculation wrought;
It ruins the peace, disturbs the mind, unfits for social life;
In fact, with every evil known, is Speculation rife.

I'm sure the time is fully come, when wives may now complain,
And raise their voice against this love of striving after gain.
A Christian land no more is ours, when gambling is become A settled trade, and brings its woes in every happy home.

THE WAR IN KOLAPORE.

HILL FORTS OF POWANGHUR AND PUNALLA.

By the last India Mail was received the interesting intelligence of the capture by the European and Native troops, of the strong Hill Forts of Powanghur and Punalla, near the town of Kolapore, in the southern Mahratta country. Both of these forts were occupied by a large body of insurgent Ghudkurrees and Sebundies, belonging to the Kolapore state; and their capture has put an end to the disturbances which existed in this district at the time of the departure of the previous mail. The results of the action are thus summarily given:—

"The celebrated fortresses of Punalla and Powanghur, which lie to the north of the town of Kolapore, at a distance of about fifteen miles, were captured in a most gallant manner on the 1st of December, by the force under the command of General Delamotte. The only remarkable casualty was the death of Colonel Hicks of the Bombay army, who had one of his legs shattered by a cannon ball, which passed through his horse and injured the other leg. He died within a few hours. This occurred at the taking possession of the little town, at the foot of the rock fortress.

DISTANT VIEW OF POWANGHUR AND PUNALLA.

The capture of Punalla, which was looked upon in that country as being impregnable, has tended to bring about the submission of the inhabitants, who prefer now to rely on the mercy of the British authorities rather than attempt making a fruitless resistance even in their best forts. Colonels Outram and Orans have been both removed from Kolapore, and Captain Douglas Graham, an officer of great promise, has been despatched by the Bombay Government thither for the purpose of co-operating with Mr. Reeves, the Political Commissioner, in introducing a system of peace and good government into these districts. There apppears to be a wanton tyranny practised by the Ministers of the Rajah of Kolapore, which has driven his subjects into rebellion, and renders the removal of the Rajah, his Ministers, and his system, a matter of political utility.

Colonel Orans, who had been a prisoner during some days in Punalla, was voluntarily liberated by the inhabitants two days before that fortress was attacked. They had hoped to obtain favourable terms by his liberation.

By aid of two obliging correspondents, one of whom dates from Kirkee, near Poona, we are enabled to present to our readers accurate sketches of the localities of this decisive action. The following are the details of the operations from General Delamotte's despatch from head-quarters, Camp before Punalla:—

"The breaching battery having opened on the morning of the 1st, within 350 yards of the walls of Punalla, which in two hours began to progress rapidly, I was convinced that a practicable breach would be effected in sufficient time to carry the place by storm with sufficient daylight to enable precautionary measures to be taken to prevent the escape of the insurgents during the night. I therefore ordered the storming party to be held in readiness under Lieutenant Colonel Brough, who had urgently solicited to command it (200 of his own men composing the assaulting column), which I readily assented to. About four P.M. the breach was reported practicable, when I immediately ordered the advance from the breaching battery. They were covered by the field pieces and mortars most judiciously arranged to keep down the fire of the enemy, which was most efficiently carried into execution by Lieutenant-Colonel Lloyd, commanding the artillery.

"The difficulty of reaching the walls was very great, from the rugged and steep ascent, which led to a ledge or path by which they were obliged to proceed, flanked by a very heavy fire from the walls, and large stones hurled down upon them as they advanced, which they did in a most gallant manner to the breach. Among the first and foremost I noticed Lieutenant-Colonel Brough, Lieutenant Graham, and the gallant Lieutenant-Colonel Outram, C. B. (Major Peat, C. B., when at the head of the storming party, being temporarily disabled by a stone), Lieutenant Mardall and some riflemen, who I had observed had got close under the walls from the gateway side, after which I could not discriminate individuals. About half the storming party had entered the breach, when the reserve advanced under Lieutenant-Colonel Wallace, who, seeing the difficulty of the ascent and time taken by the storming party, inclined to the right by a much easier route up a road which led to the gateway, whence the breach was reached.

"In about an hour the place was entirely in our possession, and every precautionary measure taken to prevent the escape of any of the insurgents during the night; but no correct information could be obtained regarding Babajee Ahirakur, the leader of the rebels; the following morning the bodies of Babaje Ahirakur and Appa Manga, the former the chief and the latter one of the principal leaders of the rebel Sebundies, were found among the slain. Upwards of 2000 prisoners have been taken; two of the most important are Babajee Saloonker and Luximon Naik Jaddow, also the Killadars (Havildars) of Punalla and Powanghur.

"The difficulty of closely investing these two forts has been very great, from the magnitude and extent of the place; but many obstacles were overcome by the storm and taking of the north pettah by the 3rd brigade, under the late much to be lamented Lieutenant-Colonel Hicks, who was killed on that occasion; Lieutenant-Colonel Poole, C.B., her Majesty's 22nd Regiment; and, subsequently, Lieutenant-Colonel Harvey, her Majesty's 14th Dragoons, who succeeded to the command of the 3rd brigade; the vigilance of that brigade throughout the siege contributed greatly to our success."

"I beg to conclude with a short account of our progress from Budderghur. From the base of the hill we marched on the 20th of November, a distance of 47 miles 6 furlongs, to our present position. At daylight on the 1st of December the guns were in position at 350 yards, and at four o'clock P.M. the place was carried by assault—a place regarding which, in an extract from a confidential letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Welsh in 1827, to Lieutenant-Colonel Hardy, the Quartermaster-General of the Bombay army, who was well acquainted with the fort of Punalla, the former states, 'With my present knowledge, however, of the only defects, I would undertake to capture it in two or three months, by excessive, but certain labour; it is a Gibraltar on the Neilgherries.'"

WESTERN GATE OF POWANGHUR.

The reports relate several instances of British intrepidity, in addition to those above mentioned. Thus, Major Gilland, an old and gallant officer in command of the Queen's, rose from his sick-bed to lead his regiment, and was carried up the steep ascent and breach by his men.

The conduct of both officers and men of the whole detachment, European and Native, who were constantly intermixed, was characterised by the greatest coolness and intrepidity throughout the day, under a very heavy and almost incessant fire of all arms; the fatigue and exertions required of them (which were much increased by the nature of the ground) during 10 hours being borne with the utmost cheerfulness, though much exhausted, not having partaken of food from the previous evening.

The killed and wounded, considering the extent of the operations, the strength of the garrison, and the resistance made, it is gratifying to state, are few. On the victors entering one of the forts, there was not a man, woman, or child found within it, only a few of the killed of the enemy.

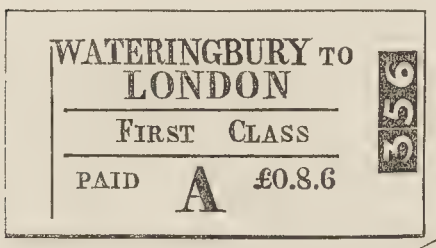
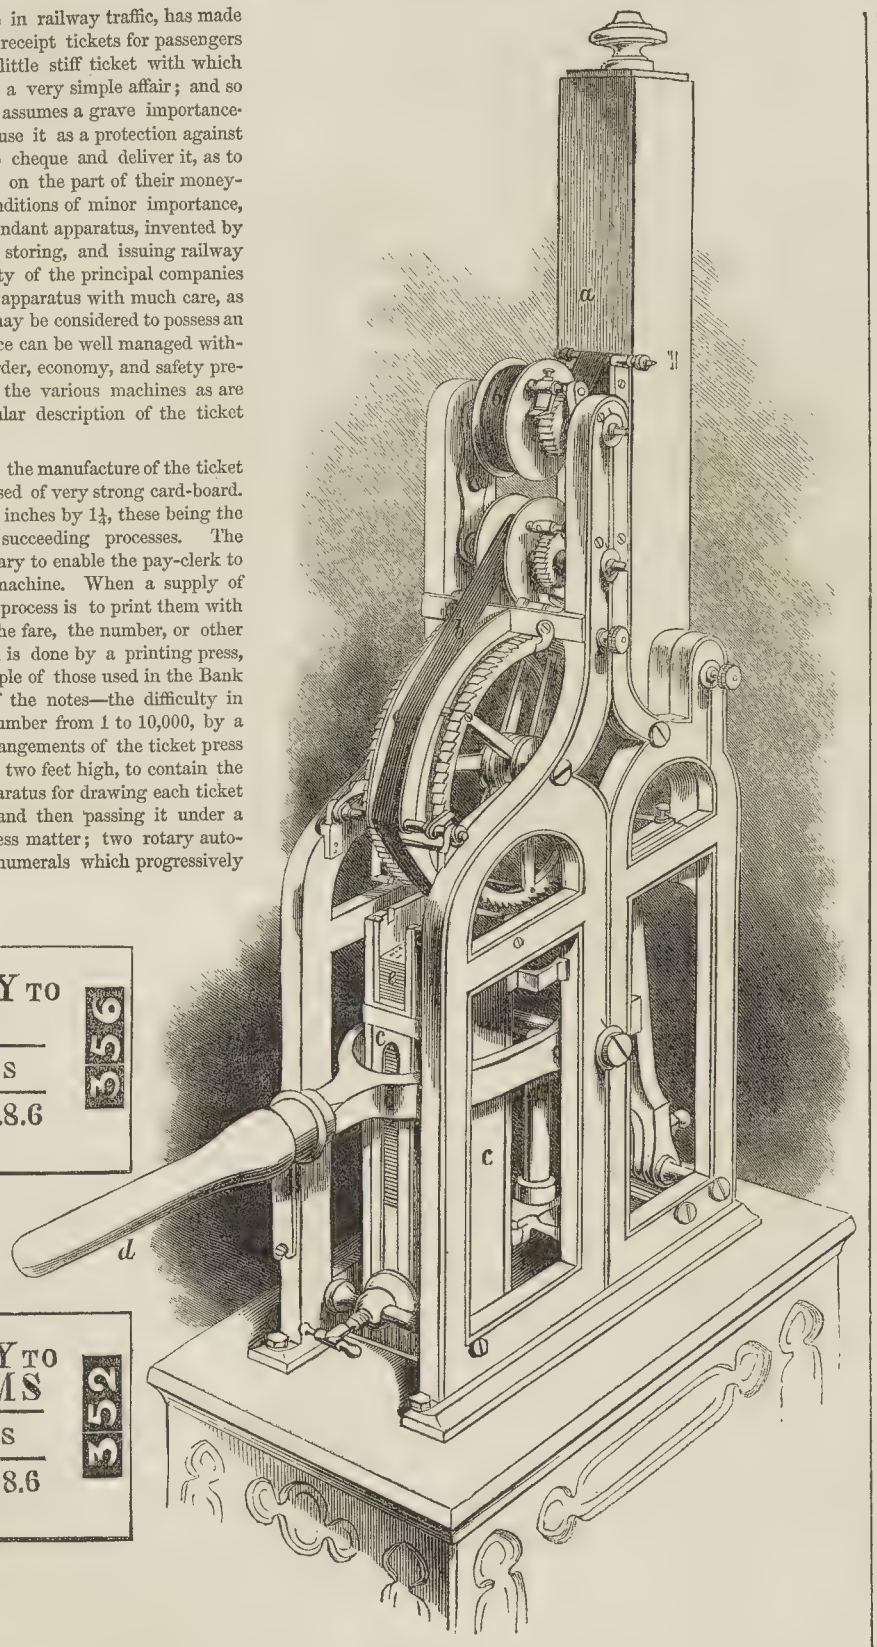
HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE EARL OF LIVERPOOL.—On Saturday last, her Majesty and Prince Albert paid a visit to the Earl of Liverpool, at his seat, Buxted Park, about 19 miles from Brighton, between Uckfield and Maresfield. The Queen and his Royal Highness rode in a close carriage, preceded by outriders, but without any escort. At the White Hart, Lewes, where her Majesty was to change horses, the inhabitants had collected in great numbers; all the windows in the High-street, down which her Majesty was to pass, were thronged with ladies, and the hotel and some other houses were decorated with flags. Her Majesty arrived at Lewes at half-past 12, and was received with loyal greetings from the inhabitants. At the entrance of Uckfield, a triumphal arch of evergreens had been constructed by the inhabitants, who also turned out to receive their Sovereign with manifestations of loyalty. Thence to Buxted her Majesty and Prince Albert were escorted by the Earl of Liverpool. After partaking of lunch her Majesty and the Royal party, were shown over the mansion, and at 3 o'clock took their departure for Brighton, and reached the Pavilion about half-past 5 o'clock. Sir Robert Peel arrived at the Palace in the evening, and had audience of her Majesty.



DISSOLUTION OF THE CAMDEN SOCIETY.—CAMBRIDGE, Feb. 15.—The sensation produced throughout this University on the news of Mr. Ward's degradation at Oxford was nothing to that which followed it in quick succession yesterday, in consequence of the announcement that the Camden Society, which had been going on so flourishingly, and could boast of such ample funds and so many high and distinguished members, had dissolved itself on the previous evening. It had been rumoured some days previously that such an event might be expected, in consequence of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust's decision given in the case of the stone altar erected in the Round Church in this town by the Society.

TOTTENHAM CHURCH.—The innovations attempted to be introduced into this church have been abandoned.



RAILWAY TICKET MACHINERY.

The vast increase which has taken place in railway traffic, has made the preparation and management of the receipt tickets for passengers an operation of extreme difficulty. The little stiff ticket with which we have become so familiar, is, apparently, a very simple affair; and so it is in itself, but, in its official relations, it assumes a grave importance. Not only have the railway companies to use it as a protection against dishonest passengers, but they have so to cheque and deliver it, as to defend themselves against loss by fraud on the part of their money-takers and clerks. These, and many conditions of minor importance, have been accomplished in a series of dependant apparatus, invented by Mr. Thomas Edmondson, for the printing, storing, and issuing railway tickets, and which are now in use by thirty of the principal companies in the kingdom. We have examined the apparatus with much care, as in the present aspect of railway affairs it may be considered to possess an interest for the whole world: no pay-office can be well managed without it; and in offices where it is used, order, economy, and safety prevail. Our cuts exhibit such portions of the various machines as are necessary for making the following popular description of the ticket system intelligible.

The first thing which claims attention, is the manufacture of the ticket itself, which our readers are aware is composed of very strong card-board. This is cut by a machine to the size of 2¼ inches by 1¼, these being the dimensions suited to the printing and succeeding processes. The strength and stiffness of the card is necessary to enable the pay-clerk to push it endwise into the date-printing machine. When a supply of blank tickets has been prepared, the next process is to print them with the name of a station, class of carriage, the fare, the number, or other regulation marks of the company, which is done by a printing press, constructed in some respects on the principle of those used in the Bank of England for printing the numbers of the notes—the difficulty in both cases being to print a consecutive number from 1 to 10,000, by a self-acting machine. The mechanical arrangements of the ticket press consist in an upright columnar tube, about two feet high, to contain the blank tickets to be printed; a feeding apparatus for drawing each ticket from the bottom of the tube separately, and then passing it under a "form" of type for printing the letter-press matter; two rotary automatic wheels, bearing on their edges the numerals which progressively change a figure after each impression, to form the number which appears on the end of the tickets; a set of ratchet wheels and pulls suitably adjusted for altering the wheels bearing the figures, as the progressive number of the ticket requires; a travelling, or "endless" band, previously saturated with ink for the purpose of inking the type and wheels, and a pressure table for giving the impression. The whole of this very beautiful apparatus is worked by a hand-lever, printing at every stroke a ticket bearing a consecutive number, and discharging it in a receiver below. As sufficient supplies of each description of tickets are printed, they are placed under the care of a responsible person, in the drawer of a cabinet divided into stations, and first, second, and third class compartments, to be kept as a stock in readiness to supply the booking clerks with such as may, from time to time, be required. This machine is capable of completing two hundred tickets per minute.

Another small machine is also employed, for the purpose of checking, with greater facility, the consecutive numbers on the tickets, and of counting them, on their being forwarded to the booking clerks. These clerks are debited with every supply of tickets, in a book ruled in proper form; and daily returns of the issues are made by them, and forwarded to the check office, with the tickets that may have been collected from passengers alighting at each of the respective stations; which returns are properly checked off, and accounted for by the clerk appointed for that purpose. Other concise arrangements of accounts are constituted in the system, which are adapted to the passenger department of any railway.

The booking-counter of a station is fitted up with a nest of drawers, divided into compartments, for the purpose of keeping the stock of each description of tickets distinct, and which are properly labelled. In connection with this cabinet, a smaller one, for the retail stock—the tickets actually under issue—stands on the counter, immediately before the booking clerk. This cabinet consists of a series of upright shafts, in which the piles of tickets for the respective stations are placed; at the bottom of each of these shafts an aperture, and a partial opening of the bottom of the shaft is so arranged, that by the application of a finger tip, a single ticket may, at the demand of a traveller, be instantaneously withdrawn. Each of these shafts has an index at bottom, which the clerk raises on first taking a ticket, and leaves it raised, as a notification to the check-clerk that a ticket has been taken from that column, which saves him the trouble of counting the tickets of a column from which none had been sold. In front of the withdrawing apertures of this cabinet, on the edge of the board which forms its base, a slip of slate is fixed, and on this, at the commencement of business in the morning, the clerk writes opposite the shaft from which he for the first time that day withdraws a ticket, the number, in order that the check-clerk, by a comparison of such number with the number of the bottom ticket of the pile remaining unsold, may at once ascertain the quantity of tickets removed, and compare it with the cash received. A further check on all parties is provided in the printing press, to which we alluded above, for printing the date on the tickets as they are issued to passengers.

PAY OFFICE DATE PRINTING MACHINE.

The apparatus we have described was first perfected on the Manchester and Leeds Railway, and by it, such is the simple, comprehensive, and certain character of its arrangements, that with a single set of the machines, any extent of traffic, or any number of stations on a railway, may be supplied.

PROJECTED RAILWAYS.

Railway Department, Board of Trade, Whitehall, Feb. 18, 1845.

Notice is hereby given, that the Board constituted by the Minute of the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, for the transaction of railway business, having had under consideration the following schemes, for extending railway communication in Scotland, viz.:—The Clydesdale Junction Railway, the Caledonian, the Edinburgh and Glasgow—Stirling Branch, the Edinburgh and Hawick, the Glasgow, Dumfries, and Carlisle, the Scottish Central; have determined on reporting to Parliament in favour of the Clydesdale Junction, Caledonian, Edinburgh and Hawick, the Scottish Central; and against the Edinburgh and Glasgow—Stirling Branch, Glasgow, Dumfries, and Carlisle. DEATH OF THE NIECE OF SIR ROBERT PEEL.—We regret to state that a letter from Malta mentions the death of Mrs. Bonham, the lady of the British Consul at Tabrez, and the niece of the Premier, whose family thus sustains a second domestic calamity within a short period.

LEWES ELECTION.—The withdrawal of Mr. G. B. Kemp from the field on Saturday evening, dispossessed this election of all interest. The consequence was, the re-election on Monday of the Hon. H. Fitzroy (a Lord of the Admiralty) without opposition.

RESTORATION OF THE PORTLAND VASE.—The public and connoisseurs will learn with sincere gratification, that this invaluable relic of antiquity, although so seriously fractured and mutilated, is considered by Sir Henry Ellis to be capable, to a certain extent, of restoration, so as still to remain extant in shape for the admiration of the world of art. At a recent meeting of the Society of Antiquaries, Mr. Windus, addressing the members on the subject, said in reference:—"It was but too true that nothing could restore to them the vase itself; but genuine copies had fortunately been made. The late Mr. Pichler, the eminent engraver of gems, struck with its extreme beauty, moulded the vase at Rome. This mould was put into the hands of Mr. Tassie, and after a certain number (only a few) of casts were made, it was destroyed. A few of these casts are extant. The Marquis of Exeter, Mr. A. Pellatt, and he himself (Mr. Windus) possess copies. Sir Henry Ellis stated that the British Museum had also one of these copies, which would, as early as possible, be exhibited to the public. The vase, by Wedgewood, it appears, is only a modern copy, and not cast from the original. Sir Henry Ellis also stated that the vase had not sustained so much injury as was expected; that the principal figures were preserved, and two persons, named Doubleday and Buldock, employed in the museum, would be able to put it together again.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"L. H."—The Duke of Wellington sits in the House of Lords as Duke. He never took his seat by any other rank, though he was successively created Viscount, Earl, and Marquis; during the years he bore these titles he was absent in the Peninsula, and when he at last took his seat in the House of Peers as the Duke of Wellington, all the patents were read together. There are several other Dukes who sit as such besides those of the Blood Royal. For full information respecting the House of Peers, our correspondent is referred to "Dodd's Parliamentary Companion," and the work of the same writer on "Precedence and Privilege."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1845.

THE Budget has, of course, been the principal topic of discussion in the House, and conversation out of it, during the week. The details have afforded great satisfaction, as the changes all tend to give a stimulus to industry, and produce what the people most want—employment. The removal of the duties on the import of raw materials of manufacture are of this nature. The duty on cotton-wool, slight as it was, acted as an injury to our trade, particularly as it fell heaviest on the coarser fabrics in which the most material was consumed. The abolition of the duties on exports is a most beneficial measure and rests on a sound principle; they were not productive, entailed great labour on the Customs' department, and restricted industry in a vexatious manner. The four hundred and thirty articles that have totally disappeared from the tariff—the Custom-house officials knowing their place no more—are many of them insignificant and "remote from use"; Sir Robert Peel refrained from reading the list lest he should "excite the laughter of the House." But they are all required, more or less, for some purpose or other, and as they produced little to the Revenue, there was the less reason for taxing them. Indirectly, the beneficial effect of the change will be felt by trade in many different ways. But the greatest alteration, the one of which the good effect will be the most distinctly visible, is the removal of the excise on glass. This beautiful manufacture is one of those on which the Excise laws and regulations have weighed like an incubus; no improvement, no change in a process could be made without a law-created difficulty; the trade was fettered in a thousand ways, which those only who have had occasion to come into collision with the Excise can comprehend. The Board was a direct police force placed over commerce, and the continual watch it was obliged to keep lest any of its myriad of regulations should be infringed, had the double effect of preventing capital being embarked in trades so restricted, and making it impossible for the capital already engaged in them to be employed to the best advantage. We mentioned this branch of manufacture last week, among others, as one of those which could make the best claim on the Government; after alluding to the soap trade, we remarked:—"The glass and paper makers have almost as much cogency of fact and argument on their side when they advance the same claim to relief; the excise-man's supervision confines every step of the necessary processes to the old path, and with its hands tied by Acts of Parliament and Board orders, modern enterprise cannot freely employ modern science, skill, or discovery, though ever so much disposed to do so." On this point the Premier's statement was almost identical in the opinion expressed. He says:—

We have closely and carefully reviewed the various duties levied by the Excise, and we have viewed in detail the various departments of those duties which press most grievously upon individual interests: but without being bound to admit which of them it is that ought to be removed, we do not hesitate to say that each of them presents a prima facie case against its existence in its present shape.

Glass is the one selected for remission, because the tax is 200 or 300 per cent. on the value of the article, and because, in Sir Robert Peel's own words, "there is no duty which requires, in order that it may be levied, such a system of perpetual and vexatious superintendence." In France, Belgium, and Bohemia, there is no excise on glass, and the consequence is the manufacture there has gained a high degree of perfection, as the beautiful and costly objects to be seen in the shops of the importers of foreign glass abundantly prove. Yet we have greater facilities for carrying on every process in its greatest perfection than either of those countries, and we have no doubt we shall soon exhibit a decided superiority. In an article of such universal use any improvement will be a common benefit. Then the article itself is so brilliant and pure in its appearance, and so clean in use, and is applicable in such countless forms to so many purposes, that it is no wonder there is such a demand for it. It was once a greater rarity than gold and silver. The Emperor Nero is said to have given an enormous sum for two drinking-cups, that, from the description given of them, must have been glass, or a substance resembling it. There is now scarcely a housekeeper in the kingdom who does not possess, as common and ordinary articles, vessels perhaps superior to those which the luxurious Roman Ruler considered rarities. Another potentate, mentioned in history, dealt with a poor glass-maker in a manner that was more effectual even than our Excise in putting a stop to improvements in the manufacture. The man proved to him that he possessed the secret of making glass malleable, and to secure the world from the mischief such a discovery would cause, the tyrant ordered him to be beheaded! We do not execute our improvers of glass—we merely fine them large sums of money, and subject them to a process called Exchequering; but it is pretty effectual, as appears from the fact that our colonies buy glass largely, better, and cheaper, of other nations, than they can do of us. But, thanks to Sir Robert Peel, these miserable restrictions will be done away with, and in this extensive manufacture, which, by its utility, ministers to the health of the people, by securing light and warmth to their dwellings, and, by its beauty, is prized as an article of decoration and luxury, which is demanded for different causes by all degrees of society, we fully expect to see an immense increase. Were it but for this alteration alone, the Budget of 1845 would be valuable above all its predecessors. If we are to have the Income-tax, it becomes more supportable, if in principle not less objectionable, by such changes as these.

Two nights have been occupied in debating the resolution affirming the continuation of the Income-tax. Mr. Roebuck moved an amendment, that would have excluded Income (as distinguished from Property) from the full operation of the tax, and supported his views ably and earnestly. Lord John Russell, and the whole Opposition, joined in one chorus of denunciation of the "odious and inquisitorial impost," as they called it. But in all their fault-finding, there seemed to be an arriere pensée, a fore-casting for the period, when it is possible if not probable that the present outs may be the ins, when the denouncers of the tax in theory may find it (indeed Sir Robert Peel more than hinted as much) very convenient in practice. Hence, on the test of a division being applied, nearly every one who had spoke against the tax, voted for it in its unmitigated form! Only 55 members, about a tenth of the whole House, supported Mr. Roebuck's proposition. Most properly did he keenly reproach them with this inconsistency, but it is almost hopeless for any single member, however able, to commence a movement to which both the great political parties are opposed. They are like the upper and nether millstones, and grind to nothingness all that comes between them. On the second night of the discussion Mr. Roebuck moved another amendment for extending the operation of the tax to Ireland, but this met with less favour even than his former proposition; it was lost by a majority against it of 242. On the next question, which was the affirming of the resolution proposing the Income-tax, only 30 members recorded their vote against it, and it was imposed on the nation for another three years by 228 voices, the absolute majority in its favour being 198. Sir Robert Peel is as strong in the support of his opponents as of his friends.

THE unfortunate transactions connected with the Post-office have again been brought forward in Parliament, with even better information and more distinct proof of the extent to which the Government aided a foreign power in drawing within its grasp some misguided men, who were led into an act of rebellion by a paid agent of that Government itself! Such detestable treachery is absolutely sickening, but it is in perfect accordance with the system on which the Italian states of Austria are ruled. It is in vain sought to conceal the main fact, that, in consequence of information procured through the English Post-office, sufficient intimation was given to the foreign power to enable it to act with its accustomed cunning and vindictiveness. No names may have been given, nothing direct may have been stated of anybody actually within the power of that Government at that time; but a mere hint is enough to set the secret agents of such a state at work, and they were not long before they got the victims they had marked out in their clutches, and then a discharge of musketry soon settled all. All exiles in England are closely enough watched by the agents of the despots who have banished them. Russia keeps a sleepless eye on the Poles, and Austria watches the Italians. To the miserable spies of these powers let it be left to do the base work by which they infamously earn their bread; but let not one of the most important of our Government establishments degrade itself to being their aider and abettor in the task of treachery. By doing so, it actually becomes the tool of these tools. For instance, every effort was made by some of the Russian agents to earn a character for zeal and vigilance during the visit of the Emperor. They more than hinted plots and projects of assassination; the English Post-office was of course obsequiously placed at their service; various letters were opened, merely with the result of finding—nothing. Thus was the Executive hoaxed; but the end was gained. It is asserted that the agents were taken into pay and sent to Russia or Poland, as the reward of their activity in discovering what never existed. If necessary for the safety of our own State, and the preservation of the public peace, let the power be used; but to make it a detective means in the hands of any other country—to convert the noble establishment at St. Martin's-le-Grand into a mere department of the police-office of Vienna—is to court the very depth of national dishonour.

THE Committee of the Board of Trade, appointed to inquire into the merits of Railway schemes, has not quite answered. There is an impression of failure abroad about it. First, its decisions were to be the be-all and the end-all of projectors of lines, and now it turns out that they are decisions that decide nothing; they are only "preliminary investigations," which do not bind the House of Commons one jot. Then it has been the subject of a damaging discussion, involving points personally affecting some of the members, or connections of the members of it. As their report was supposed to be worth something when in favour of a line, its appearance naturally affected the share market, and, somehow or other, some most happy guesses were made about those reports, by which large sums of money were made in that market. We say guesses, because there is no proof of any information having escaped from the Board directly, but the guesses were so like certainty, that it is not unnatural they were suspected of being founded on something stronger than surmise. On such matters as this, the mere necessity for, or the fact of, discussion, has a bad effect; however good the defence, there is a disagreeable impression left behind. But the declaration publicly made, that the decisions of this Board do not at all bind the House of Commons, and the determination of many companies to proceed there against its decision, have much lessened its importance, and the growing feeling with respect to it is, that its reports will soon be without any influence whatever.

THE MONSTER BELL FOR YORK MINSTER.

(To the Editor.)

In your account of the new bell lately cast for York Minster, you state its weight to be seven tons greater than Tom of Oxford, and five than Tom of Lincoln. There surely must be some great mistake here; Great Tom of Oxford weighs 18,000lbs., i.e., eight tons and upwards; the old bell at Lincoln weighed 9894lbs. The new cast was to be 12,000lbs., i.e., five tons and about seven cwt. The great bell of St. Paul's is still less, being 11,470lbs. According to the dimensions you give of the new York bell, it is impossible that it can weigh so much as you represent, viz., 33,680lbs., which it must do if seven tons heavier than the Oxford bell; while its weight will be 23,200lbs., if five tons heavier than the Lincoln bell. This latter weight, indeed, is more likely to be nearer the truth, according to the respective dimensions of Great Tom of Oxford, and the Great Peter, as given by you, viz.:—

Great Tom—7 ft. 1 in. diameter across the brim.
5 ft. 9 in. height.
6 in. thickness of striking place.
Great Peter—8 ft. 4 in. diameter.
8 ft. height.
7 in. thickness of sounding-bow.

I should state that the Great Tom of Oxford, is generally considered to be disproportionately thick for its other dimensions; this will be apparent when we contrast the size of St. Paul's bell with it, in respect to weight; the latter is upwards of nine feet, some accounts state ten feet, in diameter, whereas its weight is only 11,470lbs; the disproportion in this latter case is still greater, though in an opposite direction.—Great Tom of Oxford, according to the usual scale, ought to be seven feet in height, and seven feet six inches in diameter; while St. Paul's, in order to correspond with its diameter, &c., ought to weight at least 25,000lbs. I suppose, therefore, this new bell for York Minster to weigh somewhere between nine and ten tons—a fine bell, indeed, and beautifully represented in your columns, but not quite so heavy as you have said.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

BRIGHTON, Sunday.—Her Majesty and the Princess Royal took a carriage airing. His Royal Highness Prince Albert walked out, accompanied by the Hon. G. E. Anson. The Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and Princess Alice, were taken for a carriage airing on the Cliffs. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the Royal suite and household, attended divine worship in the Pavilion. The Archdeacon Wilberforce was the officiating minister. In the afternoon, her Majesty took one or two turns on the Marine-parade, and along the King's-road, and returned to the palace about four o'clock.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and the Princess Royal, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton and Colonel Buckley, the latter on horseback, took a carriage airing on the Cliffs. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Hon. G. E. Anson, walked out on the Cliffs. His Royal Highness drove her Majesty out in the afternoon in her pony phaeton on the Cliffs. The Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice were taken out for a carriage airing this morning, and afterwards on the Chain Pier, where their Royal Highnesses walked for some time.

TUESDAY.—Her Majesty went out this morning, between nine and ten o'clock, in an open barouche, with the Princess Royal, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton. The Queen was very plainly dressed, and wore a white straw bonnet. She rode up the Cliff as far as Kemp Town, and then westward to Brunswick-terrace, and back as far as the Chain Pier. Her Majesty did not alight, but returned to the Palace about half-past ten o'clock, and the Dowager Lady Lyttelton then took the Princess Royal to the Chain Pier, where the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice were enjoying their morning walk. Prince Albert walked on the Cliff with Dr. Prætorius, and in the afternoon he drove her Majesty out in a pony chaise by the sea-side.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert rode to the Chain Pier this morning, when they alighted and walked for some time. Prince Albert drove her Majesty on the Cliffs this afternoon in a pony phaeton. The Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal and the Princess Alice, were taken out for a carriage airing on the Cliffs and also on the Chain Pier.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Orders were received at the Castle this afternoon for the private apartments to be prepared for the reception of the Court by Wednesday, the 19th proximo, on which day her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Royal Family, are expected to arrive at Windsor, for the Easter holidays. H. R. H. the Duchess of Kent gave a dinner party at Frogmore House this evening. Covers were laid for fourteen. The Royal Duchess, accompanied by the Countess of Wratislaw, and attended by Lady Fanny Howard, took a carriage airing, this afternoon, in the Great Park. Her Royal Highness will take her departure from Frogmore House, early in the ensuing week, for Witley Court, Worcestershire, to pay a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, where the Royal Duchess will remain for ten days or a fortnight.

LADY LYNDHURST'S SOIREE.—Lady Lyndhurst held her first soirée for the season on Tuesday evening in George-street, Hanover-square, which was attended by his Excellency the French Ambassador, and a numerous assemblage of the haut ton.

HER MAJESTY'S LEVEES.—The Queen's Levees are about to commence. The first will be held on the 5th of March, and the next on the 12th of March.

ENTERTAINMENT AT STRATHFIELDSAYE.—The Duke of Wellington has issued cards for a grand entertainment to the Judges and members of the Bar on circuit, at Strathfieldsaye, on the 26th instant.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended by Baron Knesebeck, left town on Monday morning for Witley Court, Worcestershire, on a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager.

LADY JOHN RUSSELL.—We regret to hear of the continued indisposition of her ladyship, who has within the last week been compelled to keep her room.

DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF WESTMINSTER.—It is with pain we announce the death of the Marquis of Westminster, which took place at Eaton Hall, near Chester, on Saturday night, after a short illness. The deceased Robert Grosvenor, Marquis of Westminster, Earl Grosvenor, Viscount Belgrave, county Chester, Baron Grosvenor, of Eaton, in the same county, in the peerage of the United Kingdom, and a baronet, was eldest son of the first Earl Grosvenor by Miss Vernon, daughter of Mr. Henry Vernon, of Hilton Park, Staffordshire, grand-daughter maternally of Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford. He was born March 22, 1767. The late marquis succeeded to the title of Earl Grosvenor on the demise of his father, August 5, 1802, and in September, 1831, he was created Marquis of Westminster by Earl Grey. In 1841 he was elected a Knight of the Garter, a vacancy which now becomes in the gift of the Premier. The deceased nobleman is succeeded in his honours and vast estates by Richard Earl Grosvenor, his eldest son, born Jan. 27, 1795, and married Sept. 16, 1819, Lady Elizabeth Mary Leveson Gower, second daughter of the late and sister of the present Duke of Sutherland, by whom he has a numerous family, his eldest son, Viscount Belgrave (now Earl Grosvenor) having been born Oct. 13, 1825. This noble family traces its descent direct from Gilbert Le Grosvenor, who accompanied William the Conqueror to this country from Normandy, and was nephew of Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, so that he was closely related to the Conqueror. The remains of the deceased marquis will be interred on Tuesday next, at Eccleston, a village within a mile of Eaton Hall, where a magnificent family mausoleum has been erected within the last few years.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CABINET COUNCILS.—A Cabinet Conncil was held at two o'clock on Tuesday afternoon at the Foreign Office, which was attended by all the ministers except the Earl of Ripon, who was prevented by indisposition. The council sat two hours. There was also Cabinet Councils on Wednesday and Thursday.

RAILWAY COMMITTEES.—On Monday the railway campaign commenced with the sitting of the sub-committees on standing orders, to whom is committed the preliminary proceedings on Railway Bills, prior to their examination by the select committees of the house. These committees have continued their proceedings during the week, and the rooms have been much crowded by those interested for and against the various lines. Although the duties devolving on the committees and on the companies are chiefly of a routine character, considerable importance is attached to them. Upon the passing through the ordeal of the standing order hinges the future progress of every railway measure. Inadvertence or non-compliance with the strict letter of the provisions, exposes a company to the chance of being thrown over until a future session, and becomes fatal to its further progress.

THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH.—The Reverend Sydney Smith remains, we regret to learn, in a very weak state. Dr. Chalmers and Dr. Holland are in daily attendance on the reverend gentleman, whose continued indisposition at his advanced age (nearly seventy four) is naturally a subject of great anxiety to his family.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.—An unusual attendance of the members of the British Architects' Society was attracted on Monday evening to hear a paper read upon the Sewerage of the Metropolis, by Mr. George Hawkins. The subject excited more than usual interest from its intimate connection with the proposed measures recommended in the (at present unpublished) Report of the Health of Towns Commission. Mr. Hawkins was warmly applauded at the conclusion of the paper, which was highly interesting, upon a subject but little known, although of such deep importance to the health and comfort of the community.

CHARTER-HOUSE SQUARE INFIRMARY.—The third annual meeting of the auxilary society in aid of the above institution, which has been founded by Frederick Salmon, Esq., the eminent surgeon of Broad-street, City, for the cure of diseases of the lower intestines, was held on Wednesday evening last at the Bishopsgate-Ward School, Peter-street, Sun-street; Mr. Deputy Stevenson in the chair. From the report read by the seeretary, Mr. Rice, it appeared that the contributions during the past year paid into the hands of the treasurer, W. T. Copeland, Esq., Alderman, M.P., by the poor but grateful objects of this meritorious institution, in aid of its funds, amounted to £46 10s., which, with former subscriptions since the formation of the society, made an aggregate sum of £183 10s. 6d. The report having been received and adopted, and the thanks of the meeting voted to Alderman Copeland, M.P., for his continued exertions in promoting the welfare of the society, it was moved by Mr. Gwillim, and seconded by Mr. Martin, "That this meeting again renew their feeling of gratitude to Mr. Frederick Salmon, the founder of the Charter-house-square Infirmary, for his benevolent exertions in alleviating the distresses of suffering humanity, for his humane treatment and inestimable skill; and further, that this meeting view with extreme satisfaction the tribute of respect and admiration paid to him during the past year by a large body of influential individuals, in token of their high estimation and admiration of his character." The meeting then, after some routine business, separated.

MR. BENJAMIN WOOD.—We are happy to learn that Mr. B. Wood is now so far improved as to afford a reasonable expectation of his recovery, and that he will be able to resume his parliamentary duties during the present session.

LONDON AND BLACKWALL RAILWAY COMPANY.—On Thursday a half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors was held at the London Tavern. J. N. Daniell, Esq., presided. The report commenced by stating that the directors were gratified in being able to report a considerable improvement in the revenue of the company. The receipts had been £30,433 18s. 9d., and the total expenditure, including interest on debentures, £24,706 10s. 5d.; which, with the balance from last half-year of £1730 5s. 6d., leaves at disposal £7457 13s. 10d., from which the directors recommend the payment of a dividend of 3s. per share (clear of Income-tax), amounting to £7200; the remaining sum, after deducting Income-tax, being carried to the current half year's account. The passenger traffic, as by statement, showed an increase of 510,139 in the numbers carried, and of £3231 5s. 10d. in the receipts, over the corresponding period of the previous year. After the adoption of the report, resolutions in accordance were agreed to.

THE ANTI-CORN LAW LEAGUE.—The League had another demonstration, as it is called, at Covent Garden Theatre, on Wednesday evening. The chairman was Mr. William Brown, the wealthy Liverpool merchant, who, it is said, at one time obtained a loan of nearly £2,000,000 from the Bank of England, on his own personal credit. Messrs. Villiers, Bright, M. Gibson, and other leading free traders were present, and as usual the theatre was crammed. After a speech from Mr. James Wilson, Mr. G. Thompson argued upon the probability that Sir R. Peel would become a convert to the repeal of the Corn Laws. Sir R. Peel, he said, was not a man of whom no hope was to be entertained. The history of his life gave no reason to think that the Premier would abandon power and public influence for the maintenance of any hoary abuse. (Cheers.) Sir Robert was not now with the League, but he only wanted a motive, and that motive the people must generate for him. The right hon. bart. had told them in the House of Commons a great deal about glass balances, but there was one balance that directed all his own thoughts and words, looks and actions. That balance was public opinion, and Sir Robert would come to the League soon, as he could not help it. (A laugh.) Mr. Bright attacked the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Richmond, Sir Edward Knatchbull, and Mr. Stafford O'Brien, and with his speech the demonstration terminated.

THE NEW CONSERVATIVE CLUB-HOUSE.—This splendid edifice, situated in St. James's-street, was opened to the members on Tuesday. The preparations for the event had been in course of completion for the last few weeks. Every portion of the house is stocked with the most costly furniture, and the decorations of each apartment are of the most recherché character. The furniture, in particular, is most attractive, comprising some very curious articles of solid oak and rosewood. Several members, including the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Tenterden, Lord De Lisle, Lord Castlereagh, and many others, were present during the day. Saturday last the building was inspected by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and several members of his suite. The illustrious visitor went through the entire edifice, and expressed his admiration of its style, its decorations, and its splendour.

ILLUMINATED CLOCK AT HYDE PARK.—A new illuminated clock at Hyde-park-corner was lighted for the first time on Sunday night, and had a very pleasing and interesting effect. It is erected on the summit of the gate-keeper's lodge, and is so constructed as to show the time in the high road as well as within the Park.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—The new street from Long-acre to Holborn, forming the continuous line from Waterloo-road to the new Holborn-road, has been named Endell street; and the fine opening which connects High-street, St. Giles's, with Monmouth and St. Andrew-streets, is called Broad-street. The new street connecting Long-acre with Coventry-street is in such a state of forwardness that it is expected to be open for traffic in about a month.

ARTESIAN WELL.—An artesian well is being sunk in Berkeley-square, in lieu of the old pump which has for so many years past supplied the square and its vicinity.

THE WEATHER.—The frost still continues with increased severity. The cold during Tuesday night, Wednesday, and Thursday, was most intense, and was much increased by the keen and piercing wind from the N.E. The thermometer at the Royal Humane Society receiving-house, Hyde Park, was, early on Wednesday morning, down to 26 degrees, but about eight o'clock it rose to 32 degrees (freezing point), at which it still stood at twelve o'clock at noon. Throughout the day the sky was densely charged with clouds, and as the afternoon advanced the frost increased in intensity and the cold became very severe. At eight o'clock on Wednesday evening, the mercury had sunk to twenty-five degrees (seven degrees of frost), with a clear, brilliant sky, the moon and stars shining brightly, and the wind still N.E. The skaters in the parks on Wednesday were very numerous, and with the exception of a few immersions, that were not attended with serious consequences, no accidents occurred,

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE INSOLVENCY OF MR. CHARLES MATHEWS.—At the BANKRUPTCY COURT, on Wednesday, Mr. Charles Mathews again appeared to give explanations respecting claims made by some of his creditors. Mr. Lewis appeared for the insolvent, the trade assignee, and a creditor; Mr. Phinn as counsel to discuss any points which might arise as to the right of proof upon renewed debts; and Mr. Woodruffe as counsel in support of several contested claims. Mr. Phinn admitting having failed to make out a good case against it; the proof of Mr. Silk, the party for whom he appeared, was reduced to £45, the sum due since the insolvency. The next claim investigated was that of Mr. Daniel Levi, for a sum of £460. The claim was made in connection with some discount transactions. Mr. Daniel Levi, dealer in china, of Old-street-road, and Mr. Lawrence Levi, sheriff's officer and wine merchant, of Norfolk-street, Strand, were examined at some length upon this claim. The former stated that he had made several advances to the insolvent, amounting to £700 or £800, at the rate of 60 per cent., or thereabouts—"as much as he could get," in fact. He denied that in this proceeding there had been any co-partnership with Mr. Lawrence Levi. Mr. Lawrence Levi admitted, that on the 12th April, 1843, the day of the alleged advance, he had drawn a check for £300 in favour of Daniel Levi, but swore that it had nothing to do with this transaction. Mr. Commissioner Shepherd asked the insolvent whether, if there were an adjournment, he could rebut the claims made by the Messrs. Levi?—The Insolvent: I do not mean to say that there have not been advances, but I am really glad that this opportunity has been afforded me of ascertaining something of the particulars. There was that mysterious connection between the parties, that I could never make it out; all that I know is, that having received between £500 and £600, and thinking that I have paid them between £700 and £800, I believe I owe them not one farthing. I wish to ascertain how they make me indebted to between £400 and £500. Whether it was Daniel Levi or Lawrence Levi in the business I never knew; they appeared to me to be one individual. If Daniel Levi was angry, Lawrence Levi came to pacify; if Lawrence Levi locked me up, Daniel Levi got me out; so that between the two I did not know where I was. (Laughter.)—It was then arranged that an adjournment should take place, the agreement being that the Levis should produce their books at the next hearing, when the other claims should be entered into.—The dividend was postponed till this question was decided, but an order was made to pay the instalment due to Lord Abercorn upon the security which he had given for the insolvent.—A long adjournment was made, in order to give the insolvent the opportunity of fulfilling certain country engagements into which he had entered, and the non-fulfilment of which would materially interfere with the arrangements he had made for the benefit of his creditors.

DERBY SWEEPS.—An action was tried in the Court of QUEEN'S BENCH on Wednesday, Williams v. Wentworth, which arose out of the famous Running Rein affaia. The plaintiff had drawn that horse at a Derby sweep held at the Hero of Waterloo, Waterloo road, and he had originally brought his action against the landlord, Mr. Okey, for £200, which was the amount that was to go to the person who deew the "first horse." But Mr. Wentworth, who had drawn Orlando at the same sweep, was made by a Judge's order to be the defendant instead of Mr. Okey. It was contended, on the part of the defendant Wentworth, that the horse which was declared the winner (viz., Orlando), must be considered the "first horse."—Lord Denman, in summing up, said parties situated like the plaintiff must abide by what was declared to be the fair issue of the race. Whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to have back the two guineas he had given for his ticket was what he would give no opinion about. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant; but leave was given to Mr. Jervis to move the Court to enter a verdict for the plaintiff.

POLICE.

GOATS SOLD FOR VENISON.—At MARYLEBONE office, on Tuesday, Thomas Wadmore was charged with having stolen a live goat, the property of Mr. Finney, No. 12, South-wharf, Paddington, in whose employ the prisoner had recently been.—William Haines, Millfield-lane, Kentish Town, stated that on Saturday evening last he was in the shop of Mr. White, a butcher, in Stingo-lane, Marylebone, when he saw the prisoner come there with a goat, which he offered to sell for a sovereign. Mr. White ultimately purchased it of him for 14s. and a piece of meat, and he then went away. The name he gave was Thomas Hooper; and he said that he lived at No. 4, Wharf-road.—Mr. Rawlinson: Is the goat here?—Witness: No. sir; I believe it was killed yesterday for the purpose of being sold.—Mr. Rawlinson: Do you mean to be sold as goat's flesh?—Witness: No, sir; as venison.—Mr. Rawlinson here inquired if the "venison" butcher was present? and immediately John White, a jolly-looking man, stepped forward and was sworn.—Mr. Rawlinson: Now, let me hear your story as to how you became possessed of the goat.—White: Your worship, the prisoner spoke to my man outside of the shop, and asked him to buy the goat; it followed him into the shop like a child, and the "gassity" of the animal was raly quite wonderful; he said that his wife had brought it up by hand from a kid, and I at last bought it, and killed it yesterday.—And is it exposed now in your shop for sale?—It is, sir.—As what?—It's sold as venison, sir, and ladies and gentlemen from all parts of London come for venison to my shop.—Mr. Wiggins, inspector of the D division, said that the goat was nearly two years old, and weighed about eight stone; it was a remarkably fine carcase.—Mr. Rawlinson (to White): What price do you sell your "venison," as you call it, at per lb.?—White: Sixpence, your worship; but I can't make venison of it if it's only a goat; we call it "venison," that's all.—The skin, which had been sent to a fellmonger's in the City, as also the horns of the goat, were produced, and identified by Mr. Finney's clerk as having belonged to the animal stolen. The prisoner left Mr. Finney's employ on the day previous to the sale of the goat, which was much attached to him (prisoner), and used to follow him about like a dog.—Mr. Rawlinson, after remarking upon the utter want of feeling on the part of the prisoner, and the man White, towards an animal which had been described as being of so harmless and docile a nature, committed the prisoner for trial.

ATTEMPTED MURDER AND SUICIDE.—At SOUTHWARK Police-Office, on Wednesday, Charles Rockliffe, a publican, in Cross-street, Blackfriars-road, was charged with attempting to destroy himself. The defendant, who appeared to be in a weakly state of health, owing to a deep incision which he inflicted in his throat, was brought up from Guy's Hospital, in which he had been a patient since the 25th ult., and when first taken into the institution he was not expected to survive. Ann Rockliffe, his wife, stated, that on the day mentioned the defendant, who for some time previously was addicted to liquor, evinced great despondency. She endeavoured to soothe him, but he got into a passion with her, and soon afterwards ran up to his bed-room and brought down a razor. He then went to the cellar, where two persons in the house followed him, but he closed the door upon them, and called out for her. She immediately went down, and saw her husband with the razor in his hand, and he tried to pull her into the cellar, but was prevented by one of the men, who dragged her away. Before the men had time to make a rush upon the defendant, he had closed the door of the cellar, in which he was found, in less than a minute afterwards, lying on the ground with his throat cut, and deluged in blood. The wife, in answer to Mr. Cottingham, said that she had been married to the defendant nine years, and that within the last two years he had given himself up to habits of inebriety, and during that period had expended a considerable sum of money. A gentleman who happened to be in defendant's house when he attempted to destroy himself, stated that he had no doubt his object was to have also destroyed his wife. Witness fortunately was present at the door of the cellar at the moment the defendant called his wife down, and attempted to drag her into the place, which was only prevented by witness using the utmost exertions to extricate her. The witness added, that previously to the man cutting his throat, he heard him express his determination to do for his wife.—Mr. Cottingham said that the certificate of the medical man who attended the defendant in the hospital described that his mind was affected by the dissipated course of life he had indulged in. The magistrate then committed him to the county gaol, in default of finding sureties, and directed that he might be received into the infirmary, until his friends procured his admission into a lunatic asylum.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL SCOTTISH ACADEMY.

Edinburgh, Feb 17, 1845.

The nineteenth exhibition of the works of Scottish artists, at the Royal Institution, was opened on Thursday last. When compared with many of its predecessors, it fully exemplifies, from its excellence, that art in Scotland is undergoing a steady progress, not only in skill by its professors, but in appreciation by the public. To expect, however, pictures of a high order in a provincial exhibition is useless; and to judge of them by high standards unjust. From the very nature of things, a collection of first-rate pictures cannot be made from the easels of artists out of London; because, so soon as a painter attains a respectable proficiency, he removes from the limited sphere of his native place to the wider one of the metropolis. Except, therefore, in a few cases, paintings even in so highly intellectual and polished a city as Edinburgh, must be criticised more in reference to the promise they put forth than to the point of artistic attainment which they actually manifest. In pursuance of these views we shall notice the works of the younger and less known Scottish artist first.

In looking at the choice of subjects it is natural to anticipate that in a picturesque country like this, landscape painting should be in the ascendant. Accordingly, we find a large proportion of the pictures devoted to that branch of art. One of the earliest to attract attention is marked No. 13 in the catalogue—"Storm Scene on the Danish Coast, with the Island of Sylt in the distance;" by Macneil Maclean. Of this scene a part of the strand and of the sea occupy the foreground, with some fishermen hauling a boat ashore; On the mainland are trees and a cottage, whilst the island is shadowed forth in the distance dimmed by clouds. The chief merit of this picture is the correct portrayal of motion, created by a storm. The sea dashes onwards to the shore; the costume of the figures, the foliage of the trees, the smoke from a distant cottage, the clouds, are all made to appear under the agitating influence of a strong wind. This artist exhibits several other subjects of more or less merit. Close to this subject is one by another young painter, which deserves honourable mention—"King James Examining the Witches of North Berwick." W. B. Scott. The arrangement of the figures, and the harmony of colour, are its chief merits. Some of the individual figures are also well painted. The expression of a sanctified Puritan near the principal witch is admirably done. No. 107, "The Rescue," a scene from the "Antiquary," by Mungo Burton, is perhaps one of the best specimens of high finish in the whole exhibition. It represents the hero and heroine being rescued from the rapid rise of the tide by the "Bluegown," or beggar. The principal male figure is admirably done; the appropriate expression of his face has not been carried away by elaboration. The only fault which may be hinted is in the general effect, which is much damaged by the inharmonious brightness of the faces. Coming, as they do, against a dark background, they look at a distance like so many spots. This, however, is but a trifling drawback to the numerous excellences of the entire work. No. 161, "Return from Market," by William Shiels, is admirably true to nature. It exhibits the very counterpart of a Scottish homestead. "The Lady of Avenel," by Gourlsy Steele (No. 214), deserves praise, especially for a Scotch hound, which appears in it, and which is most skilfully painted.

We derived great pleasure from examining No. 402, "A Lay of the Last Minstrel," by W. Kennedy; the more so as a first view of it promises little, the composition being far from good and the arrangement of the colours decidedly the reverse. There are, however, "bits" here and there which put forth high promise for the future. The drawing of some of the figures is quite masterly, especially that of the principal group on the left side. There are evidences in this picture from which we augur great things in favour of the painter, when more experience shall have ripened his judgment and corrected his taste respecting the choice and arrangement of colour. Before concluding our remarks on these artists we must not omit to mention with commendation the names of James Ferguson (whose "Scene in the Perthshire Highlands" is an extremely pretty landscape), Arthur Perigal, junior, James Drummond, Robert Innes, E. T. Crawford, &c.

From these artists, who are not so well known as they in all probability will be, ere long, we now pass to the works of those of established reputation, most of whom are Acadamecians or Associates of the Royal Scotish Academy. At the head of this list stands the president Sir William Allan. He exhibits three pictures, in which I see nothing to excite remark. Thos Duncan (an Associate of the Royal Academy of London), has materially increased his fame, already great in Scotland, by a forcible and Rembrandt-like portrait of himself. It is the theme of universal admiration. The likeness is faultless, and the effect finished and masterly. Horatio Mac culloch has an admirable landscape—"Glencoe;" of which it is impossible to speak with sufficient praise. J. Brown has treated the same subject, but more dramatically. His picture is "Glencoe, the morning after the massacre." It is well executed. D. O. Hill (secretary to the Academy), exhibits a beautiful view of "Dunkeld," besides several other landscapes of the highest merit. The brothers Lander (whose works are well known in London), have several pictures of merit.

In the water colour-room, the pictures of Kenneth Macleay are invariably the first sought out, and, as invariably, the most admired. As a miniature painter it would, indeed, be difficult to point to his equal even in London. This year he exhibits a family group of a most interesting character. A quotation from the catalogue will explain its nature:—

"Mr. ———, some years since a merchant in Edinburgh, was assisted whilst here with money to the amount of about a thousand pounds, by a few private friends; which money he lost in business, and received forthwith a full and complete discharge from his creditor friends. On obtaining shortly afterwards, however, a lucrative situation in China, Mr. ——— devoted the first fruits of his better fortune to the repayment, with interest, of the money so lost by his friends; who accepted the principal sum, but immediately resolved to devote the interest thereof to the purchase of a testimonial, to be presented to Mr. ———, as an acknowledgment of his highly honourable and meritorious conduct. This picture of his children, who are at present residing in the vicinity of London, is that Testimonial; to be forwarded to Mr. ———, in Canton, immediately after the close of the present Exhibition."

Mrs. Musgrave (late Miss Heaphy) also exhibits some admirable portraits. That of Miss Faucit is one of the best likenesses of that clever actress which has been taken. Her husband, W. T. Musgrave (late of the Royal Academy of Music), has taken, it appears, to the arts, and the great progress he has made is abundantly testified by his "Sabrina;" an excellent drawing, full of fine feeling, and natural and brilliant colouring. Of the portrait painters in oil, who are highly and justly esteemed, the works of Colvin Smith, and T. W. Gordon, always take the lead. They exhibit a few in the present collection.

Want of space must be our excuse for omitting the names and mention of the works of several artists, who are, by their merits, as much entitled to be named as those we have selected. Let such, however, take their due share of the comprehensive praise, which all who take an interest in art must award, namely, that the present exhibition is most creditable to the artists of, and indicates a high state of art in, Scotland. Of course, our remarks apply to native exhibitors only. We have purposely omitted alluding to the pictures sent from England to adorn the collection. Amongst these are two by Turner, with others by Roberts, Stanfield, Leitch, Fraser, &c.

Our illustration shows the façade of the Royal Institution, surmounted by the Statue of her Majesty; the view also including one corner of Prince's-street Gardens, from the west; and the Scott Monument (now finished), with a portion of Prince's street.

The following appeared only in our late edition of last week.]

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO THE DUKE OF NORFOLK.—On Thursday, at eleven o'clock, her Majesty and Prince Albert left the Palace at Brighton, to lunch with the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk at Arundel Castle. Her Majesty was attended by the Countess of Mount Edgcombe. At a quarter-past twelve the Royal cortège was seen approaching the Marine Hotel, Worthing, when the bells struck up a merry peal, and as soon as the Royal carriage drew up, her Majesty was greeted with the most respectful loyalty. The Duke of Norfolk had arrived previously, for the purpose of accompanying her Majesty to Arundel. Her Majesty conversed freely from the carriage window with the noble duke, who, the moment the horses were put to, proceeded by the side of the Royal carriage on horseback. The Duchess of Norfolk received her Majesty on alighting from the Royal carriage. Twelve of the duke's servants appeared in state liveries of crimson and gold—each suit cost 25 guineas. This visit of her Majesty is preparatory to a three days' visit in the summer. Her Majesty returned to Brighton at a quarter to six to dinner. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert have engaged to take luncheon with the Earl of Liverpool at Broxted Park, near Cuckfield. The noble earl has invited a large circle to the déjeûner to meet his august visitors.

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT.—The Queen and Prince Albert, while on the road to Arundel Castle, on Thursday last, were unconsciously exposed to great danger. The carriage containing her Majesty and Royal Consort had scarcely passed the Norfolk Arms, when the Defiance coach came dashing at a tremendous rate across the road which had just been traversed by the Royal equipage. A minute or two earlier on the part of the coach, or later on the part of the Royal carriage, a collision must have taken place. We regret to add that the horses of the Defiance coach ran into a shed in the stable-yard of the hotel, and the coachman, Dowden, received severe injury. Two passengers also were hurt, but not dangerously.

WILL OF SIR WILLIAM NOTT.—The will of Major General Sir William Nott has been just proved in Doctors' Commons by Dame Rosa W. Nott, widow of the deceased, and one of the executors. It bears date 9th of September, 1843, and the following is a copy:—"In the name of God, amen.—I, William Nott, a Major-General in the Indian army on the Bengal establishment, do make this my last will and testament. First, I give and bequeath to my daughters, Letitia and Charlotte, the sum of 80,000 rupees, to be equally divided between them. Secondly, all other property of whatever kind or description I may die possessed of in excess to the aforesaid 80,000 rupees I leave to my much-loved wife Rosa Wilson; and this, of course, in addition to, and exclusive of, her marriage settlement. I appoint my much-loved wife, Rosa Wilson, and Richard Swinhoe to be my executrix and executor. William Nott (seal)."—The personal property has been sworn under £3000.

Accounts have been received of the death of Sir James Dowling, Chief Justice of New South Wales.

LONDON FEVER HOSPITAL.—Yesterday (Friday) the annual meeting of the Governors of this hospital was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Thomas Everett, Esq., Treasurer, in the chair. The gross receipts, including dividends and £200 from the City of London, amounted to £2365 6s. and the expenditure figured £1823 11s. 11d. The funded property exceeded £3726. The report was adopted, and the Rev. E. Scovell, whose eloquent appeal on behalf of the Hospital last Sunday added £154 6s. 4d. to the fund, was elected Honorary Governor. Thanks were then voted the Chairman, and the meeting adjourned.

RAILWAY COLLISION.—A collision of trains took place on Tuesday night on the Brandling Junction Railway, near the Felling station, but happily none of the passengers were hurt.

AN OLD LADY BURNT TO DEATH.—On Thursday afternoon, some persons observed smoke issuing from the house, No. 4, Orchard-street, North street, Clapham. They entered the house, and, upon opening the door of the front parlour, discovered the occupant, Mrs. Richards, who was upwards of 80 years of age, lying on the floor, with nearly all her clothes burnt off. She was alive, but senseless, and her body was burnt in the most frightful manner. She expired about five o'clock the same evening. It is not known how the fire originated, but the deceased was addicted to smoking, and it is supposed that whilst so indulging herself, some ignited tobacco fell from her pipe and set fire to her clothes.

THE MYSTERIOUS DEATH AT HULL.—We have received a long report from Hull of the final examination, on Thursday, of Thomas Mattocks, the man who was suspected of having murdered his wife and set her on fire. The result of the examination was the discharge of Mattocks.

THE CASE OF THE BARONET'S DAUGHTER CHARGED WITH STEALING. At QUEEN-SQUARE Police-office yesterday, Miss Osborne was again brought up. The counsel (Mr. Clarkson) declined to call any witnesses, as the magistrate (Mr. Burrell) said he had determined to send the matter for trial Recognizances were taken for Miss Osborne's appearance at the sessions, and she left the court in charge of her friends.

FOREIGN.

LATER NEWS FROM THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.—The mail steamer Cambria has arrived, with New York papers to the 31st December. The American House of Representatives, and also the Senate, are busily occupied in discussing the Oregon territory question, and in both houses a bill has been brought in for the actual establishment of a territorial government over that country. In Texas the movements are towards annexation to the United States. The news from Mexico is most important; but there seems to be a doubt as to its correctness in some points. Santa Anna is said to have been defeated and captured by Bravo and Paredes, and some accounts state positively that he has been shot. On a careful examination of the various accounts, we have little doubt but that the news of his defeat will turn out perfectly correct. It is stated that letters from Mexico, dated the 9th ult., arrived at Tampico by express on the night of the 13th, giving the important intelligence that a desperate battle had been fought on the plains of Appan, between Santa Anna on the one side, and Bravo and Paredes on the other, which ended in the total rout of the former, who was captured in trying to make his escape. Five hundred men are reported to be killed, and General Paredes had been despatched by Bravo in pursuit of the routed troops of Santa Anna. Bravo himself was on the march back to Mexico, with his august prisoner.

THE FRENCH MINISTRY.—The French Ministry has been victorious in the preliminary struggle on the Secret Service Money Bill, their eventual success or failure in which is, they themselves formally announce, to decide whether they will remain in office or retire. In the committee appointed to report on the bill the Ministry have a majority of two to one, there being six Ministerial and two Opposition members. The total majority of votes by which this constitution of the committee was accomplished was 33, according to the Ministerial journals, which are probably correct, but only 29, 28, or even 27, according to the accounts given by the Opposition. The Débats, however, argues that this majority in the committee is to be considered as indicating the numbers by which the measure will be supported in the Chamber of Deputies.

THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.—MR. WARD'S CASE.

The decision of Convocation in the case of Mr. Ward was briefly stated in the greater portion of the impression of our Journal of last week.

The members of the University poured into Oxford on Thursday morning in vast numbers, as the hour approached for the meeting of Convocation. A great proportion of those who arrived were men distinguished in public life. Soon after one o'clock, the hour fixed for the meeting of the Convocation, the theatre was filled; and it is calculated that there were not less than between 1200 and 1300 members present, although not more than 1100 voted.

Shortly after one o'clock the Vice-Chancellor, preceded by the bedels, and other officers, and followed by the heads of the University, entered the theatre, and proceeded to his seat. Mr. Ward had previously ascended the "English" rostrum (on the left-hand side of the theatre), from which he was to deliver his defence. Among the distinguished persons who either had seats or stood on the floor, in the body of the theatre, were the Earl of Romney, Lord Faversham, the Earl of Eldon, Lord Kenyon, Lord Ashley, the Bishop of Llandaff, the Bishop of Chichester, Sir Thomas Acland, the Righ Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Archdeacon Manning, the Rev. Dr. Hook, Dr. Pusey, Dr. Buckland, &c. &c.

The Rev. Mr. Oakeley, of Balliol, minister of St. Margaret's Chapel, London, was in the rostrum with Mr. Ward.

After some preliminary business, the Vice-Chancellor opened the proceedings by stating the object for which the Convocation was held; and Dr. Bliss (Registrar) read the passages of Mr. Ward's book ("The Ideal of a Christian Church Considered"), upon which the first proposition to be submitted to the Convocation embodied a condemnation.

The Vice-Chancellor having read the proposition in English, addressed Mr. Ward in Latin, and asked him whether he had anything to say as to the mode in which he wished to deliver his speech. Mr. Ward urged, in reply, that he had received permission to speak in English, which the Vice-Chancellor confirmed; and Mr. Ward rose and commenced his address, which occupied somewhat more than an hour in delivery. Mr. Ward spoke with remarkable rapidity, but at the same time with great calmness and self-possession—with the air of a man, in fact, who felt a deep conviction that he was right. In the early part of his speech he checked some very marked demonstrations of applause made in the theatre, and referred to them as unbecoming the gravity of the occasion, although they might be personally grateful to himself.

Mr. Ward then handed in a Latin protest. Dr. Grant, of New College, then rose to propose this amendment:—

"That the passages now read from the book entitled 'The Ideal of a Christian Church Considered' are worthy of grave censure, but that Convocation declines to express any opinion upon the good faith of the author, or to exercise the functions of an ecclesiastical tribunal, by pronouncing judgment on the nature or degree of his offence."

The Vice-Chancellor informed Dr. Grant that no proposition could be made that had not been previously agreed on by himself and the Hebdomadal Board.

Mr. Denison entered his protest against the whole proceedings, and Mr. Bode, of Christ Church, entered a protest against them, as affecting the right and propriety of the proceedings.

The Vice-Chancellor put the question, when there was a roar and counter-roar of "Placets" and "Non-placets." A scrutiny was then ordered. The numbers turned out afterwards to be—for the proposition, 777; against it, 386. It was, therefore, declared against Mr. Ward.

The Vice-Chancellor announced the result, saying, "Majori parti placet."

The Vice-Chancellor then proposed the second proposition—that for the degradation of Mr. Ward.

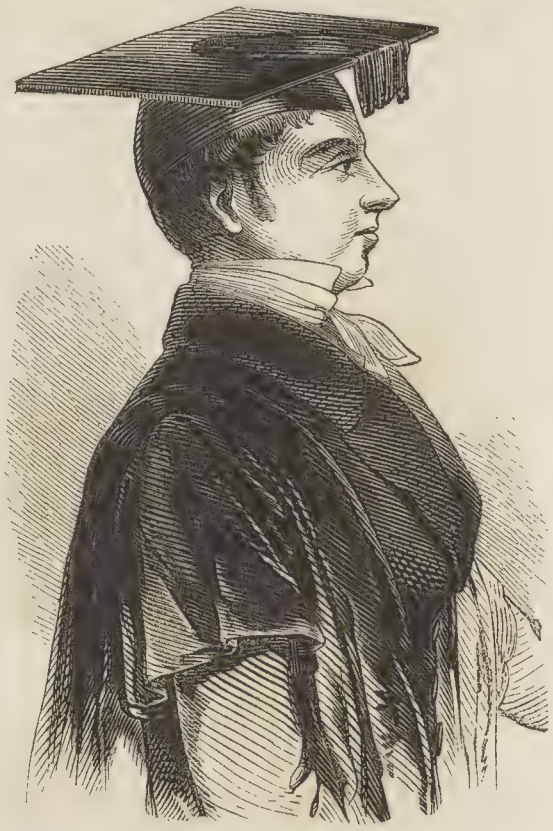
Mr. Ward again addressed the Convocation, also in English. He said, "I have only to say, with respect, to this particular mode of punishment, that for myself, whatever others may think of my opinions, I have shown by my acts and my words that I am most anxious, most desirous, and most ready, I may say, most eagerly desirous and ready, to devote all my energies, such as they may be, and whatever powers of mind or action I may possess, to the service of the Church of England, if I may be allowed. It must at the same time be remembered that certain persons not holding the opinions I hold, have renounced orders and left the Church and have entered into communion with the Church of Rome, and yet have kept their degrees of B.A. and M.A. Therefore it does appear that the proposed proceeding towards me, who have not renounced the Church of England, but am ready to serve it, is harsh when compared with what has been done with them. At the same time, I must ever be thankful for the opportunity afforded me of doing justice to my character and opinions before so many members of a Church towards which I do feel the deepest attachment."

The Vice Chancellor then put it to the vote as before, with the same result.

The Rev. N. Ellison, of Balliol College, addressed the assembly in Latin, in opposition to the motion.

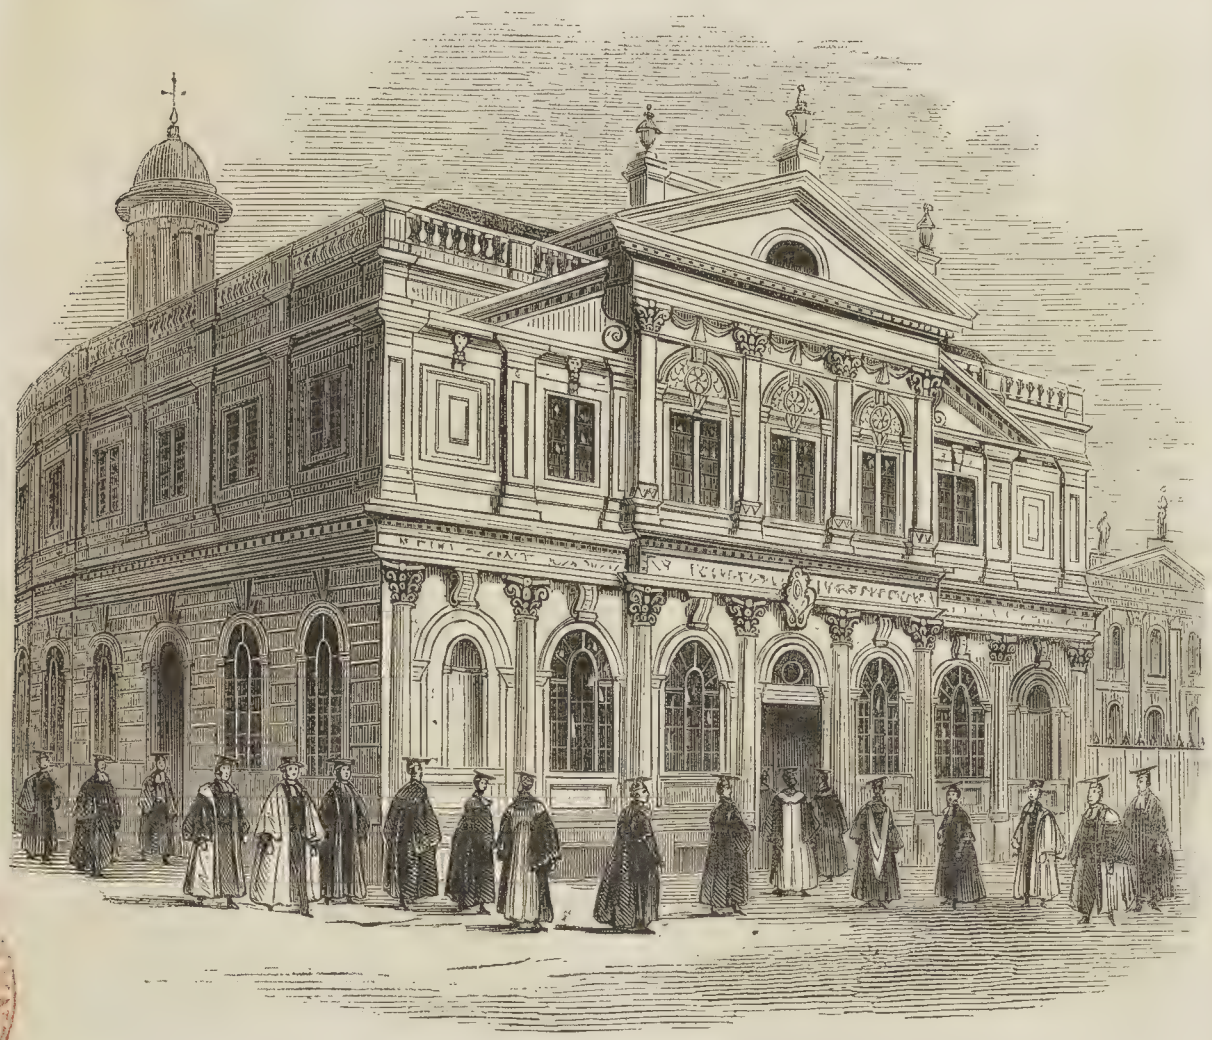
A scrutiny was then taken, after which the Vice-Chancellor declared that the proposition had been affirmed.

The numbers turned out to be—Placets, 569; Non-placets, 511.



The Vice-Chancellor then proposed the third proposition, for the condemnation of Tract 90.

The Senior Proctor rose and said—"Nobis Procuratoribus non placet."



Upon which there was a storm of counter-cheering and hissing for some minutes.

The proceedings then terminated.

As Mr. Ward quitted the theatre, he was cheered by the undergraduates outside. The Vice-Chancellor was saluted most indecorously with hisses from the same source.

MR. WARD, OF BALLIOL.

EXTERIOR OF THE UNIVERSITY THEATRE, OXFORD.

The decision against Mr. Ward on the second proposition could scarcely be said to have been expected. Towards the opening of Convocation, however, the opinion gained ground that Mr. Ward would be defeated.

It should be stated that the Fellows of Balliol voted unanimously in favour of Mr. Ward on both propositions.

An address has been presented to the Proctors, signed by upwards of three hundred names, among which are Mr. Gladstone's, Judge Coleridge's, Dr. Hook's, Archdeacon Manning's, Sir W. Heathcote's, &c., and tendering their thanks for the resolution of the Proctors to negative upon the proposal relating to the 90th Tract, which determination they consider to have been demanded by the principles of the academical constitution.

On the same day, (Thursday), Mr. Ward addressed a letter to the Vice-Chancellor.

There was a general clearance of the non-residents, who left in considerable numbers by the late railway trains and also next morning.

On Friday Mr. Ward doffed his cap and gown, and appeared about Oxford in the ordinary dress. It seems that there is controversy on this point also. The University authorities maintain that Mr. Ward should now wear a scholar's gown, as an undergraduate, and a member of a foundation. On the other hand, his legal advisers are of opinion that the adoption of that dress would be tantamount to an admission, which would, to a certain extent, damage any rights he may urge on the occasion of his appeal to another tribunal. The end is, as has been said, that he goes about in plain black and beaver. It is understood that Mr. Ward will apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus to the University to restore his degrees, which application will be made immediately after the commencement of Easter Term.

There has been no formal ex-official act of deprivation, the simple decree of the Convocation being held to be sufficient, as it takes effect immediately.

Mr. W. G. Gladstone, M.P., was among the Non-placets on both propositions. His cry of "Non placet" in the theatre was observed to be particularly energetic. Mr. Newman did not vote, nor was he present.

Among the Non-placets were Archdeacon Manning, Dr. Hook, Archdeacon Robert Wilberforce, Archdeacon Thorpe, Dr. Grant, the Rev. John Keble, the Rev. John Miller, Dr. Moberly, Dr. Gresley, and Dr. Pusey.

Among the Placets were Archdeacon Samuel Wilberforce, Lord Ashley, Lord Sandon, the Bishops of Llandaff and Chichester.

The exterior façade of this magnificent edifice has been already engraved in our Journal, (See No. 93); and, we now complete its illustration, by the two annexed views of the most novel and striking features of the interior; with a few supplemental specimens of the very ornate character of its enbellishments.

themselves, however, are more spacious than usual, some of them surpassing in size those of the Reform Club-house; and, according to a paper in the "Athenæum," in the extensive and complicated arrangements required for the domestic and operative department, the Conservative may be pronounced the facile princeps of club-houses, or the veritable 'King of Clubs.'

THE UPPER VESTIBULE.

"In the domestic offices in the basement, are introduced all possible appliances, all the latest mechanical inventions and improvements, and apparatus: the kitchen is far more spacious than that of the Reform Club, and so astonishingly light, with the sky seen overhead in some parts of it, that it might be supposed to be at the very top of the house, instead of the bottom. We question, however, if this greater extent will be attended with proportionate advantage in the arrangement—the laying-out, as we may term it—over the celebrated cuisine of the Reformers.

Thus far of the interior, generally. Let us now glance at the taste displayed in the decoration of the principal apartments. Without making too much display in the first instance, the hall is, as a distinct entrance vestibule, more spacious than usual, and of sufficient architectural expression. Not only the columns (Doric), but the flight of steps forming the ascent to the general level of this floor, produce much pleasing effect. One great recommendation in this part of the plan is, that none of the other rooms open into it, as is the case in several of the earlier built club-houses; but, both this and the inner hall must be passed through before they can be reached; consequently, the impression, as to the extent of the building, is all the stronger. Neither does the inner hall fully disclose itself on passing from the first one, there being an intermediate, though not inclosed space, in the plan. Neither, again, does the grand staircase fully display itself from the hall, it being separated from it by three arches, the middle one opening to the first flight of stairs. So far, however, is this partial concealment of that important feature in the interior from being a fault, that it is productive of great play of perspective, and a striking degreee of scenic effect."—(Companion to the Almanac, 1845.) This excellent arrangement is in part shown in the lowermost of our illustrations—the Inner Hall, which is lighted partly from the staircase, but chiefly through the circular opening in its ceiling, and the floor of the Upper Vestibule (in the larger Engraving), corresponding with the dome over the latter, which is, therefore, partly visible, and its ceiling and dome entirely so, from below; yet, the height of the hall beneath it is well defined, whereby it is not rendered disproportionately lofty for the other apartments, as would have been the case had it been thrown open to both floors. This novel and clever arrangement is shown in the two Engravings conjointly; and our artist has so far succeeded in transferring the forms of the decoration, as to leave colour the only desideratum in our illustrations.

The polychromic variety of this portion—a fine specimen of encaustic painting, by Messrs. Sang and Naundorff—baffles our descriptive powers: it presents a most graceful composition of some of the most exquisite beauties of nature, and the most admired forms of classic art; with a profusion of curves and figures, rendered unusually distinct in our illustrations. An ingenious feature of the Inner Hall is shown in the adjoining column—the monogram of the Club (Conservative), which is worked in the tessellated pavement, bordering the central star of marqueterie. We should not omit to mention that the staircase is similarly decorated, and, with the two apartments above described, forms one of the most superb groups of interior architecture in the metropolis. In parting with these illustrations, we need scarcely commend to the reader's admiration the beautiful forms of the arches, or the richly dight soffites, spandrils, and ceilings.

It has, however, been objected that this excess of decoration of the Hall, Staircase, and Vestibule, has been misplaced; seeing that they lead to apartments which are of comparative plainness; whilst the entrance-hall is soberly quiet. In other words it is urged that decoration is herein concentrated injudiciously to a focus, whilst the other portions of the edifice are cold and stately; "the emphasis of decoration" being laid in the wrong place. A similar object may be advanced to the superb hall and arcades of the Reform Club-house in contrast with the generally plain style of the other portions of the mansion, or palazzo.

The apartments of "the Conservative," save in the above comparison, have an air of sumptuousness, arising from their architectural decorations, rich cornices and ceilings, and columns and pilasters. We have selected two specimens—from the coffee-room and drawing-room; and the door of the latter apartment—a meritorious architectural composition. The monograms of the artists, which are introduced throughout the building, complete our illustrations. It appears, that the encaustic painters of Germany form a Christian Association; and, by its rules, each member is compelled to insert the emblem of the cross in his monograms, and to insert the same in his several productions. We may conclude with a summary of the embellishments. The columns are of Scagliola, in imitation of Sienna and other marbles, and of different orders. Those of the morning-room are Ionic; in the coffee-room, Italian; and the Corinthian are employed in the evening-room, the walls and ceiling of which are decorated with encaustic painting. In the library, the square pillars and pilasters have their shafts paneled with green and grey Scagliola, and their capitals bronzed. In the principal rooms of the ground-floor, the doors and other wood fittings are of wainscot-oak; and in the upper ones of Spanish mahogany, except the evening and card rooms, where all the wood fittings are of bird's-eye maple and sycamore. In the library, the book-cases and fittings are of wainscot, with metal enrichments, electrotyped in conformity with the bronzed capitals of the pillars. The fittings and furniture throughout are of the most costly description.

We should remind our readers that this very stately edifice is the joint production of Mr. G. Basevi, junior, architect of the Fitzwilliam Museum, at Cambridge, and of Mr. Sydney Smirke, the architect of the United University Club-house.

EXCISE AND CUSTOMS' REFORM.

From a Correspondent.

Jubilate! Rejoice, and be glad, O World, for thy highest teachers, thy most cunning artists, in all that pertains to man's physical progress, are about to be unshackled. The gyves are about to be torn from the limbs of the giant, and all lands shall ring with the mighty deeds he will achieve. Rejoice, O World! for the strong right hand of England is about to multiply its cunning in the world-winning arts of peace! The Saxon-Celt bids his Heat-Spirit work for all the earth!

Four hundred and thirty various productions useful to man are to be held sacred evermore from Custom-house interference, free to enter our land and to promote brotherhood with their owners. Any of those owners will be henceforth free as ourselves to purchase our raw materials; and most desirable is it that they should have them, if they can make a better use of them than we ourselves can. We may now make the cheapest possible cotton clothing for the whole world; and last, but not least, the magic material, glass, will grow up from the ricketty infancy of its manufacture to an amount of utility hitherto not dreamed of.

Many of our contemporaries pick quarrels with the proposition. They object to the continuance of the Income-tax, to the arrangement of Sugar duties, and to the continuance of the duties on Soap. For our own part we do not dissent from their views, but we think that, of the two, the Excise duties are worse than Custom duties. Moderate Custom duties may be continued without materially impeding trade; but even the smallest Excise duty is almost fatal to progress in manufacture. Glass and Bricks are two articles of the utmost importance in innumerable points of view; and we trust the time is not far distant when builders will be permitted to improve the construction of their buildings by being unfettered in the preparation of their materials. Gladly shall we hail, and we believe at no distant time, the utter abolition of the Excise duties.

And we have no doubt in the matter. The expenses of government do not increase in the same proportion with the increase of population. The members of a railway direction can manage three hundred miles as easily as fifty, and the increase in their executive is not in the proportion to the increase of mileage—and so in a State. We have only one King or Queen, one House of Lords, and one of Commons, one Admiralty, one Horse Guards, and so on. If the expenses do not increase, and the number of workers does continually increase, and those workers be in full employment, it must be obvious that the taxes will every year fall more lightly on each. In this mode, our heaviest expense of all—the National Debt—will sooner or later be paid off; and, grown wiser by experience, we shall be more cautious in contracting such debts. It must be obvious that the money borrowed by a Government from members of a community must be the surplus or hoarded capital of the community, or a part of it, and the money would be better raised in taxes than in loans; and the indisposition to any heavy taxation would be a wholesome check upon wasteful expenditure.

As regards the general principle of taxation, we think the whole question is extremely simple. A certain amount must be collected from the whole community to pay the expenses of transacting the general business of the community. If it be an ignorant community, the amount so raised will be excessive, and it will be wastefully expended for the benefit of the ruling individuals. And in proportion as the community advances in intelligence the State expenditure will be economised and sinecures will diminish. Labourers in government, as in all other things, will be worthy of, and will be paid, their hire; but sham labourers will disappear. Let any one look back at the history of this country, and it will be found that the taxes now paid are smaller in proportion to the means of the community than at any former period. We mean the taxes paid for government expenditure, apart from the interest of the National Debt. And the patience with which this interest has been regularly and honourably paid, even in the most trying times, is only one indication amongst many of the spirit of unchangeable progress. That the people of the United States have been found wanting in this high spirit is the most fearful sign of their non-progress.

We have already alluded to the beneficial effects likely to attend the removal of the restrictions on the manufacture of glass. In our view it will effect an entire revolution in our architecture. Heretofore glass has been almost an article of luxury: it will become an ordinary building material. We see no reason why glass, a composition of silex and soda, should ultimately cost more per pound than cast iron. We have no doubt that it will ultimately become an available and most important material for roofing buildings of sizes not yet contemplated. Iron has of late been applied to roofs of great span, with almost the effect of fairy tracery combined with perfect strength. The time will come when spaces of great extent, varying from one to six acres, will be enclosed by walls fifteen to twenty feet in height, roofed with iron, supported at intervals by columns, and covered by glass of sufficient strength to resist all ordinary hail; such roofs would be more durable than slate. Warmed by a steam apparatus, and properly ventilated, such buildings would give a tropical or temperate climate at pleasure all the year round. Land so enclosed would produce a constant succession of crops, and would supply fruits and vegetables through the whole winter. Nor would such buildings be expensive. An acre might probably be covered complete for about £4000—say three hundred feet by one hundred and fifty.

We can imagine the innumerable uses to which such buildings could be turned. The wealthy man could have an orange grove attached to his study or drawing-room; or he might build it eighteen hundred feet long by fifty wide for riding or walking in. For about twenty-six thousand pounds a ride fifty feet wide and a mile in length might be constructed. An atmosphere of light sheltered from cold, or made cool at pleasure, and the walls covered with vines and fruit trees. No buildings could be better than these, or, we believe, cheaper—regarding efficiency—for farm purposes, yielding shelter, space, and light; and such buildings would also be admirably adapted for invalids requiring warm and dry atmospheres. Apartments of light materials might be erected within them at a small expence, corresponding to cottages, in a summer climate. All that one dreams of the wonders of the Moorish Alhambra might be realised beneath such an artificial sky—fish in fountains, trees in groves, trellised vines, yielding alternate light and shade; green turf, heather couches, mirrors, stained glass, paintings, sculpture, every variety of art and artificial nature, mingling together to produce a perfect whole, with every noxious influence of the natural world removed, whether of insects or gaseous exhalations. With glass of sufficient thickness, and placed at a sufficient height, there would be no risk of breakage.

And, by the use of glass roofs to ordinary buildings, a most important service might be rendered to cities. One portion of the food of plants is the gaseous and other exudations of animal bodies. With a sufficient number of plants placed beneath a glass roof, the air breathed by the inhabitants might be made to ascend to them, and be absorbed. The good effect of this, in a large and densely-peopled city, would be very considerable, to say nothing of the good produced in getting rid of the filthy cock-lofts into which light never penetrates, and in which dirt and soot abound. To set glass and bricks free from their shackles, is to give birth to a new order of architecture, in which the true philosophy of man's dwellings may be fully and fairly developed. We propound nothing impracticable, nothing Utopian; all is as plain as the mills that make clothing by the mile; and we shall be glad to see Manchester—the most ambitious of modern cities—put in practice such a building as we propose, for the winter recreation of her citizens. What a magnificent amphitheatre might be constructed in this mode for the revival of Greek tragedy! A roof of glass would go far towards the realization of an Egean sky. Beneath such a roof we might behold the mimic representations of the deeds of our northern ancestors. We claim no Homer, but the heroes of the Nibelungen Lied might walk the earth once more, to tell to unnumbered multitudes the tales of the olden time. The English people are the descendants of mighty men of old, and the masked semblance of ancient power is amongst the strongest incentives to carry the glory onwards in its new phase of peace. For arms in the old time, for arts in the new. Again we say, "Rejoice, O World, and be glad!"

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

Well, the storm is brewing at last. The leaders of the Ministry and the Opposition have been giving a few parliamentary dinners, and the feeding has greatly strengthened both mind and body for debate. The monkey of the house may now be said to be up, and something really pungent and animated is spat forth with toad-like amiability, and with a due accuracy, in the direction of the poison. When the industrial trades strike, they throw vitriol at the "nobs"—when M.P.s are in hot opposition, they have a little strong acid for the fair complexion of a Minister. And now and then it has a good effect, and washes away sores and blotches and eruptions such as offend the public eye, and do not speak well for the placeman's Constitution. Now we have had this week a very keen encounter of acerbity between the "Ins" and the "Outs"—a good hearty raging battle, with sharpshooting quicker and thicker than the utterance of Mr. Charles Mathews in a railroad farce. We once heard cowardice imputed to the Whigs, in their hesitation to strike O'Connell.

As tho' each Whig did like Achilles feel
And feared to catch the arrow in the heel!

But this time the part of Achilles had no heel-terror about it—but was played off boldly, by a very manly and straight-forward Radical, against a would-be Conservative Home Secretary. Sir James Graham, however, is not quite so good a Trojan as was Hector, and we do not think that society felt much compunction, when Mr. Duncombe tied him to a mail carriage, and dragged his carcase from the citadel of St. Martin's-le-Grand, all round the floor of St. Stephen's. He was no mangled hero, insulted by the ferocity of brutal triumph—but something contemptible in the hands of a cruel castigator, who had flayed him within an inch of his life, but scorned to kill him outright!

Mr. Duncombe has done himself great credit in the eyes of the world by his manly stand up for the confidences of society—the privileges of Parliament—ay, and even the dignity of manhood—in the debate of Tuesday night. It must have been a bitter humiliation for a Minister of the Crown to hear himself accused of the "meanness or the baseness to profit by an act which he had not the courage to avow." If Mr. Duncombe's post missives were violated, Sir James Graham must have felt one of the bitter mortifications of a limited tyranny—that, with the privilege of opening his letters, he could not unite the power of shutting his mouth.

About the Budget, there has been no great rumpus kicked up, either in country or in town. The Income-tax, of course, sticks in the throat of society like a fish-bone, which it feels it has not the power to pull out, and derives its only consolation from the assurance that there is no immediate danger of choking. But the general terms of the financial statement have been swallowed, and sugar manufacturers in some parts of the world are happier upon the principle of the advantage of white sugar over moist, viz.—that "if you don't like it you can lump it:" and glass-blowers and coal-heavers have a temporary extacy—and auctioneers are not so proud of having to purchase pulpit-licences, as the property-vendors are of the remission of their per-centage—and Napier and Rous are very justly delighted at the navy increase—and the army is easy in its mind (except over the nonsensical bugbear of a King-consort-ship, which by being blown into air has robbed it of a brevet) and the people do look for a very considerable relief from taxation while the public funds delight in the overplus (not a clerical surplice) of more than five millions in the Treasury by next quarter-day. Still we are very far from a pecuniary Utopia, and the cash rattles less in our pockets than in our brains. One thing, however, is gratifying:—

Our darling Queen has all the while,
Been frugal in her little Isle,
And tho' no splendour has been miss'd,
Is civil with her Civil List;
Receiving mighty Kings, and yet
Not getting—bless her—into debt.
With this truth on her care devolvent,
That her Court is not the Insolvent,
She files her troops, but this once read, you'll Confess she need not file her schedule;
Having twenty shillings still—sans malice,
Both in the pound and in the palace,
With a whole Crown besides above her,
And she herself a Sovereign over!

Badinage apart, however, it was delightful to hear the Peel panegyric upon the example of economy set to her people by the Queen.

A jolly row in Oxford!—Ward degraded! Another in Cambridge—the Camden Society in the pangs of self-dissolution; and yet, with a curious inconsistency, electing as many fresh members as possible, that the regiment may be perfect when it marches to the grave! These University sensations are neither doing good to learning nor to religion. As for Mr. Ward, he may expect a holy Roman immortality, and look to be se-dan'd round the Vatican by O'Connell and the Earl of Shrewsbury, or by Lord Ffrench and "My Son John."

Yet, upon second thoughts, this may not be; for Dan, who, in the matter of the Bequests Bill denounced the association of the Catholic Archbishop with the Protestant Castle of Dublin, has shaken hands with Orangeism, and made a compact with Tresham Gregg. They have only now to set up a good equestrian statue of the Pope by the side of the "great and good King William," and if Dan and Tresham's joint agitation and eloquence could only endue them with life and motion, we might expect to see the King and the Pontiff riding down Dame-street in a friendly hand-gallop together!

Lumley is girding his loins for the campaign of fashion, and we shall soon have some splendid opera-going.

Meanwhile, Covent Garden introduces us a Chinese drama, and doubtless we shall soon have a Hong-Kong tragedy performed to a T! An Oh fie company are coming over to be lodged in the Piccadilly Pagoda, and fed upon Junk.

Mr. Fitzroy Kelly has been again triumphant against the new Crown lawyer in an appeal case in the House of Lords, and drawn upon himself the commendation of the Duke of Wellington, who heard his argument. This must be gall and wormwood to the Solicitor-General, who must nauseate the toujours perdrix of defeat. Mr. Kelly must be to him as the Cabrion of Eugene Sue to the Pipelet of Paris; or the "Monsieur Tonson come again" of our own facetious poet.

Wednesday brought us another stormy discussion in the House of Commons—which professedly having reference to a motion for extending the blessing of the Income-tax to Ireland, as if that country were not sufficiently blest already—was, in reality, only an offlet for some eloquence and much personality. There was Mr. Roebuck applying the word "coward," and Sir H. Barron using the word "dare," and Sergeant Murphy expressing his opinion that the first stigma would be "echoed back from Ireland into that house," and Sheil lumping together an avalanche of brilliant denouncement—and one member was a "small comet," and another a specimen of "fat cattle." So that, in fact, the "anenities" were quite in request; and a debate on the Income-tax converted into a good theme for a dissertation upon manners. We wonder when the full meaning of the word "gentleman" will ever be applied as a necessary qualification to the members of the lower house? If it should, there are certainly some boys there who will not get in after the next dissolution. Emollit mores is assured by no quality of parliamentary discussion.

A morning paper, on the question of opening Mr. Duncombe's letters, has some amusing suggestions to various grades of society, which we versify for their benefit:—

Oh, Chartist friends of transported Frost!
With your tin cleared out and your temper crost!
Did Duncombe, out of his funds galore,
Say "by return" he would send you more?
And is it true that the cash came not—
That the dear remittance was not got?
Then go to the Graham, Chartist, go;
Search through his office high and low,
Then you may find Tom's missive fair,
And everything but the money there!
Of course it was sent in a sum profuse,
Which Sir James applied to the public use!
Oh, lady fair, was your billet doux
Written to Duncombe sans reponse,
Go to the Graham, lady, do—
Be sure you'll find your letter at once!
Creditor sweet! (if such torment thing
Doth ever a flavour of sweetness bring),
Did your bill to the Albany go?
Are you sure you posted it so?
Is it true that you can't account
For Tom's not having sent the amount?
Well, then, off to the Graham, off,
And do not fancy we mean to scoff
When hinting—that after in punctual style
He has shown you your bill on his office file,
You'll be pretty sure of making him stare
If you ask him to pay it then and there:
And you may here a minister (courtesy-rife)
Say "I wish you may get it!" for once in his life!

SOPHOCLES.

Seeing in your valuable paper of the 18th ult., some beautiful lines translated on an epitaph on Sophocles, I was led to refer, and find the original was written by Antipater Sidonius, on Anacreon, and translated by Moore. The following are the lines:—

Αντιπατρου Σιδωνιου, εις Ανακρεον τα.

ΘΑΛΛΟΙ τετρακορωμβος, Ανακρεον, αμφι σε ισσος
ἁβρα τε λειμωνων πορφυρεων πετα λα πηγαι δ' αργινοεντος αναθλιβοιντο γαλακτος, ευωδες δ' απο γης ἡδυ χειοτο μεθυ, οφρα κε τοι σποδιη τε και οστεα τερψιν αρηται, ει δε τις φθιμενοις χριμπτεται ευφροσυνς
ω το φιλον στερξας, φιλε, βαρβιτον, ω συναοιδα παντα διαπλωσας και συν ερωτι βιον.

The translation is rendered by Thomas Moore, Esq.—

Around the tomb, oh bard divine!
Where soft thy hallow'd brow repoes,
Long may the deathless ivy twine,
And summer pour her waste of roes!

And many a fount shall there distil,
And many a rill refresh the flowes;
But wine shall gush in every rill,
And every fount be milky showes.

Thus, shade of him, whom Natur taught
To tune his lyre and soul to plasure,
Who gave to love his warmest tought,
Who gave to love his fondestmeasure.

Thus, after death, if spirits fee
Thou may'st, from odours rand thee streaming,
A pulse of past enjoyment stel,
And live again in blissful draming!

Antipater Sidonius, the author of this epigram, lived, according to Vopius, de Poetis Græcis, in the second year of th 169th Olympiad. Cicero and Quintilian speak of him as an improvisator. See "Institut. Orat." lib. x. cap. 7. Little more is known of him, excep some curious particulars of his death, by Pliny, and others.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ATTEMPTED INTRUSION UPON THE QUEEN.

A man about sixty years of age, with grey bushy whiskers, rather shabbily dressed, who said his name was Ralph Stennett, was brought before the bench of magistrates at Brighton, on Wednesday morning, and underwent a long examination under the following circumstances:—

Early in the afternoon of Tuesday the sentinel on duty at the northern entrance to the Palace-grounds observed a man pacing to and fro, and his manner attracted his attention. At length, he came up to the sentinel, and inquired if he knew what time the Queen was likely to ride out. The sentinel said her Majesty usually rode out about three o'clock. The man then walked up and down the pavement, and, about half-past three o'clock, observing the gates open, he made a rush towards them, having something in his hand at the time; but instead of the Queen, as he expected, the porter's wife came out of the gate. His conduct excited the suspicion of the sentinel, who detained him, and handed him over to the local authorities.

Two letters were produced before the magistrates by Mr. Chase, the chief officer of the police.

One of them was addressed to Prince Albert, in which the writer said he had painted a small cabinet picture of a group of sparrows fighting, and requested his Royal Highness to accept of it. The other letter was addressed to the Queen, and the object of it was to beg her Majesty to accept a wreath of flowers. The writer added, that obstacles had been opposed, in the way of his presentation of the object, through official channels. He also intimated that he was very poor, and begged the Queen's patronage for pitures executed in brown tint.

The magistrate asked the prisoner why he took this course to get his letters to her Majesty?

The prisoner answered with the most perfect indifference and cool assurance, that he had a right to present his letters in what way he pleased to her Majesty, and that he did not conceive he was infringing the law by so doing. He denied that he meant to throw the letters into her Majesty's carriage. He was as loyal a snbject as any of them, and since their worships appeared to know the proper course, perhaps they would inform him how to act.

The magistrate said, that the proper course would have been to convey them through one of the Lords in Waiting.

Prisoner: I have tried that on at Windsor, but it was no go.

Mr. Heaviside: We have nothing to do with Windsor. The sentinel has done his duty. You have acted in a very improper manner to get your letters conveyed to her Majesty. You are discharged, but we warn you not to commit yourself so again.

Prisoner (with great effrontery): I shall.

Mr. Heaviside: You say you shall?

Prisoner: I certainly shall; and I will bring an action against you, as sure as you are born.

The prisoner was then suffered to depart.

SOUTH WILTS ELECTION.—The nomination for the southern division of Wiltshire took place on Saturday, at Salisbury. Mr. W. Wyndham, of Dinton, proposed the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert. Mr. J. L. Jacob seconded Mr. Herbert's nomination; and there being no other candidate, Mr. Herbert was declared duly elected.

A CHILD POISONED IN SOMERSETSHIRE.—Two women, named Chandler and Puddy, have been committed by the coroner for Somersetshire, to take their trials for the murder of the child of the prisoner Chandler. Both the prisoners had been inmates of the Axbridge Union Workhouse, and on their leaving the union they poisoned the child with laudanum.

THE MURDER OF A GAMEKEEPER AT CROOME.—Three more men, supposed to have been of the gang of poachers who attacked Lord Coventry's keepers on the night of Dec. 19, in the course of which affray one of the latter, named Staite, was so badly hurt that he died a few days afterwards, have been apprehended, and two of them have been remanded for further examination. The disclosures which were made by them, and the witnesses examined on that occasion, have led to the apprehension of five other men, upon the charge of having been concerned in this shocking outrage. Their names are William Bloomfield, George Brant, William Cosnett, Joseph Tandy, and Samuel Turvey. The last mentioned (Turvey), it will be remembered, was in custody some weeks ago on the charge of poaching on the night of the 19th of December last, was set at liberty, for want of sufficient proof, which, it is thought, has now been supplied. Last Saturday all five were taken before three magistrates, at the Worcester county gaol, when they were remanded for further examination. At the same time Cooke was also remanded, and the proof of Wheeler's criminality being defective, he was discharged.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE AT HITCHIN, HERTS.—Early on the morning of Friday week a serious conflagration took place at Hitchin, which, in the course of a few hours, occasioned the complete destruction of a large manufactory, with numerous workshops, and also the Lancasterian school-house, a portion of an extensive academy, and several houses that adjoined. The premises where it commenced were in the occupation of Messrs. Langford and Son, upholsterers. The loss is upwards of £6000. A labouring man was killed during the fire by the falling of the burning ruins.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE LANCASTER AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.—On Saturday morning a shocking accident took place on the above railway, at Lambrigg, about five miles from Kendal. It appears that one of the labourers on the line was working at the edge of the temporary rails which are laid for the conveyance of soil, &c., and while he was in the act of stooping to his work, he was caught behind the ear by a piece of sharp iron, which was attached to a waggon that was passing at a rapid pace. The wound extended from behind the ear to the front of the neck, severing the jugular vein, and the unfortunate man was thrown a distance of several yards, and he bled to death in a few minutes.

A ROBBER BURNED TO DEATH IN PRISON.—A notorious robber confined in the Chandos House Gaol, at Bath, with a view of making his escape, contrived on Thursday morning week to set fire to his cell. He, however, met his death in the attempt, as on the alarm being given, his cell door was broken open, when it was discovered that his career had been terminated by suffocation. The verdict given by the jury at the coroner's inquest, was, "That the deceased died from suffocation, through setting the door of his cell on fire, with the intention of making his escape."

MURDER BY POISONING AT DORCHESTER.—Another case of poisoning by the administration of arsenic has just been brought to light at Dorchester, and is now undergoing investigation by a coroner's jury. The woman by whom the murder is alleged to have been perpetrated is named Warr. She is a resident at Wooland, a small hamlet near Blandford, and has hitherto borne a light character. The being whose death she is charged with having occasioned is her own offspring—an illegitimate child of but a few months old. The woman went to reside at Dorchester during her confinement, and left her infant with the woman at whose house she lodged to be nursed. She came twice to see the child, and on both occasions gave it food, after which it became very ill. The last time was about a week ago, when she was observed putting a white powder into the infant's mouth, between the spoonsful of food. This time the illness of the child proved fatal, and on examination death was found to have been caused by arsenic. The inquest on the body was adjourned.

A WIFE KILLED BY HER HUSBAND AT RENDLESHAM.—Last Saturday night, the wife of a gamekeeper of Lord Rendlesham was shot by her husband. The parties lived in a cottage on the estate of the noble lord at Rendlesham, Suffolk. An inquest was held on Wednesday, at the Oyster public-house, in the village of Butley, when the following evidence was given in regard to the occurrence. It appeared that on Saturday night, the husband of the unfortunate creature was carousing at the public-house until eleven o'clock, when, being very much in liquor, he was induced to go home by one of his fellow servants. On reaching his cottage he became very violent, and at length forced his way out of the dwelling into the preserves. The infatuated man, as was his custom at night-time, proceeded to the place where he kept his fire-arms, and having armed himself with a brace of pistols, commenced strolling about the estate. The deceased watched his movements, and fearing that something serious would happen to him, rushed towards him in the hope of persuading him to return home. Just at the moment he was adjusting the pistols in his dress, and almost instantaneously one of them, during the scuffle, went off, and shot her through the head, and she immediately expired. The general tenour of the evidence went to show that the couple, deceased and her husband, generally lived on good terms, and that there was an absence of malice on the accused's part. The jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against the husband. He was immediately conveyed to the county gaol, at Ipswich, on the Coroner's warrant, to take his trial at the next assizes. What renders the catastrophe of a far more painful character is, that a family of five young children, the younger not more than three weeks old, is left totally unprovided for.

SCOTLAND.

ALLEGED MURDER.—At the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, on Monday, John Maclaughlin, jun., was charged with the crime of murder, in so far as, on the 5th of September, 1844, in or near the boiling-house of the farm of Alton, in the parish of Campsie and shire of Stirling, occupied by William Stevenson, farmer, the prisoner did wickedly assault John Dunn or Dunion, labourer, now deceased, then in the employment of the said William Stevenson, and did, with a reaping hook or other instrument, inflict on the said John Dunn or Dunion one or more severe strokes or cuts, whereby one of his ribs was perforated, and he was mortally wounded in his chest and lungs, and immediately thereafter died, and was thus murdered by the said John Maclaughlin, jun. The prisoner pleaded guilty of culpable homicide, which plea was accepted by the Solicitor-General, and the prisoner was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment.

RAILWAY FROM NORTH QUEENSFERRY TO PERTH.—On Tuesday, a meeting of landed proprietors, gentlemen connected with manufactures, and others, favourable to the formation of a railway from North Queensferry by Lochgelly and Lochleven to Perth, was held at Edinburgh, and a resolution affirming it to be the conviction of the meeting that great advantages would accrue to the landed and manufacturing interests and general population from the proposed line, was unanimously agreed to.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE EDINBURGH AND GLASGOW RAILWAY.—A man, named Daniel M'Gunegal, a labourer in the employ of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, lost his life yesterday week, on the railway, near the Glasgow terminus. He was engaged at work in the tunnel, when the eleven o'clock train from Edinburgh was running down the incline, and not being acquainted with the place, instead of keeping upon the rails used by the up-trains, or taking to one side, to avoid the fancied danger which he was in, ran before the train, and before the breaksman could make an effort to save him, was thrown down and killed on the spot. Indeed, his head was nearly severed from his body. M'Gunegal had only gone into the employment of the railway company the day previous.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the meeting on Monday, Mr. John O'Connell, M.P., commented upon Sir R. Peel's financial plan. He admitted that the measures announced by Sir R. Peel, particularly those for the reduction of the duties on glass and sugar, would be of great benefit to the poorer classes of Ireland. Mr. O'Connell, père, subsequently made a speech, in which he said that the hypocrisy of Sir Robert Peel terrified him. He thoroughly understood the Parliament; he made very fine speeches, filled with promises. He (Mr. O'Connell) sen. alluded to a statement recently made by Mr. Wakley, M.P., that Sir Robert Peel intended well to Ireland, and further that the Irish members ought to make their complaints in the House of Commons, where he believed there was a strong disposition to remove the real grievances of Ireland. Mr. Wakley was like the old woman called Innocent Abigail, who went to hell without sin. (Laughter.) He does not deserve hell, but he deserves a slice of purgatory. (Laughter.) What grievance, he asked Mr. Wakley, had the Parliament removed since the repeal agitation commenced? Not one; nor would they speak of it now but from the hints they got from this of an Irish Parliament. Mr. O'Connell then gave notice that on the next day of meeting he should move the adoption of a petition to Parliament, praying for the repeal of the clauses in the Emancipation Act affecting the Jesuits and other "Regulars." The week's rent was announced to be £751 10s. 7d.

TRIAL ON A SUNDAY.—An action, "Howard v. Shaw," brought on bills of exchange, which were passed by one of the shareholders in a bubble concern, known as the Talacre Coal Company, occupied the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, for the last week. The plaintiff was the endorsee of the bills, and the defence was, that the whole getting up of the company was a fraud with which the defendant had no connection, but was the dupe. Chief Justice Pennefather presided.—Mr. M'Donagh, for the plaintiff, concluded his reply at half past twelve o'clock on Sunday morning last. Although it was the Sabbath, the Chief Justice proceeded to charge the jury, and closed about three o'clock. At half-past three the jury found a verdict for the defendant. Since the celebrated state trials, and it is remarkable that they concluded on that day twelvemonth, no case has been tried in that court on a Sunday morning.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Hereafter, when men consult the annals of the turf for the purposes of information or curiosity, they will find that in these instant Olympiads of the middle of the nineteenth century came to pass the saying that "the race is not always to the swift." Now-a-days no plate or stakes is decided till — pardon the inevitable pun — "it is disposed of by due course of law." Westminster Hall is the Court of Cassation of the Jockey Club, and to the cunning of the handicapper is added the sublimation of the special pleader! Latterly the reports of the proceedings in the law courts have furnished a preponderance of sporting cases; and, at this crisis, when the practice of all out-door recreations—with the exception of those celebrated on the ice—is suspended, it may not be out of place to take a survey of their theory, their position, and prospects. Since the action for libel against the Stewards of the Jockey Club, brought by Mr. Richard Thornton, successfully, the turf has never been out of hot water. To such a pitch has litigation, connected with its economy, extended, that there are now certain learned counsel who may be called the Attorney and Solicitor-General of Diana. Their profound knowledge of the statutes relating to horse-racing and gaming generally is astonishing, and their experience is constantly leading to new results. To-day it discovers that the expressions used in framing an act are to be construed literally; to-morrow, that they are to be taken figuratively; the day after, constructively. To these philanthropists the profession attached to racing speculation is indebted, for such glowing vistas of hope as whilom did not open even to the visions of their wildest reveries. No longer is the Ring, like the other employments of life, overstocked with labourers. The leg has now, like the "squatter" of the new world, illimitable space for his industry and ingenuity: when pressed by circumstances, that latter takes refuge in the Western prairie, the former in Westminster Hall. When Mr. Baron Alderson made ducks and drakes of Mr. Goodman Levi, and his horse Running Rein, alias Maccabeus, last summer, there were people so unfathomably dull, as to imagine coup de grace had been done upon the genius of "legism." So far from it, that collision only served to bring out the latent fire which, since the days of the Trojan horse, had slumbered or smouldered in the breasts of the philosophers of that classic school. Anon, ye shall see the Ring vindicate its fame and name. Already the movement has commenced which bids fair to have no end.

In sad seriousness, the present position of the great national sport of horse-racing is the most unsatisfactory that can be imagined. Precisely in the same degree that public patronage or support are accorded to it, private baseness, or folly, or chicanery, comes to work it mischief. Perhaps we had driven villany—overt swindling, from the turf—for a time at all events: but artifice flourishes; and folly, the folly of its friends, is so luxuriant as to threaten to choke up all the good seed. When the turf became the amusement—say, if you will, the occupation—of gentlemen, it was understood that its code of rules and regulations was fashioned upon honourable principles, and that it was dependent for its operation and effect, not only upon the letter, but the spirit of honour. Its court of dernier resort was the Jockey Club, and the first heavy blow to the character of racing was given when cabals and dissensions broke out among the members of that society. Now, instead of the decision of a company of gentlemen, conversant with its usage and principle, being brought to bear on such technical questions as arise out of its engagements, we have the craft of two thousand years of forensic quibbling set in array "to make the worst appear the better part." A notable instance—of which we shall have a series—of the necessity for some tribunal which shall dispose of racing disputes, according to the convention of the sport, is now on the tapis, being a controversy as to whether a colt called "Ironmaster," engaged in this year's Derby, and a filly called "My Mary," in this year's Oaks, be or be not bonâ fide qualified for those races. The act of making a horse's right to start for a race dependent on the life of the party naming him, was one of pure and unsophisticated nonsense. What good can come of it? The qualification for an appearance in the Calendar as a nomination for any stake, should be the previous payment into the hands of the stakeholder of the amount required as forfeit—over his right to start, the payment of the whole stake, when the conditions of not starting are half forfeits. However, in the present case thus stand the facts:—These animals are entered in the name of one Francis Marshall. Now Francis Marshall who bred them is dead; but Francis Marshall who entered them is alive. The adverse party contend that he entered them in the name of his father, who is deceased: he avers he entered them in his own, and that he is alive. Who can decide this fact? The lawyers have given an opinion, founded upon the homœopathy of special pleading, whence it shall come to pass that if either win, there will be a trial at "bar of terrible account"—with odd or even "for choice of the verdict"—and whatever comes of the steeds we shall have some sublime progeny of the category to which they belong. The effect of all this is to bring discouragement on the sport of horse-racing—and to comfort and assist the profession of betters round. Surely, the sooner we have a reform of this, the more will the position and prospects of the turf be mended.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The Chester Cup betting ranged over a large field, but in no material degree affected the odds quoted in our last. It served to show, however, that Semiseria, notwithstanding the determined "set" made against her in a certain quarter, was steady at 9 to 1, and that The Era, Obscurity, Celeste, Zanoni, Strathspey, St. Lawrence, Winesour, and Agriculture were in good odour with some of the influentials. For the Derby, Kedger, Newsmonger, Mentor, Pantasa, Miss Whip colt, Old England, and the Minikin colt were in fair demand, at quotations that promise an improvement. The Ironmaster's qualification is much more likely to be settled in a court of law than at Messrs. Weatherby's.

THURSDAY.—The frost, by confining the nags to straw beds, has also put a check to speculation, few being disposed to invest during an interruption to training. Still it is fit to state that Zanoni, Strathspey, and Winesour were in strong demand this afternoon for the Cup; and Newsmonger and Miss Whip for the Derby. In all other respects the market was quiescent. We submit the final averages:—

NEW MUSIC.

HOW'S ILLUSTRATED BOOK OF BRITISH SONG. Edited by G. HOGARTH, ESQ. The intention of this book is good, but we cannot say that it has been carried out well. To redeem from a threatening oblivion many of our national compositions, in a praiseworthy undertaking, but to mutilate them, in the false hope of improving them, is ridiculous. We have received a prospectus and specimen of this projected publication, very elegantly printed, but, we regret to say, inaccurately. We never saw a worse arrangement of "God save the Queen;" the harmony to the second part to the air is deplorably bad. Handel and Purcell are not treated much better. Why not let them alone? They were wise men in their day!

DEATH OF MR. LAMAN BLANCHARD.

It is our most painful duty to announce the sudden death of Mr. Laman Blanchard. He had lately suffered a severe domestic affliction; and his unceasing anxiety during the progress of the long and harassing illness in his family, which terminated fatally, had so injured his own health, that fits ensued, which finally led to his death. He died about half-past one o'clock last Saturday morning, and has left four orphan children to lament his loss.

Mr. Blanchard is well known in periodical literature. His graceful verses, his lively stories, his wit that never had a touch of malice, are known to many readers. There, perhaps, never was a man who had a readier pen. A poem, an essay, a witty paragraph, seemed to spring spontaneously from his brain. There was an amenity in everything he did. And, indeed, how could it be otherwise, seeing that he himself was the very impersonation of kindness and goodness of heart.

Mr. Blanchard was long in the service of Literature. He was a member of the press, in various ways, for more than twenty years; beginning young, and fighting an upward fight throughout, bravely, independently, without envy or uncharitableness, until he reached the age of forty-two, when he died. We may fearlessly assert that no man ever ran the same career, in the same circumstances, who left so few enemies, and so many, many friends.

These few facts are addressed to strangers. His independence, his perseverance, his untiring kindness, and his many sterling and amiable qualities, need no demonstration to his acquaintance or his friends.—Examiner.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The celebrated author, Baron Ernest Houwald, died in the course of last week of apoplexy, at the age of seventy, on his estate Neuhaus, in Prussia. The deceased enjoyed a considerable literary reputation in Germany, and was highly esteemed by the Royal Family of Prussia, in whose private circle he was generally admitted.

The Russian journal Invalide mentions the eruption of a volcano on the borders of the Caspian sea, about 35 wersts from Schemakha, on the road to Saliany. About six in the morning the mountain suddenly vomited forth a great quantity of glowing matter mingled with naphtha, which covered a circumference of 1485 fathoms. The eruption lasted three-quarters of an hour, and caused rents round the sides of the mountain, especially on the south side, of one to four ells broad, and one to three fathoms deep, and which were filled with water.

A letter from Dresden, February 3, says:—Another fatal duel has just taken place at Freiburg. One of the officers of the garrison, Lieutenant W——, having, at a ball, trod on the foot of a lady, who was dancing with Count Dembinski, a student at the academy of Mines, aged nineteen, and having forgotten to apologise for his awkwardness, was challenged by the count. The weapons were pistols, and the distance fifteen paces. The count grazed the arm of his antagonist, but the ball of the latter proved mortal, striking the count in the heart. He had only time to exclaim, "My poor mother!" when he fell dead. The deceased was the son of the late General Dembinski, who commanded the Polish army during the last revolution.

A few days ago a great mass of the snow which covered the plateau upon the slope of the mountain which overhangs the village of Molière, in the Aveyron, fell upon the village and buried four houses with their inhabitants. Several of the inhabitants were dug out alive, but 11 persons perished by this disaster.

The Revue de Paris announces, that the marriage of the celebrated Arab Chief, Yussuff Bey, Colonel of the Spahis, with Miss Weyer, grand-niece of General Guilleminot, is to be celebrated in Paris on the 27th inst. After his marriage he is to be promoted to the rank of Major-General, and invested with the military command of Oran.

Accounts from Constantinople of the 28th of January, state that the Porte has at length agreed to submit the Tripoli and other claims made by England, as well as the alleged infractions on the commercial treaty, to the decision of a commission, whose judgment will be final. It seemed probable that there would soon be some modification in the present unpopular ministry.

We find by our letters from France, that the fall of snow on the continent has again been immense. At Liege the streets, on the 16th instant, were rendered all but impracticable by the dense masses. So large a quantity of snow was scarcely remembered there. The Journal de Bruges states that at Thielt, the depth was so considerable that the labour, in partially clearing it away, had been very great. The church had for a time remained inaccessible. Letters of the 6th of February, from Munich, state that the railway train for Augsburg had on the previous evening been buried in snow near the former place, and that in spite of all the exertions used for the purpose it had been found impossible to extricate it, and the passengers returned to Munich.

Plans have been made (says the Constitutionnel) for the restoration of the Amphitheatre of Arles, and the Church of St. Ouen at Rouen. The estimated expense of the first is 400,000f., and of the second 1,400,000f.

Letters from St. Petersburgh announce the demise of Prince Repnin, General of Cavalry in the Russian service, on his estates in Russia. The preparations now making for the ensuing Caucasus campaign are said to be on a most extensive scale.

We learn from Hestingfort, in Sweden, that the magnificent observatory, lately erected in that town, has been destroyed by fire. This disastrous event is attributed to malevolence.

Letters were received at the residence of Sir William Follett, on Thursday, dated Lyons, Tuesday week. When these letters were sent off, we are happy to state the learned Attorney General was in good health and about to proceed to Pa is for a few days. It is expected that Sir William and Lady Follett and family will arrive in England in a few days.

A letter from Hamburg, dated Feb. 14, states that the frost has been again so severe since the evening of the 8th instant, that the hopes entertained of an early resumption of the navigation, have been entirely frustrated. The Elbe is entirely frozen over again a few miles below the city. The harbour of Cuxhaven is quite full of vessels.

According to letters from Rome, dated the 1st instant, great preparations were in progress to celebrate with much pomp and solemnity, on the following day, the anniversary of the Pope's reign. His Holiness received, on the 31st ultimo and the 1st instant, at the Vatican, the congratulations of the foreign Ministers, to whom he granted separate audiences—his Holiness not receiving them collectively, as heretofore.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

MORE SUDDEN DEATHS.—On Monday the following inquests on the bodies of persons who had died suddenly, were held in the western division of Middlesex:—By Mr. Wakley, M.P., at No. 17, Gate-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, on the body of Mr. Day, the well-known lithographer. The deceased gentleman enjoyed his usual good health all last week, but on Friday, after an interview with some gentlemen on business, he expired suddenly, without any apparent cause.—By Mr. G. I. Mills, at the Lord Wellington, Sussex-street, Gower-street, on the body of Samuel Dyer, a bricklayer. The deceased always enjoyed good health, and on Friday forenoon he went to examine a room in the above street, into which water had penetrated from the roof, in consequence of the melting of the snow, and whilst telling the occupier of the room to fear nothing, he dropped suddenly on the floor, and died.—The third inquest was held at the Union, Essex-street, Somers-town, on the body of Mr. Charles Bagnall Fleetwood, aged 86. Deceased resided at No. 12, in the above street, and was an operative chemist. He was found dead in his bed on Friday morning, to which the cold weather had confined him with cough and asthma for two or three days.—On Tuesday Mr. Wakley held four inquests in Clerkenwell, on the bodies of persons who had died suddenly. One of them was at the Golden Anchor, Coppice-row, on the body of Mr. Samuel Cave, aged 75, who had been for fifty-four years clerk and book-keeper at the coach-office of the Saracen's Head, Snow-hill. Deceased was a remarkably healthy man, never complaining of illness, and invariably in jocular humour. He attended to business daily until dinner hour, at which time on Saturday last he was returning to his residence in Alfred-street, City-road, through Goswell-street. A gentleman, named Hare, saw him hesitate in crossing the kennel, then totter, and finally fall on a barrow containing toys, &c., for sale. Mr. Hare went to deceased's assistance, helped, with others, to remove him into a house, and sent for a surgeon, who came in a minute or two, and pronounced deceased dead.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—On Monday an explosion took place on the premises of Mr. Fenwick, the well-known artist in fireworks, residing in Regent-street, Lambeth-walk. It appears that a young man named William Hook, a journeyman firework maker, was engaged in making a quantity of rockets, and whilst ramming one of them with a mallet, the contents suddenly ignited, which communicated with a large quantity of combustible materials in front of him, the whole of which exploded with dreadful violence, forcing off the roof of the shop, and setting fire to some portion of the building, which was speedily extinguished by the other workmen. The poor man Hook was found lying on his back, frightfully disfigured about the face, hands, and chest, and in dreadful agony. He was removed to Guy's Hospital, where he was promptly attended to. Very slight hopes are entertained of his recovery.

THE LATE CASES OF POISONING AT CAMBERWELL.—On Monday Mr. Carter resumed the adjourned inquiry, touching the deaths of Mr. and Mrs. Montague, of Hebron-place, Camberwell. Mr. Massy, surgeon, said he had made a complete analysis, in conjunction with Mr. Warrington, of Apothecaries Hall, of the contents of the stomachs of both the deceased per ons, and had distinctly discovered the presence of arsenic in each. No doubt arsenic was the cause of the deaths. He had also found arsenic adhering to parts of the tea-pot the deceased had used at breakfast. The witness also produced a bottle, given to him by police-sergeant Kendal, and found on a shelf in the shop, and which still contained arsenic. Police-sergeant Kendal said that he saw Mr. Montague whilst he was labouring under the effects of poison, and asked him whether he suspected any one of having put it wilfully into the tea-pot? Mr. Montague's reply was, "I suspect no one on earth of having done so." After an inquiry which lasted nine hours, the inquest was again adjourned.

THE NEW COMMITTEE ROOMS, HOUSE OF COMMONS.

NEW PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE ROOMS.

These committee rooms have just been built by Mr. Barry, by order of the House of Commons, in order to afford additional accommodation to the railway and other parliamentary committees. The structure is in the form of a parallelogram, and exhibits no architectural importance; but the interior arrangement of the committee and waiting rooms has been pronounced very convenient. They are lit from the roof; and, to insure quiet and warmth, the "walls" consist of double boarding, with a space between, and felt lining. The rooms were opened for the transaction of business on Tuesday last; and they will, doubtless, be the scene of many anxious hopes and conflicting interests during the session.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. LI.

ST. JOHN'S, NOTTING HILL.

This handsome new church was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of London, on Wednesday, the 22nd ult. The site has been admirably chosen —an elevated portion of Kennington-park: the east end of the structure faces Ladbroke-grove, and forms the western termination of a wide terrace proposed to be built in the direction of Westbourne-terrace.

This church was designed bv Messrs. Stevens and Alexander, the architects of the beautiful church at Herne Hill, engraved in a recent number of our journal. The church at Notting Hill is cruciform in plan; and has a lofty tower and spire at the intersection of the cross. The exterior is wholly of stone; the plain faces are of Kentish rag, hammer-dressed; and the quoins, dressings of doors and windows, ornamental parts, and the spire, are of Bath stone. There is an entrance-porch at the west end of each side of the building; and other entrances in the transepts: each of the latter has a circular or marigold window; the several gables are surmounted with enriched crosses; the tower has a canopied dormer in each face, and a pinnacle at each angle, at the point whence the spire rises, and the entire structure is throughout judiciously embellished. The style is early English (13th century), but presents variations which are to be rather found in works in Normandy of that period than in our own country.

The plan of the interior comprises a nave and two aisles, one on either side; transept, and a chancel. On each side of the latter, but extending only part of its length (as shown in the engraving), an aisle is formed: that on the north side is used as the robing-room, and contains the organ in the upper part; that on the south side contains pews, and is parted by a lofty oaken screen from the chancel. The nave is separated from the aisles by plain cylindrical columns, bearing pointed arches, and it has a clerestory. The tower, at the junction of the nave, transepts, and chancels, is supported on arches, by clustered columns at each angle. The ceilings are of wood, stained and varnished; the timbers of the roof are exposed, and are slightly adorned with painted symbols of the Evangelists, and Scripture sentences rubricated. It was originally intended to separate the chancel from the nave by a rood-sceen; but this feature of the plan was abandoned at the request, it is stated, of the Bishop of London. There is a gallery at the west end, and one in each transept, but none in the body of the church. The pews are low, formed of deal, simply varnished, and afford 1500 sittings, of which 400 are free. Among the more ornamental features of the interior are a small stained glass light, in the gable of the west end of the nave, given by Mr. W. Shaw; and a stained glass window in the south aisle, presented by Mr. Alexander, the architect; and both works executed by Warrington. The chancel is paved with encaustic tiles, made by Minton, and presented to the church by Mr. Blashfield.

The whole length of the building, in the clear of the walls, is 125 feet 9 inches; the width of the nave between the columns, is 19 feet 10 inches; making, in the clear of the walls, with the thickness of the columns, 51 feet. The height of the church from the floor-line to the ridge of the roof, is 50 feet. The length of the transepts, from north to south, is 91 feet, in the clear of the walls. The total height of the tower and spire is 156 feet.

This church was completed under the superintendence of the architects, by the contractors, Messrs. Higgs and Son, of Davies-street, within twelve months. The total cost was £7500. A considerable part of this amount has been raised by subscription, presenting several traits of individual munificence. Mr. Robert Roy, (of the firm of Blunt, Roy, and Johnson,) purchased and presented the site for the church; and, further, gave £150 towards the cost of its structure. Mr. W. A. Shaw gave 150 guineas (in addition to the stained window above named), and the Venerable Archdeacon Sinclair, Vicar of Kennington, gave £150.

We agree with the editor of the Builder (whence a portion of these details has been abridged) as to the very artistical and effective external arrangement of the church. It presents a noble architectural nucleus of this rapidly increasing locality; and, viewed from either point, but more especially from the west, its lofty and well proportioned spire is seen to picturesque advantage. We are happy to record this advance in the taste for church-building, which must add to the reputation of the architects.

ST. SIDWELL'S CHURCH, EXETER.

The parish of St. Sidwell (of the Saxon times), on the north-east side of Exeter, and a portion of its suburbs, has, of late, been the arena of certain proceedings, which must have been deeply distressing to every well-regulated mind. We refer to the rubrical observances in the church service, which have, of late, caused so much excitement, and even tumult, in the parish, that they have been discontinued; and tranquillity almost restored.

Throughout these transactions, the church was, of course, the great scene of attraction. It is a structure of our own times, built upon the site of the ancient church, which was consecrated in 1439, when the high altar was dedicated to St. Sidwell, and St. Thomas the Martyr.

The architect of the new church was Mr. W. Burgess, of Exeter: it was opened in 1813, but the steeple was not built until 1823. The edifice is in the pointed style; and consists of a nave, chancel, and side aisles; with a lofty square tower and small octangular spire at the west-end; and the south side of the former, a semi-octagonal projecting staircase. The nave is separated from the aisles by six arches on each side, and the supporting clustered columns of which belonged to the old church, but have bases added. The sculpture of the capitals is described by Britton and Brayley, in the handsome work, "Devonshire and Cornwall Illustrated," as very singular: —"The capitals are each divided into eight compartments, four displaying demi-angels supporting shields, and the others small figures of St. Sidwell." There is a large eastern window of "the Ascension," stained and painted by Collins, of the Strand. The pulpit is central, supported by flying arches, rising from four buttresses; the front is octagonal, with a basin large enough for immersion; and there are some finely sculptured bosses in the aisles. In the church and churchyard are interred several persons who were executed for joining in the western insurrection against the ruling powers, in the seventeenth century.

MR. CARUS WILSON LEAVING JERSEY.

We have received from a correspondent at St. Helier's, the accompanying sketch of the departure of Mr. Carus Wilson from Jersey, on his passage to London, touching the long-vexed question of his imprisonment. The circumstances of the embarkation are thus related by our correspondent.

Contrary to general expectation, the news arrived here on the 2nd, that the Habeas Corpus Act extended to the Channel Islands, and that, therefore, the writ obtained by Mr. Carus Wilson was valid. In consequence of this intelligence, the States met, when the Bailiff informed them that he had received from their deputy in London, T. Le Breton, Esq., letters of the greatest importance, which he begged to submit to their consideration; at the same time stating that it might be advantageous for the public to be excluded during the debate. The States, after having prolonged their sitting to half-past three, P.M., adjourned to the morrow afternoon, when the debate was resumed and concluded. Although no authentic report of their proceedings has appeared, it was universally believed that they had determined to resist no further, and that Mr. Carus Wilson was to leave the Island for Westminster on Friday morning. From an early hour on that day, crowds, more especially of the lower classes, were seen to direct their steps towards the prison. As the appointed hour drew nearer, 8 A.M., the numbers considerably increased, and after anxiously waiting a few minutes, the "giant" appeared, in excellent spirits and perfect health. The first moment he was seen he was enthusiastically cheered, which was continually repeated during his progress towards the pier, while the number of persons from all directions became so great, that it is fairly estimated there were no less than 5000 spectators at the moment of his departure. Arrived at the extremity of the harbour, three more deafening cheers rent the air, after which he uncovered himself, and expressed, in a firm voice, these few striking appropriate words:—"Brethren! Brethren! Brethren! God save the Queen and the supremacy of the law against the tyranny of faction!!!" He then affectionately shook hands with his most intimate friends, descended the stairs, and whilst crossing the harbour in the boat (as shown in the accompanying sketch), he rose and gave one last cheer for the success of his cause, which was answered from the quay by reiterated hurrahs!

The result of Mr. Wilson's visit has already been given in our journal. By the Guernsey Star of Feb. 17, we learn that Mr. Wilson has returned to Jersey.

SKETCHES IN MEXICO.—TAMPICO.

We resume our sketches in the Mexican States with the above picturesque view of Mexico, the northernmost point of the State of Vera Cruz. It is likewise called Puebla Viejo: the town is built on the border of a shallow lake, the Lagunadi Tamiagua, which communicates with the Rio Panuco, near its mouth. It contains about 4000 inhabitants, and is ill-built. It carries on a considerable commerce, which has, however, lately decreased, since the new town called Puebla Nuevo de las Tumaulipas has been founded on the northern side of the river, about three miles from it.

The view is from a sketch by a naval officer, lately returned from Mexico: in the foreground are shown the aloe and other peculiar vegetable wonders of this truly luxuriant country.

By the Cambria, which arrived at Liverpool on the 13th instant, we have, through the Picayune Extra, advices from Tampico, dated Jan. 14th, announcing the defeat of Santa Anna by the combined forces of Paredes and Bravo, on the plains of Appan, in the immediate vicinity of Puebla; 500 men are said to have fallen in the fight, and Santa Anna to have been taken in endeavouring to make his escape. The letter adds that Paredes was in full pursuit of the routed forces, while Bravo marched back to the capital with his prisoner.

The news of this battle is somewhat doubtful; at any rate, there must be some error in the date.

Captain Davidson informs us, that although Santa Anna was contending against such vast odds, his situation was not deemed, in Tampico, to be utterly desperate. It was even reported there that his advance upon Puebla was hailed with joy by the citizens. This again must be deemed but a rumour. It is stated that an express rider between Vera Cruz and Mexico had been taken by Santa Anna, and by his orders had received 200 lashes, from the effects of which it was thought he would die. The atrocities of the tyrant, in not checking the insubordination of his troops and in levying contributions for their support upon the villages and towns, are represented as characteristically heartless and shocking to humanity.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—If "A. G." will look to the solution, he will perceive that the White King is directed to move to adversary's Q B 3d.

"Senex" must excuse our inserting the solution of the Indian problem—we have it before us, and can assure him that the diagram is correct.

"C. R. E."—You can claim another Queen.

"W. T. P."—Sherwin, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields.

"S. T."—The problem No. 235 in the Chess Chronicle may be corrected by substituting a black King for Queen.

"Schacchi," Glasgow.—You are right; in Problem 56 there is clearly an error, and by it the whole position is vitiated.

"M. N. O.," Yeovil.—The solution of Mr. Kling's ingenious stratagem, No. 59, is correct.

"Zeno," Lincoln's Inn.—Your solution of the famous Indian Problem in the "Chess-player's Chronicle" of last month, is the true one, and, if effected without the aid of a Chess-board, is very creditable to your sagacity, for we know it has hitherto baffled some of our ablest players.

"T. W. B.," Maidstone.—Had "T. W. B." attempted to solve the Indian position from the diagram alone, the only method your true amateur adopts with Problems under 10 moves, he would not have spoken lightly of the task. He has not hit upon the modus operandi, in Mr. Kling's last Problem.

"M. D."—Thanks for the extracts. Through the kindness of a correspondent in India, we long ago received the games from the "Bombay Gazette," between Bombay and Satarrah, but neither of them deserves republishing.

"R. D. M.," Winchester.—This is not exactly the medium for discussing the propriety of giving the name of Palamedes to a work devoted to chess. We must refer our correspondent to "Stephens's Thesaurus" (article Πεσσος*), to "Lloyd's Poetical Dictionary" (article Palamedes), and, if he can meet with a copy, to a rare little treatise on the* πεττεια*, by the late Mr. Christie, the celebrated auctioneer. He can also write to the editor of the periodical in question, who may cite authorities unknown to us, in substantiation of the Greek hero's claims to the invention of Chess.*

"W. K.," Hants.—One game each week we purpose giving, if space can be spared.

To keep pace, in some measure, with the increasing patronage bestowed by the public on this department of our paper, we have concluded arrangements for placing it under the direction of the leading player of the day, from whose well known information and experience on the subject, a series of articles, in the highest degree interesting to the lovers of Chess may be confidently looked for.

Our opening game is one of a novel description, which was played, not as any trial of skill, but "in a merry sport," between Mr. Staunton and M. Kieseritzki. In this partie, Mr. Staunton gave the Q's Rook, on condition that M. Kieseritzki played without seeing the Chess board. M K. had the advantage of playing first.

PRINCESS'.

On Monday evening, Mr. Forrest, the American tragedian, made his first appearance on these boards, after an absence of some years, in the character of Othello. When this gentleman was last in England, we were not particularly impressed with his performance: it was too harsh—too violent. Effects were certainly produced, and points made to tell with the great part of the audience: but they were the result of physical, rather than intellectual power. Since that period, Mr. Forrest has evidently studied much, and has, in consequence, materially advanced in his style of acting. His impersonation of the Moor, on Monday, was marked throughout by careful and judicious reading; and the strenuous declamation was subdued without losing any of its effect. We are, however, disposed to complain of his delivery being very often too prolix. He appeared at times to be ruminating upon the meaning of every word before he uttered it: and this made several portions of the play appear somewhat tedious. We now and then detected ourselves yawning, and it was always from sympathy with those around us. A very little care will be sufficient to amend this defect; and then, without doubt, Mr. Forrest will assume an exalted position as a tragedian. The chief attraction of the evening was certainly Miss Cushman's Emilia—a character which we never saw played in a finer manner than on Monday. This talented lady's performance fully justified the opinion we formed of her last week. It was throughout impressive, natural, intelligent; and every point of excellence was warmly recognised by the audience. With the same absence of any straining after effect which we noticed in her previous acting as Fazio, her energy at times completely carried the audience with it. Mrs. Stirling played Desdemona in a very graceful and unassuming manner. It was her first appearance in that character; and she has every reason to be pleased with her success therein. Mr. Graham's Iago, and Mr. H. Wallack's Cassio, were both meritoriously performed; and Mr. Walter Lacy was a bustling and amusing Roderigo. Melpomene appears to be encroaching on the throne which Euterpe has so long held at this house. Several tragedies are underlined; amongst the earliest we are to have "Macbeth," with the whole of the music. We anticipate a treat from the performance of Miss Cushman as Lady Macbeth.

HER MAJESTY'S.

The season of 1845 promises to be as brilliant as any of its predecessors. The following outline of the arrangements will show the indefatigable industry of the manager to produce novelty, in addition to the established favourites, in both the opera and ballet departments.

ENGAGEMENTS FOR THE OPERA.—Madame Grisi, Madame Anaide Castellan (of the Imperial Theatre, St. Petersburg, her first appearance at this theatre), Mdlle. Brambilla, Mdlle. Rossetti, Madame Rita Borio (of the principal theatres in Italy, and of the Royal Theatre, Madrid, her first appearance in this country), and Madame Rossi Caccia (of the Theatre Royal, Lisbon, her first appearance in this country). Signor Moriani, Signor Corelli, Signor F. Lablache, Signor Botelli (of La Scala, Milan, his first appearance in this country), and Signor Mario, Signor Fornasari, and Signor Lablache. In addition to the above combination of talent, a conge has been obtained, and an arrangement effected, by which Signor Barroilhet, (of the Academie Royale de Paris), will be secured for a limited number of nights. Director of the Music, Composer, and Conductor, Signor Costa.

The Orchestra will be on the same scale as in the past year.

The Choruses will be numerous and effective. Chorusmaster, Signor Bonconsiglio. (The name of this gentleman augurs well.)

Ballet.—Mdlle. Carlotta Grisi, Mdlle. Lucile Grahn, Mdlle. Cerito, Mdlle. Louise Weiss; Mdlle. Ferdinand, Mdlle. Demelisse, Mdlle. Casson, and Mdlle. Mouvelet (of the Academie Royale de Paris, their first appearance at this theatre); and Mdlle. Taglioni (her farewell season)—the talent of this eminent artiste has been secured for a few farewell nights, previously to her taking leave of the stage. M. St. Leon, M. Gosselin, M. di Mattia (of the Theatre Royal St. Carlos, Naples), M. Bertrand (of the Academie Royale de Paris), M. Perrot, and M. Toussaint (of the Academie Royale de Paris—his first appearance in this country); with a numerous and efficient corps de ballet.

Engagement has also been effected for a few nights with the thirty-six Danseuses Viennoises, who have lately appeared with extraordinary success at the Academie Royale de Paris, and who will appear at the opening of the theatre, before Easter.

Surely Mr. Marshall, who is a real artist, should not be confounded with the other artistes of the establishment.

Principal Artiste of the theatre, Mr. Marshall; Leader of the Orchestra, M. Tolbecque; Maitre de Ballet, M. Perrot; Sous Maitre de Ballet, M. Gosselin; Regisseur de la Danse, M. Bertrand; Leader of the Ballet, M. Nadaud; Composer of the Ballet Music, Signor Pugni.

Arrangements have been made for the appearance of Signor Moriani and Signor Fornasari for the opening of the theatre before Easter.

Bravo! Monsieur Entrepreneur! It would seem that Horace had you in his eye when he wrote the line—

Sedulus importes, opera vehemente minister,

Which being liberally translated, means:—

Industrious importer! who dost bring
Legs that can dance and voices that can sing,
From ev'rywhere you possibly can catch 'em,
Let others try, they never yet could match 'em!

We fear our translator has been too free in his amplified version, although nothing too much could be said of the zeal and assiduity of Mr. Lumley in his capacity of impresario of her Majesty's Theatre. We subjoin some other announcements:—

The subscription will consist of the same number of nights as last season. The repertoire will consist of a selection from the works of the most admired composers.

The theatre will open on Saturday, the 1st of March, when will be produced, first time in this country, Verdi's new opera, "Ernani," with new scenery by Mr. Marshall. Ernani, Signor Moriani; Ruy Gomez, Signor Fornasari; Carlo Quinto, Signor Botelli; and Elvira, Madame Rita Borio. To conclude with a new ballet, by M. Perrot, entitled "La Fille de la Dryade." The music by Signor Pugni. The scenery by Mr. Marshall. In which will appear Mdlle. Lucile Grahn, Mdlle. Louise Weiss, Mdlle. Ferdinand, Mdlle. Demelisse, Mdlle. Casson, Mdlle. Mouvelet, &c. M. Toussaint, M. Gosselin, M. di Mattia, M. Bertrand, M. Perrot, and the Danseuses Viennoises.

Here, as the Malayans would say, is a goodly show of flowers. Nous verrons if there be any fruit forthcoming from this fair promise. Some of them we know—some are yet to be proved—but, no doubt, the manager has done his best to get the best, and if we may not have all that we desire, we must, as the French saying is, be content with that which we have. But in good truth we should not complain, for what with Grisi, Moriani, Tamburini, Fornasari, and Lablache, in the Opera, and Lucile Grahn, Perrot, &c., with a promise of Cerito, Carlotta Grisa, and Taglioni, in the Ballet, we ought to be content.

The house will be opened before Easter, no doubt cleaned up and renovated, as the decorators call it. No better man could succeed poor W. Grieve than C. Marshall, and we therefore anticipate some brilliant effects at his hands. Marshall is a poetical painter, and thoroughly feels the connection between a Picture and a Poem:

One speaks with eloquence—the other looks
Unutterable things.

We heartily wish Mr. Lumley a successful season, and have no doubt that our hope will he realised.

FRENCH PLAYS.

M. Frederic Lemaitre has long been known to us as one of the most celebrated performers on the French stage. No actor possesses a talent so varied, original, and perceptive; there is no other so full of sentiment, power, and terrible energy. He attracted the whole population of Paris through the modest portal of the Folies-Dramatique, to witness his unequalled impersonation of Robert Macaire; and subsequently created a furore at the Varietés in Dumas' drama of "Kean." Still later, at the Porte St. Martin, in the revival of the "Tour de Nesle," he played Buridan in a manner that almost effaced the recollection of the original representative of the rôle, M. Bocage, and caused that large theatre to be literally crammed to the ceiling night after night, by the most intelligent audiences, to whom the play had been almost worn out by repeated representations, yet who still found the greatest delight in following the actor's original interpretation of the character. After this, "Don Cæsar de Bazan" came to supplant the other favourites; and M. Lemaitre's performance of the reckless, honourable, dissipated Spaniard, covered him with fresh laurels; and, lastly, "La Dame de Saint Tropez" appeared, and ran nearly one hundred successive nights, resting upon his unequalled acting in the principal character. M. Lemaitre appeared at the St. James's Theatre on Monday evening for the first time, and, in the drama last mentioned, achieved a complete and decided success, in spite of the almost revolting nature of the piece, which is taken, and in some points very closely, from the story of Madame Laffarge. "La Dame de Saint Tropez" is a drama in five acts. Nothing can be more common-place and wearisome than the first three—nothing more terribly interesting than the conclusion. The interest, however, is, if we may be allowed the term, physical: depending entirely upon M. Lemaitre's marvellous representation of the gradual effects of poison, rather than any ingenuity in the construction of the drama. He plays the part of Georges Maurice, a wealthy shipbuilder, residing at St. Tropez. He falls in love with Hortense (Mdlle. Clarisse), the daughter of a noble house, whose father has come to great misfortune, and is almost in a state of beggary. Hortense is already attached to a young physician, Charles d'Arbel (M. Pascal), but, to reinstate her father in his former wealth, she consents to marry Maurice. The union proves anything but a happy one. In the third act we find Maurice complaining bitterly of his wife's coldness: he is deeply in love with her, and studies her every wish, but meets with nothing in return but indifference. In the meantime, Antoine (M. Oudinot), a relation and sort of dependent in the establishment of Maurice, is engaged by him to take a considerable sum of money to Paris; and also receives a hint that he will be heir to a large property, upon the death of the ship-builder. Too impatient to wait for his demise, he forms a plan to poison Maurice, and contrives his schemes so subtlely that Hortense is suspected of the crime. Charles d'Arbel, who is now practising as a physician of eminence, first discovers traces of poison in a beverage which has been prepared by Hortense, and is in a measure instrumental to the fixing of the guilt upon her. Maurice, from her previous dislike to him, firmly convinced that she is guilty, yet still loving her, prevails on her to fly, that she may avoid the pursuit of justice. She, however, conscious of her innocence, refuses. Nothing induces her unhappy husband to alter his opinion, until, by chance, whilst sitting at his dressing-table, he beholds Antoine, in a looking glass which is before him, drugging something, intended for him, not thinking that he could be seen. This leads to the denouement. The real culprit is discovered, and Maurice dies, recommending Hortense to the care of her first and only love d'Arbel.

This is the framework of the play; and it will be seen that there is nothing particularly remarkable in it, although the production of two clever dramatists, Messrs. Auriel, Bourgeois, and Dennery. Fifty melodramas might be taken from the repertoires of our own minor theatres, with far more interest and incident in their construction. It is indebted solely for its great success to the extraordinary acting of M. Lemaitre, who, in the fourth and fifth acts, gave one of the most frightfully vivid pictures of gradual death resulting from poison that was ever witnessed—so terrible, yet so faithful in every detail, and so completely enthralling the attention of the audience, that the revolting nature of the drama was entirely lost sight of. Every speech—almost every look and gesture—was greeted with long-continued applause. Although the house was crowded to inconvenience, the most intense silence prevailed during the action. Although an universal shudder could at times be distinctly heard, when the consummate excellence of M. Lemaitre's performance brought a fresh picture of human agony and suffering before the audience, it was not the sound of those affected by deep pathos or misery, but of horror at the reality of the impersonation. At one time, however, a titter broke in upon the wrapt attention of the house. In the fourth act, where Maurice hears that the name of the physician is d'Arbel, of whom he has long been jealous, he starts, with a howl of despair, into an attitude which appeared somewhat extravagant, and reminded every one so perfectly of the famous picture by Daumier, of "Robert Macaire," published in various illustrated periodicals, that it produced an almost involuntary laugh from all who were familiar with the Charivari. The features of this renowned hero were taken by the French artist from M. Lemaitre's, who made the part completely his own. His profile, in the early part of the drama, reminded us somewhat of Mr. Phelps. His voice is peculiar, but capable of great modulation and significance. It is long since we have seen similar acting.

Mdlle. Clarisse played with energy, but we discovered nothing out of the common way in her performance. If we mistake not, she also was the original representative of the character she played in Paris. M. Oudinot was very effective as Antoine; and M. Cartigny excellent as a notary who is teazed by a young wife (Mdlle. E. Forgeot). He is a sterling performer. The piece was repeated on Wednesday; and "Don Cæsar de Bazan" is announced for representation on Monday.

COVENT GARDEN.

In spite of the Chinese Collection and its intelligent catalogue—in spite of our increasing intercourse with the Celestial Empire, and the variety of well-written books upon the country generally which are from time to time appearing, we find we are still very much behind hand in our ideas of the real manners and customs of that remarkable people—at least to judge from the fashion in which they are depicted on the stage. They are addicted to garments of that glowing chintz, which forms the usual draperies to beds in furnished lodgings. They have gay hats, hung round with bells; and they constantly keep the forefingers of each hand pointing to the skies, on each side of their head, and level with their ears. This may or may not be true; but we should not altogether believe in a Chinese piece if we did not see these conventional rules preserved. And as such, we were highly gratified by the spectacle of "The Shadow on the Water," produced at this house on Tuesday evening; or rather, we were pleased with the spectacular portion of it, for the drama, in the abstract, was not altogether so great a success. We had processions, and banners, and dancing-girls (with naturally-sized feet) and lanterns; and had there been a corresponding brilliancy of construction and dialogue, there would have been nothing left to be desired; but unfortunately this was not the case. And yet there was some humour in the piece, but it was not well worked out: one felt annoyed to perceive how near everything was to being funny, and how it stopped short of the same. We cannot give the plot very closely. There was an Emperor of China, on wonderfully good terms with himself, who shut his daughter up because it had been foretold that she would marry the cleverest man in China, and he would not allow that there was any body more talented than himself. Then we had the clever man, ipse, who was up to remarkable dodges, but evidently badly brought up, eventually, however, succeeding in marrying the Princess during the Feast of Lanterns—a scene which is as essential to the due formation of an entire Chinese piece as a quarrel between a light comedy nephew and an irritable old man in a Haymarket farce, and which has characterised "Aladdin," "The Bronze Horse," "The Siege of Amoy," "The Magic Mirror," et hoc genus omne, from time immemorial. All the ladies and gentlemen concerned in the representation certainly did their utmost to insure its success, either with their heads or heels; and every possible pains had been taken in getting it up, especially in the scenic department, cleverly superintended by Mr. John Macfarren; and we are bound to state that the audience were generally pleased, although, to be sure, once or twice there were a few expressions of feeling which could not be mistaken for applause. But however much they might have exhibited their discontent during the progress of the piece, the dancing and lanterns at the end set everything to rights, and the last impression left was a favourable one.

LYCEUM.

The present season will terminate on the 7th of March, the theatre having continued open uninterruptedly for a twelvemonth. During the recess before Easter, the house will be entirely cleansed and re-decorated, which it stands much in need of; and we understand some alterations will be made in the disposition of the dress circle of boxes. Mr. Grogan, the box book-keeper, took his benefit here on Tuesday, which was in every respect a bumper, the entertainments being "A Trip to Kissingen," "A Model of a Wife," and "Valentine and Orson." An excellent concert also took place between the pieces, at which several eminent vocalists assisted.

MUSIC.

CROSBY HALL.

The fifth of the series of Concerts of Sacred Music, at Crosby Hall, took place on Wednesday evening. The selection was marked by the same excellent taste and judgment that distinguished the former concerts, comprising pieces from the works of Beethoven, Handel, Calcott, Mendelssohn, Preyer, Himmel, Purcell, Mozart, and Sebastian Bach. The principal vocalists were Miss Rainforth and Miss Steele; Mr. Machin and Mr. Francis, supported by a very efficient chorus. The chorus of Mendelssohn, "O come let us worship," was beautifully given. Several of the solos were encored, while the whole of the performance was so well received, that it was evident the audience derived an unusual amount of gratification from it. The hall was more numerously attended even than on former evenings.

M. THALBERG'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

But "will he not come again?"

This Briareus Pianist—this thousand-power digitalist, gave a concert on Wednesday evening, at the Hanover-square Rooms, which were crowded to suffocation, even in this cold weather. He never played better. But it is a pity that a man of such moyens should not, like our Bennett, trust to his own resources (for he possesses them), and write—that is, compose—original music, instead of flirting with the beautiful theme of another's imagination, in fanciful variations. Fantasias are a hybrid species of composition—a kind of musical corruscation—a sky rocketing, that is brilliant for the moment, but which soon fades, and leaves all in darkness.

The lyrical portion of the entertainment was admirably supported by Ma dame Schloss, Miss Lucombe, and that "fellow of infinite mirth," John Parry.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

Mr. Alfred Ormonde, a gentleman who delivered some lectures a few months since at the Adelaide Gallery, appeared at the Olympic on Monday, in the character of Romeo. We had not an opportunity of witnessing his performance, but, according to the notices of our daily contemporaries, it was meritorious. He was advertised to appear on Thursday in "La Dame de Saint Tropez"—the piece now performing at the St. James's Theatre.

We hear that burlesque extravaganzas are to form the staple novelties of the theatres for Easter. That at the Adelphi is reported to be founded on a story of chivalric adventure, well known in juvenile libraries: and that at the Lyceum upon a popular nursery chronicle, of which Mr. John Parry has given a lyrical version to the world.

Mr. Douglas Jerrold has a five act comedy accepted at the Haymarket. It will be brought out very soon after Easter.

The minor theatres are nearly all putting forth the new French toxicological drama as the principal attraction. We have said the Olympic retained the French title. At other houses we find it called "The Deed of Horror," "The Bride of Woe," and "The Poisoners and the Victim."

Sadler's Wells is still flourishing. "Richard the Third" was to be produced on Thursday, from the text of Shakspeare, and not the mutilated acting edition.

We are requested to contradict the announcement that Mr. Albert Smith would appear at Mr. Frank Matthews's benefit, at the Lyceum, next week. It was the result of a mistake, which was very soon adjusted. Mr. Matthews puts forward a good bill of fare, and we have no doubt but that, from the respect in which he is held, he will draw together a goodly muster of his friends.

A new three act comedy, by Mr. R. B. Peake, to be called "The Sheriff of the County," is announced for representation at the Haymarket, on Monday. "Old Heads and Young Hearts" is approaching the end of its run, having been played, if we mistake not, upwards of sixty nights.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Notwithstanding the arrivals of English wheat up to our markets during the week have been only to a moderate extent, the demand for that article has been in a very sluggish state. However, the finest parcels have mostly found buyers at full prices; but all other kinds have suffered a decline of quite 1s per quarter, without effecting clearances on either market-day The show of fine foreign wheat has been only moderate, yet the sale for it has ruled dull, at barely stationary figures. In bonded grain, next to nothing doing. The supply of barley has been moderately good. Most descriptions have moved off slowly, yet we can notice no alteration in the currencies. Malt, oats, beans, peas, and flour, dull in sale, at late figures.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 48s; ditto, white, 46s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 30s to 36s; grinding barley, 27s to 30s; distilling, 26s to 30s; malting ditto, 33s to 35s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 58s to 63s; brown ditto, 56s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 59s to 60s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 23s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s to 22s; ditto, white, 21s to 23s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 38s to 40s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 35s to 36s; white, 33s to 35s; boilers, 36s to 38s, per quarter. Town made flour, 42s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, —s to —s; Dantzig, red, 38s to 42s; white, 50s to 54s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s to 24s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 16s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to—, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—There has not been so much business doing in this market as of late and in some instances the rates have had a downward tendency.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic, crushing, 40s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa —s to —s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s, per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 18s, per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 8s to 14s; white ditto, 10s to 13s. Tares, 6s to 7s 6d, per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £24 to £26, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 5s. per 1000: Rapeseed cakes, £6 15s to £7, per ton. Canary, 40s to 50s, per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d, per 4 lb loaf.

Tea.—This market has become somewhat heavy for most descriptions, yet in prices we have no alteration to notice. At public sale of 6775 packages, Souchongs sold at a decline of 1d per lb; but Hysons were 2d dearer. By private contract, common sound Congou is selling at 10½d to 11d per lb.

Sugar.—For all descriptions of raw sugar the demand is active, at an advance of 2s to 3s per cwt; but in refined goods, very little is doing and the rates are not supported.

Coffee.—There is rather more doing in this article, at, in some instances, an improvement of from 1s to 2s per cwt. Good ordinary Ceylon has produced 51s to 51s 6d per cwt.

Cocoa.—West India is dull, at 41s to 42s for red Grenada.

Provisions.—For Irish butter there is an improved inquiry at 1s per cwt more money. Carlows, landed, have produced 92s to 98s: Carrick, 90s to 96s; Cork, 92s to 96s; Waterford, 88s to 92s; and Limerick, 88s to 92s per cwt. Dutch butter moves off steadily, at 104s to 108s for fine Friesland, and 100s to 108s for fine stubble Kiel. Dorset butter is selling at 54s to 56s per firkin: and French, 16s per dozen. Bacon is a slow sale, at 40s to 42s for prime small meat and 37s to 39s for larger. Hams dull, on easier terms. Lard, and all other kinds of provisions as last quoted.

Tallow.—Russia is quiet, on easier terms. P. Y. C. on the spot is offered at 39s 6d to 39s 9d and for delivery, the price is 39s 3d to 39s 6d per cwt. Town tallow, 41s net cash. The deliveries are rather on the increase.

Oils.—This market is somewhat active, and most of the holders are demanding advanced rates.

Hops.—In pockets, of last year's growth, a good business is doing, at late currencies; but of other kinds the sales are only to a limited extent.

Wool.—Since the conclusion of the public sales, most qualities of wool have been in active request, at improved quotations.

Potatoes.—The best kinds of potatoes are in good request, at 75s to 80s; but other descriptions move off heavily, at 65s to 70s per ton.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 12s; useful ditto, £4 15s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s; wheat straw, £1 18s to £2, per load.

Coals.—Carr's Hartley, 16s 6d; Holywell Main, 17s; New Tanfield, 16s 3d; West Wylam, 16s 3d; Wylam, 16s; Hetton, 20s 3d; Lambton, 20s; Adelaide, 19s 6d; Tennant's, 17s, per ton.

Smithfield.—Prime stock has been in steady request at, in some instances, rather improved rates. In other kinds very little doing, at previous currencies. Beef, from 2s 6d to 4s; mutton, 2s 8d to 4s 4d; veal, 4s to to 5s 4d; and pork, 3s to 4s 4d, per 8 lbs, to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—We have to report a steady inquiry for each kind of meat, the prices of which are freely supported. Beef, from 2s 6d to 3s 6d; mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 8d; veal, 4s to 5s 2d; and pork, 2s 8d to 4s 4d, per 8lbs, by the carcase.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market was very flat at the commencement of the week, Consols receding to 99½ to ⅝ for money. A large purchase on behalf of the Court of Chancery on Wednesday, however, improved the tone of the Market, but although the price advanced about one quarter per cent., it has been barely supported. The absence of business and the general feeling that a further decline must take place, tends to prevent any improvement in quotations. The Exchequer Market has also been heavy. The customary Government notice appeared on Tuesday, calling in the March bills, for payment or renewal. The new bills will bear the same interest as the old, viz., 1½d. per diem. The price of the advertised bills is 54s. Bank Stock has partaken slightly of the downward influence, closing at 212½. India quotes 282½. The Commissioner for the Savings Banks took his purchase on Tuesday in Reduced at 100, the closing quotation is 100¼. Consols close at 99⅝ for money and time. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 103¾. Long Annuities, 12 1-16. Exchequer Bills, 56 to 55.

The general tone of the Foreign Market during the week has been flat, with little business doing. Several sales for the fall in Spanish, Columbian, and Mexican were made on Tuesday, which caused a depression of prices, although the extent was comparatively trifling. Portuguese improved upon the arrival of the mail on Tuesday, and advanced to 59 to 60 on Wednesday; which price it has since maintained, and closes at. The report that a general amalgamation of the Active and Three per Cent. Spanish Stocks was about to be proposed by the Finance Minister, and a new Three per Cent. Stock created, has not materially influenced the price of the Three per Cents., but the Actives have improved to 28¼. The Three per Cents. close at 40⅞; Mexican is heavy at 35¼; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents quote 62⅞ to 63; Four per Cents. Certificates, 98⅝; Columbian, about 13⅞ to 14⅛.

The Great Western Railway has improved its half-year's dividend to four per cent., leaving a balance of £13,613 to the credit of the next half-year. The estimated cost for construction of new lines is £3,050,000, which was readily agreed to by a very unanimous meeting. The London and Birmingham have not quite the same success to report, but declare the usual dividend of five per cent for the half-year. The Trent Valley line is to be leased, and the Churnet Valley line, at the expiration of five years from its opening, is to be amalgamated at the relative value of its shares in the market. The balance remaining after the payment of the dividend will be £47,093. The South Western Railway proprietors agree to a dividend of £2 per share, and report an improved traffic. There will remain, after paying the dividend, a sum of £9637 18s. 11d. The Blackwall Railway meeting on Thursday was very satisfactory. A dividend of 3s. per share was declared, and the report was favourable to the increase of traffic.

The Share Market has been tolerably quiet during the week, speculation having greatly decreased. The announcement of the approvals of the Board of Trade produced no sensation. Prices generally, although supported, seem a little induced to yield upon the proposed lines, and more particularly those bearing high premiums. The French lines, however, still continue good, and are rather more in demand. The prices of the leading shares at closing are:—Bristol and Exeter, (new shares) 33; Caledonian, 7¾; Cambridge and Lincoln, 3¾; Churnet Valley, 8¼; Direct Northern, 2¼; Eastern Counties, 17⅜; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 60; Great North of England, 190; Great Western, 175; Harwich, 1⅜; Lancaster and Carlisle, 31; Blackwall, 7⅜; Brighton, 58¾; Greenwich, 10¾; Croydon, 18⅜; Midland, 127½; Newcastle and Berwick, 49¾; Rugby, Worcester, and Tring, 3⅜; Dovers, 40; Trent Valley, 19½; Yarmouth and Norwich, 27⅞; York and North Midland (Extension), 12½; Glasgow and Dumfries, 1¼; Sheffield and Manchester, 105; Boulogne and Amiens, 5⅛; Bordeaux and Toulouse, 2⅜; Great North of England, 5⅜; Orleans and Varzon, 14¼; Paris and Lyons, 3; Paris and Orleans, 45⅛; Paris and Rouen, 47½.

THE Readers of this Paper are most respectfully referred to the representation of removing King's-cross, in the ILLUSTRATED NEWS of Feb. 15th, 1845, in page 108, where may be seen, in the background, Mr. CABBURN'S DISPENSARY, for the Cure of RHEUMATISM, GOUT, WEAKNESS of the LIMBS, SPINAL AFFECTIONS, &c., at which place one of the most effectual remedies ever offered to the public may be had in bottles at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 22s., and of all principal venders in the kingdom. It is positively under the sanction and recommendation of the nobility and faculty, as may be seen in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.—Ask for CABBURN'S oil for the cure of Rheumatism, likewise a sovereign remedy for chilblains.

EXTRAORDINARY CURE OF A BAD LEG, at HORNCASTLE, by HOLLOWAY'S PILLS and OINTMENT.—A few days since, Mr. John Simpson, a highly respectable Bookseller in that town, states that a gentleman of his acquaintance had been suffering for years from one of the worst description of bad legs, frequently enduring the most excruciating pain. He had been under the care of several medical men without obtaining the least benefit. This gentleman, however, has just been cured by these invaluable Medicines, after every other treatment failed. The Ointment will cure Chilblains and chapped hands in a few hours. Sold at Professor Holloway's Establishment, 244, Strand (where advice may be had gratis); and by almost all respectable Vendors of Medicine throughout the civilised world.

SHIRTS AND NEW ALBERT CRAVATS.—W. E. WHITELOCK, 166, STRAND, continues to pay the same liberal price for making Shirts that he has done for the last twenty years, therefore obtains the best work. MOURNING—Court, Family, and Complimentary.—The Proprietors of the London General Mourning Warehouse, Nos. 247 and 249, Regent-street, beg respectfully to remind families requiring mourning attire, that every article of the very best description, requisite for a complete outfit of mourning, may be procured from this Establishment at a moment's notice. Widows' and Family Mourning is always kept made up, and a note particularizing the mourning required, will insure immediate attention either in town or country. Ladies requiring Silks or Velvets for Dresses, Mantles, Cloaks, &c., are particularly invited to a trial of the new Corbeau Silks and Velvets introduced at this house. They will be found not only more durable, but the colour very superior, unaffected by the strongest acid or even sea-water Black and Grey, and Fancy Mourning Silks, Cashmeres, Plaids and Merinos of every description. The Show Rooms are replete with every novelty for mourning, in millinery, flowers, Tulle and Nett Sleeves, Collars, Berthes, Headdresses, trimmings, &c., &c.—W. C. JAY and Co.

COD LIVER OIL.—Every day brings fresh testimony of the extraordinary value of this NATURAL REMEDY in the CURE of GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, DISEASED JOINTS, SPINAL and GLANDULAR AFFECTIONS, LUMBAGO, SCROFULOUS ULCERS, and other external diseases. READ THE FOLLOWING CURE.

TESTIMONY OF DR. MARSHALL HALL.
(See Medical Gazette, vol. 10, p. 796.)

"The celebrated Dr. Marshall Hall has received cases where this remedy has performed cures when all others had been tried fruitlessly. He states it also to be a prevention for chapped hands, and other diseases inducing excoriation and fissures of the skin. He alludes to the case of a lady 'whose hands had been literally crippled for several years, from painful pustular fissured swellings of the fingers, palm, and back part.' The cure may be conceived from the mere fact of her having applied upwards of two hundred leeches. She experienced great advantage from the first application of the Oil, and was speedily cured."

Particular directions for its proper application, are given with each genuine bottle of the remedy, which bears the signature of the only MERCANTILE AGENTS, JONES & Co., 201, Strand. Sold in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. each, by all respectable Medicine Vendors.

PARR'S LIFE PILLS.—The extraordinary success of this medicine is the wonder of the age; it has been tried by hundreds of thousands as an aperient, and has in every instance done good; it has never in the slightest degree impaired the most delicate constitution. Tens of thousands have testified that perseverance in the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS will completely cure any disease, and are living witnesses of the benefit received from this invaluable medicine.—Sheets of testimonials and the "Life and Times of Old Parr," may be had, gratis, of every respectable Medicine Vendor throughout the Kingdom.

Beware of spurious imitations of the above medicine. None are genuine unless the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS" are in WHITE LETTERS ON A RED GROUND, engraved on the Government Stamp, pasted round each box; also the fac-simile of the signature of the Proprietors, "T. ROBERTS and Co." London, on the directions.

Sold in boxes at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and family packets at 11s., by Edwards, 67, St. Paul's; Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Churchyard, London; Mottershead and Co., Manchester; and J. and R. NATIONAL LOAN FUND LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY, 26, Cornhill, London.—Capital £500,000.—Empowered by Act of Parliament.
This Institution offers many important and substantial advantages with respect to both Life Assurances and Deferred Annuities. The Assured has, on all occasions, the power to borrow, without expense or forfeiture of the Policy, two thirds of the Premiums paid (see table); also the option of selecting benefits, and the conversion of his interests to meet other conveniences or necessity. Assurances for terms of years are granted on the lowest possible rates.

DIVISION OF PROFITS:—
The steady success and increasing prosperity of the Society, has enabled the Directors, at the last annual investigation, to declare a second Bonus, averaging 60 per Cent on the amounts invested on each policy effected on the Profit scale.

Age.	Sum.	Premium.	Year.	Bonus added.	Bonus in Cash.	Permanent reduc. of Premium.	Sum the Assured may Borrow on Policy.

NEW DUET. Composed by CHARLES E. HORN, called "LAZY MOON, LAZY MOON."—"The duet before us is one of Mr. Horn's most captivating productions. We recommend it sincerely, as well deserving the attention of vocalists and amateurs."—Morning Post, Nov. 27, 1844. "Few composers have been more successful in their vocal music than Mr. Horn. The Misses Williams, Miss Dolby, &c., are now singing it with the greatest success. We think it quite equal to his well-known duet of 'I know a bank.' 'Lazy Moon' is one of those compositions so full of melody that it cannot fail to please wherever it may be sung."—Musical Meview.

Numerous other Songs, Duets, Glees, &c., 3d. each. Lists, Gratis, of the Publisher, DAVIDSON, Water-street, leading from Blackfriars-bridge, towards the Temple.

THE HAND-BOOK TO THE PIANOFORTE, comprising an easy Rudimental Introduction to the Study of that Instrument and Music in General; the Art of Fingering, according to the Modes of the best Masters, exemplified in various Exercises, Scales, &c., in all the Major and Minor Keys; and interspersed by Relaxations from Study, consisting of Popular Melodies and Romances, and Selections from Pianoforte Compositions of some of the most celebrated Ma ters. Also, a Short and Easy Introduction to Harmony or Counterpoint, and a New Vocabulary of Terms. By J. AUGUSTINE WADE, Author of "The Dwellings of Fancy," "Songs of the Flowers," "The Two Houses of Grenada," an Opera; "The Prophecy," an Oratorio, &c. &c.
"From the first 'example' to the last 'exercise' everything is brought before the learner in the clearest manner, and the means of conquering each new difficulty as it arises literally placed at his fingers' ends. Indeed, after successfully digesting some sixty pages, and mastering the 'digital' and other exercises here given, [illegible] not fear the thickest army of semi-demisemis, or the most whimsically-noted passage of the most gifted manipulator of the key-board. The work comprises, in addition, a brief and excellent treatise on the elements of harmony, developing the laws of composition in a simple and sound manner; and we altogether warmly recommend the book to public favour." Literary Gazette, October 19.
"The book now before us is the most admirable instance we have ever met with of a man acknowledged as a poet and composer condescending to construct a threshold to harmony. Mr. Wade has written the best first-book we ever read."—Sunday Times.
"This is one of the best works of musical instruction which has been brought under our notice; the author unites an earnest love of music with sound knowledge of the art, and has, therefore, given a life and animation to his lessons, which relieve the dry and technical details of teaching."—The League, October 12.
"An ingenious and tasteful work, comprehending a large amount of information in a comparatively small space. The volume seems to us calculated to be very useful; and it is certainly ORNAMENTAL also, being handsomely printed and bound, and embellished with a striking portrait of the celebrated pianist, Franz Liszt."—Watchman, October 9.
"We regard it, on the whole, as very able and useful, and recommend it to the attention of students of the Pianoforte."—John Bull, October 19.

THE BEST ALMANACK FOR 1845.
Now Publishing, 64 pages, handsome quarto, gilt edges (no Advertisements), with EIGHTY ENGRAVINGS!
Price One Shilling, the
ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK, and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.
It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.
The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Almanack.
EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.
"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.
"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the Calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post, Nov. 20.
"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries; and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, 'scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15
"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets, as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.
"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.
"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy."—Era, Nov. 24.
"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish almanacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper"—Gardeners' Chronicle.
"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The Illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

LESSONS IN MILLINERY AND DRESSMAKING.—Mrs. HOWELL, of 304, Regent-street, two doors from Margaret-street, sole inventress of teaching the art of Dressmaking in a series of Lessons, undertakes to convey to persons of the meanest capacity a correct knowledge of cutting, fitting, and executing, in the most finished style, in Six Lessons, for One Guinea. The correctness of this mode can be fully substantiated by reference to pupils.—Millinery and Dress Rooms.

CHINA, GLASS and EARTHENWARE.—JOSEPH WHITE (from Messrs. GREEN'S, St. Paul's Church-yard) begs most respectfully to inform the Nobility, Gentry and Public, that he has recently opened Premises at No. 210, Regent-street, with an entirely new and splendid Stock of China, Glass, and Earthenware, which he is offering for Sale upon the best terms, for Cash only. Chandeliers, Lustres, Candelabra, and Table and Hanging Lamps, and every variety of Ornamental China. No. 210, Regent-street, opposite Conduit-street.

PORTLAND VASE.—Some few casts in Plaster, prepared with Gum, remain of this elegant Vase. They were made by the late Mr. James Tassie, from the mould taken by Pichler, the eminent Gem Engraver at Rome, from the original before it came into the possession of Sir William Hamilton. The price is Five Guineas with Stand and Shade. The Mould was destroyed, so that impressions multiplied must be taken from one of the original casts, and will be less perfect.
Address, Mr. TASSIE, 8, Upper Phillimore-place, Kensington.

TO WIDOWERS and SINGLE GENTLEMEN.—A GENTLEWOMAN, by birth and education, seeks an appointment as SUPERINTENDENT of a Widower's or Single Gentleman's house. A Widower having a young family, their education would also be attended to. This Gentlewoman is at present in town, and cannot be too highly praised for her excellent management and economy, good temper, and kindness to all around her. She speaks French, acquired in Paris, and would have no objection to travel with an Invalid.—Apply at 43, Pall-mall; or to G. R., Post-office (near the Museum), Great Russell-street, London.

ALBION HOUSE, 77, ST. PAUL'S CHURCH-YARD.—HOUSEHOLD LINEN-DRAPERY.—Families and the Public in general are respectfully informed that BAILEY and Co. will offer for sale a Manufacturer's Stock of linen sheetings, 3 yards wide, at 1s. 5½d. per yard; a decidedly cheap lot of Irish linens, particularly a few chests at 9½d. per yard; several bales of quilts, table-cloths, long cloths; Hoyle's new lilac prints, 2s. 11½d, the full dress; several thousand Glenlyon dresses at 6s. 9d.
Observe—BAILEY and Co, Albion House, 77, St. Paul's Churchyard.

VAUXHALL COMPOSITE CANDLES, 8s. 6d. per dozen. PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES, 10s. 6d. per doz. GENUINE WAX CANDLES, 28s. per doz. These three sorts of Candles are all precisely alike in their burning qualities, but the Vauxhall Composites are rather softer than the Price's Patent, and thence the difference in price. Even those who are compelled to study economy alone, should burn them in preference to Tallow dips. Patent Cocoa Nut Lamp Oil, warranted equal in every respect to the finest Sperm, 4s. per gallon.—WM. MARCHANT, 253, Regent-circus, Oxford-street.

VAUXHALL COMPOSITE CANDLES, 8½d. per lb.—PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES, 10½d. per lb. These are the London cash prices, but the Country ones vary with the distance from town. Both sorts burn exactly as well as the finest wax, and are cheaper, allowing for the light, than Tallow Moulds. Sold wholesale to the trade by Edward Price and Co., Belmont, Vauxhall; Palmer and Co., Sutton-street, Clerkenwell; and William Marchant, 253, Regent Circus, Oxford-street. Until these Candles become generally sold throughout the country, EDWARD PRICE and Co. will supply any private families unable to obtain them in their own neighbourhood, with a quantity not less than £5 worth, direct from the factory. On a line being addressed to Belmont, Vauxhall, enclosing a Post-office Order for £5 (payable to Edward Price and Co., not to Edward Price or Mr. Price), they will forward a box of the Vauxhall Composite, or of the others, or a mixed box as may be directed, to that exact amount.

CLOSE OF HOLIDAYS.—Now that the season of annual festivity is about to terminate, and the respective boarding-schools be re-instated by the busy throng of youthful aspirants, the personal comfort and attractions of whom become naturally an object with friends and relatives of great solicitude, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for accelerating the growth, and for preserving and beautifying the Hair; ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for preserving the Skin and Complexion, and removing Cutaneous Eruptions; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, for beautifying the Teeth, and preserving the Gums, are universally considered indispensable in the requisite accompaniments of the decorative repository. No. 148.—Vol. VI.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1845. [Sixpence.

MEDICAL REFORM.

ON TUESDAY Evening, Sir James Graham re-introduced his bill of last session, for the better regulation of the practice of medicine throughout the United Kingdom. The measure does not come before it was wanted; the healing art in this country was in a strangely confused state—a mixture of rules and reckless disregard of them—and of old distinctions that society had long outgrown; it was a profession most highly estimated, and requiring eminent learning and attainments, and yet it was the one of all others in which there was the largest amount of successful ignorance, pretence, and empiricism. It was governed by two or three corporate bodies, yet could scarcely be said to be effectually controlled by any. It contained every conceivable kind of practitioner within its pale—from the humble "adviser" of the dirty street in the suburbs, living next door to the butcher, and being more than half a grocer himself, selling with impartial readiness his lotions or his lucifer matches, and "giving" his advice for nothing, estimating it probably at its true value—up to the fashionable physician of the fashionable square, visiting only fashionable patients, and prescribing the last fashionable remedy in vogue. Between these two extremes might be found every variety of manners, rank, attainments, and all kinds of differences in success. And, yet, in the midst of the chaos, certain etiquettes and distinctions were, not without reason, perhaps, observed. Still influenced by the feeling that must have been exceedingly strong in the days when the surgeon was a barber also, the physician properly so called, did not act as a surgeon. But the latter having long since risen from his ancient degraded position, had become as much of a physician as many of those who claimed that exclusive title. To the skill of hand, the strength of nerve, and the knowledge of anatomy, indispensable to the surgeon, he had added, in most cases a good, in many a profound knowledge of physic also; it seems almost astonishing how two branches of an art so nearly allied, should ever have been separated, or that society should ever have been compelled to seek in one man the skill that must be exercised in operating with the knife, and in another the knowledge necessary to complete the cure by the after treatment of diet and medicine. The two kinds of skill seem to be the most effectual for good when most closely united. It is said—with what amount of truth we know not—that the French school of surgery is almost unrivalled for its skill, and its "brilliant" operations, but that it has paid too exclusive an attention to the operating branch of the curative process, and comparatively overlooked the duty of the physician. The consequence is, that though more difficult operations are said to be successfully performed in the French schools and hospitals than in England (even this perhaps may be disputed), more of the patients sink subsequently from the after-treatment there than with us. This is a common belief, and possibly an erroneous one, but the result stated would certainly ensue, if the two things were divided, one being well performed and the other neglected. But in England the difference between the Physician and the Surgeon has for a long period been disappearing, or rather the two professions have been blended. The "general practitioner" is, in most ordinary cases, required to act in both capacities, especially, as Sir James Graham points out, in country districts, where the division of labour, as applied to the medical profession in cities and large towns, does not exist. It is by no means too much to say that the great mass of the public has nearly lost sight of the old distinction between physicians and surgeons; this has arisen from the latter adding to his surgical skill the medical knowledge of the physician. Against the tendency of the public to procure attendance in both respects in the readiest manner, all rules and laws of Colleges and Corporations, framed for the purpose of keeping up a distinction men would not recognise, have become useless; and all of them, or nearly so, are now about to be merged and reduced to a conformity with existing usages, by the provisions of Sir James Graham's Bill.

It is rather a comprehensive measure, and contains so many alterations from the bill of last session, that it may almost be called a new one. We do not see, at present, that there can be any insurmountable objections to it, either from the profession or the public. The former is protected against false pretenders, and the latter ought to be thankful for the benefit that a more regular and uniform system of examination of candidates for admission to the profession will confer on them. The first object of the measure is to establish a College of Health, which will at once superintend the medical education of the country, and act as a Board, to which the Government can refer on all questions connected with the sanatory condition of the people. We think these very distinct duties might have been divided with advantage. The second intention of the bill is to abolish all medical monopolies, and to give to all practitioners equality of attainments, equality of rights, and the same facilities for practice, in every part of the kingdom. There will be a registry of qualified persons, and these qualified persons only will be eligible to receive public medical offices. With respect to these persons so registered, the Apothecaries' Act is repealed, but that Company is still left with the power of prosecuting any person assuming any medical title or designation. This it is a misdemeanour to do, punishable by fine and imprisonment, or both; but the act permits any one to exercise his skill, or the want of it, as before, provided he does not dub himself doctor, and will run the risk of an indictment for manslaughter, or an action for damages, should any mischief be done. There are some other enactments in the bill that will be highly useful, and, on the whole, it may be pronounced a salutary measure; in practice, except so far as examinations are concerned, it may be doubted whether it will greatly modify the present system; the avowed object of Sir James Graham is to raise the character and position of the "general practitioner"—a title that will now become a legal and recognised one.

Almost all our legislation hitherto has been devoted to the interests of property and trade. But in matters of a higher kind, in what affects the education of the people, their religious and moral training, far less has been done, far less has been attempted, than from a nation of such vast resources might have been expected. In the same manner the system of laissez faire has permitted the medical profession to grow up into all kinds of anomalies, leaving the people necessarily, to a great extent, unable to distinguish between the pretender to knowledge and the real possessor of that invaluable quality, unprotected against the consequences of that ignorance. This bill is an attempt to establish some sort of control, to fix a standard of qualification, and to give the people a security for the abilities of those to whom the lives and health of thousands are entrusted. The really able man will not fear any test that may be required of him; if the inefficient one is checked by its application, society is the gainer by the wholesome severity.

"Throw physic to the dogs" may be the exclamation of the ruddy and robust, or that happiest of mortals, according to Shakspeare, "the rich man who hath not the gout." But the visitation of disease throws the strongest into abject dependence on the knowledge often so lightly esteemed, but in the time of need so keenly appreciated. With most truthful levity has the poet described the two feelings when he says—

> This is the way physicians mend or end us
> Secundem artem; but although we jeer
> While well—when ill we call them to attend us
> Without the least propensity to sneer,
> When that hiatus maxime deflendus
> To be filled up by spade and mattock's near.

It is at the time when disease has wasted the frame and despair is standing by the couch, the dark herald of the coming of the King of Terrors, that men prize beyond all wealth the skill that is the last human succour standing between them and the grave. If there is one vocation more than another deserving of all honour, it is that of the skilled and humane physician. In old times the priest was the leech also. The functions are divided now, but still there are moments when an almost sacred character attaches to him in whose hands, under a disposing Providence, "are the issues of life and death." If the inward qualities of the man are unequal or unworthy of his important duties, it becomes a calamity, and any attempt to give society a security that skill and ability shall not be lacking, deserves, at least, earnest consideration; if proved to be a judicious one, it ought to receive every support.

IBRAHIM PACHA.

The arrival of intelligence from Egypt this week, has drawn fresh attention to that always interesting country. We have before given a portrait of the celebrated Mehemet Ali; we now furnish one of his scarcely less celebrated son, Ibrahim Pacha. There is some doubt hanging over his birth, and it is disputed even in Egypt whether he is really the son of Mehemet, or has been adopted by him, after the death of his second son Jussuf, in 1818. At that time his father had just returned from a victorious campaign into Arabia, and Ibrahim must have been not less than thirty years of age; he is now therefore above fifty. He has always been entrusted by Mehemet with the command of his army, and he, doubtless, possesses considerable military talents, and he helped in no small degree to build up his father's power, the Porte fearing Mehemet's abilities, and Ibrahim's courage and military skill. He is not popular in Egypt, and the uncertainty respecting his birth will be a great bar to his quiet inheritance of the Pachalic of Egypt, on the death of Mehemet. If his title is disputed, however, he will make a hard struggle for it. In personal appearance, Ibrahim Pacha is of middling size, robust and compact, with a broad open chest, denoting an uncommon degree of bodily strength. His deportment is somewhat brusque, but with nothing of awkwardness. His features are regular, but the expression of his face is hard, and it is moreover marked with the small pox, and his lips are rather thick. His "beard is grizzled" with advancing age, and his eyes are overshadowed by a pair of bushy brows. The expression of his countenance is at times good natured, but generally careless and indifferent to those about him, and not seldom bitter, fierce, and full of contempt, both for men and circumstances. He is of daring courage, and full of an uncultivated talent, which sees and acts with marvellous promptitude. His mode of life is very simple; he keeps but few personal attendants about him, and Varennes states that he found the victor of Konieh without a single sentry before his palace or on the steps; there was but one officer in waiting in the ante-chamber. In some of his usages he is oriental enough, with one exception—he never smokes, and detests the practice. But he readily adopts English or European improvements, though they are against the fixed character of the Moslem faith. Thus, when asked by an Englishman how he could think of making such use of that invention of the infidels—steamers, he replied, "there is nothing about steamboats in the Koran!" and with many other orientals he appears to think also that the Koran is equally silent about champagne. There are darker shades in his character, but these we cannot discuss; as a soldier he is an efficient instrument, but savage and bloodthirsty; in policy and the art of governing, he is far inferior to old Mehemet Ali, whom he will be called to succeed.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Monsieur Villemain, Minister of Public Instruction, whose late retirement from office in consequence of mental derangement, and for whose family the Chamber were generously making a provision, has not only recovered his health, but the full exercise of all his distinguished intellectual powers. So much so, that he has been called on to fill the chair at the Academy on the inauguration of M. Sainte Beuve, who has been elected in the place of the late Casimir Delavigne. Victor Hugo is to reply to the opening speech of M. Sainte Beuve. The rapid improvement in M. Villemain's health, and the extraordinary and unlooked for restoration of his intellect, has created great interest in all our political and scientific circles; and his reappearance in the chair of the Academie Francaise makes so great a sensation, that an immense crowd of the highest Parisian society is expected to be present. It is also said that M. Villemain is preparing a work for publication, equal, if not superior, to those distinguished writings which have already rendered his name so eminent.

A case in which strangers are much concerned was decided favourably for them by our law tribunals this week. Lord Coventry, who occupied an apartment in the Rue Monceaux, wishing to return to England, determined to sell his furniture by auction, but the landlord of the house opposed the sale, on the ground that it was against the conditions of the lease. The court, however, decided in favour of Lord Coventry, arguing that a departure from Paris was equivalent to a decease, in which case, sale by auction on the premises is necessarily allowed.

The Arab chiefs, whose presence created so much sensation in our fashionable world, have returned to Algiers. They give miraculous accounts of the wonders they had seen. One of them, speaking of the appearance France made in the winter, made use of the following figurative language:—"France is a Queen, whom we found magnificent, though stripped of her ornaments; what would she have been if clothed in all the jewels of spring?"

By the last census, Paris contains a million of inhabitants. The population does not consist only of persons born at Paris; but the provinces send annually 70,000 to be incorporated in all classes of society. Paris contains 7000 Belgians, 6000 Savoyards, 4000 Swiss, and 5000 English. Every twenty minutes a death and a birth take place. The proportion of widows to widowers, is as 54,000 to 17,000.

It appears now the thirty six Vienna dancers are not to come to this country. The Austrian Ambassador has succeeded in preventing passports being granted them for London. The pretext will make you laugh. The Empress refuses her consent, lest the religious opinions of these young creatures should suffer in this land. Twenty eight have already been sent to Vienna. Eight remain with their instructress, Madame Leiss, attached by M. Leon Pillet to the Grand Opera.

Spontini, the great composer, has been created a Count by the Pope. Madame Esther and Madame Page, actresses of the theatres Variétés and Vaudeville, who lately went to St. Petersburgh, where they attained great celebrity, have been ordered by the Empress to quit Russia in consequence of their having attempted to get up balls similar to those given at Paris during the Carnival.

FRANCE.

The French Ministry, as was expected, have been successful in carrying the Secret Service Bill, and their majority is so large that the question of the continuance of the Guizot Cabinet in office, may be considered as set at rest, at least for the present.

M. Boudet proposed an amendment, the object of which was to reduce the amount of the secret service funds by 25,000 francs.

M. d'Hassonville, who defended the Government, said the imputation of corruption was merely brought for the purpose of upsetting the Cabinet, and even should the present Cabinet fall, corruption would not cease, but would be more easy to the next Cabinet than the present.

M. Guizot defended the general policy of the Government, and stated that the Ministry were willing to take the result of the vote as conclusive of the confidence, or want of confidence, in the Chamber.

On a division the numbers were—

For M. Boudet's amendment	205
Against it	229
Majority for Ministers	—24

The Chamber then proceeded to vote upon the original proposition for a million of francs; when there appeared—

For	217
Against	41
Majority for Ministers	—176

There has been an official announcement in the Moniteur, to the effect that the differences between Sweden and Denmark and Morocco have been arranged by the mediation of the Governments of France and Great Britain. The Emperor has renounced the tribute. The Danish and Swedish Consuls returned to Tangier on the 14th February.

The arrest of two Englishmen in Paris, named Parker and Williams, it is said, is likely to lead to important disclosures. It has already been ascertained that two of the Bank of England notes which they had exchanged in Paris formed part of two robberies which took place in Manchester last year, viz., one on the 22nd of June, of £345; the other on the 20th of September, of £400. Both these robberies were committed in the same way. The money was abstracted from the coat-pockets of persons on their leaving the bank. The amount of money found upon Parker and Williams was not considerable; it was less than £700.

The intelligence in the Paris papers from Switzerland indicates the very troubled condition of that country, but, in the best informed quarters in Paris, it was believed that some amicable arrangement would be made. The Jesuits will probably be removed from the cantons.

The deputies assembled in their bureaux on Tuesday to examine the bill relative to the railroad from Paris to the Belgian frontier, with branches from Creil to St. Quentin, and from Lille to Calais and Dunkirk. The discussion turned principally on the penal enactments of the bill, which were generally blamed, as well as the clause respecting the sums to be lodged as security. Seven of the nine commissioners appointed to report upon it, however, were favourable to the principle of the bill. These were Messrs. Duprat, Gallos, Berryer, Cadeau D'Acy, Ardent, Lasnier, and Muret de Bord. The two others, Messrs. Lunea and Garnier Pages, were opposed to it.

SPAIN.

Our accounts from Spain speak of conspiracies recently discovered there. At Burgos, the Carlists have been engaged in one.

A letter from Bayonne of the 19th ult. announces that a conspiracy for the restoration of Espartero had been discovered at Vittoria, and that a number of sub-officers of the garrison and several of the inhabitants of the town had been placed in arrest. A letter from Bayonne, dated Feb. 22, gives this explanation of it:—"The captain-general, Villalonga, has arrested several officers, sergeants, and civilians. However, the districts between Vittoria and the French frontier continue tranquil, and letters from Biscay and Navarre say it is very doubtful whether the inhabitants of these provinces would again respond to the call to arms from their old Carlist leaders. The Biscayans and Navarros have experienced too many of the horrors of civil war to plunge again into another. The explosions at Vittoria and Burgos were intended to take place at a later period, and the precipitance of some of the conspirators has, for a time, rendered the whole affair a debacle, and will doubtlessly tend to strengthen the position of Narvaez. It was the intention of the Vittoria conspirators to have seized upon all the public funds in the place. The first attempt was to have been made upon the strong-box of the custom house."

PORTUGAL.

Our Lisbon letters mention that the Queen of Portugal was safely delivered of a Princess on the 18th February.

The untoward circumstance in Madrid of a recent date, involving the ministerial deputy Quintanella in a charge of robbery, has been followed in Lisbon by an occurrence similarly disagreeable. A deputy of the majority was convicted in the tribunal of the first instance of forgery and attempted fraud. The Cabralist majority took the case into their own charge, absolved their colleague, and prohibited the judicial tribunals from proceeding further against the accused member.

The Portuguese Ministry are said to have two projects of the Lisbon capitalists under consideration for converting the permanent five per cent. charge on certain portions of the Foreign Debt into a permanent one of four per cent.

EGYPT.

Letters from Alexandria to the 8th February have reached us. They contain a good many interesting and amusing facts respecting Egyptian affairs We subjoin some of the information which they supply. It appears that Mehemet Ali has left Cairo for Upper Egypt, where he is gone to inspect his farms. Ibrahim Pasha is on the Damietta branch of the Nile, for the same purpose; his mind seems to be wholly occupied with agriculture and the improvement of his lands. Ibrahim Pasha ought to be immensely rich, as he spends very little, and accumulates yearly large sums from the sales of his crops. Mr. John Galloway, the engineer, is on the Desert, surveying the line for his projected railroad between Cairo and Suez, and has received orders from the Pasha to have his plans completed by the return of his Highness to Cairo. Mehemet Ali seems by all accounts inclined to commence this work, but it is doubtful whether his Highness will persevere for the present in his good resolution.

Several robberies have been committed here lately, and one evinced considerable ingenuity on the part of the perpetrators. An Arab, in the garb of a sailor, presented himself at the residence of one of the Pasha's naval captains with a fine fat lamb on his shoulders, and said to the mistress of the house that he was sent there by his master, the captain, with that lamb, which was to be well stuffed with pistachio-nuts and raisins, and roasted, as he intended to bring some friends to dine with him, and at the same time his master had ordered him to ask for his pipes, to have them cleaned. The captain's wife, nought suspecting, took the lamb, and gave the man several pipes, some of which were worth from £7 to £10 each. The captain entered his house some time after, and his wife asked him where his guests were? He expressed his astonishment at such a question, and she inquired whether it was not he who had sent a fat lamb, and ordered his sailor to ask for his pipes to take to the pipe-cleaner's? He soon perceived that he had been robbed of his pipes, and after cursing his wife for her stupidity, started off in pursuit of the plunderer.

A confederate of the thief's who had been prowling about the house, noticed when the captain went in he had his sword buckled to his side, and when he left again he had freed himself of that appendage, in order, no doubt, to use greater activity in his research. The accomplice, who was also in sailor's attire, having allowed some time to elapse, knocked at the captain's house, breathless with haste, and informed the mistress that her husband had very happily succeeded in finding the stealer of the pipes, and had taken him to the Bash Aga's (or chief magistrate's); and, as he could not with dignity appear in a court of justice without his sword, he was sent for it, to take it to him. The poor woman, anxious and uneasy about the theft, and perceiving this man to be fully conversant with the facts of the case, which she presumed he could not have known unless from her husband, gave him up the sword, with which he immediately disappeared.

On the captain returning to his house in ill-humour, several hours afterwards, his wife expressed her satisfaction at the thief having been caught. "What thief!" said the husband. "Why, did you not send one of your sailors for your sword, with a message that the thief was at the Bash Aga's."

On hearing of this second theft, the Captain, as a Turk, could find no other means of satisfaction than that of soundly belabouring the whole of his harem, on account of his wife's credulity.

UNITED STATES.

New York papers to the 8th ult. have reached us by the packet ship Patrick Henry, which has arrived at Liverpool. Their contents are important. They announce that the House of Representatives had passed the Oregon Territory Bill by a large majority, but the most mischievous part of it had been extracted. Slavery was prohibited in Oregon by the bill—Ayes, 121; Noes, 69. The bill provides for notice to Great Britain of the intention of the United States to annul, and at the end of twelve months, the convention for a joint occupancy, and affords a guarantee that the rights of British subjects, under the convention, shall not, in the meantime, be interfered with. This passed by a vote of 121 ayes to 82 noes.

On the 4th, the Committee of Foreign Relations made a report to the Senate, adverse to the proposed annexation of Texas.

Pennsylvania has paid the interest on her debt; the bill passed both branches of the Legislature by a unanimous vote in each, on the 1st inst. The payment took place on the 3rd, and was signalized by the firing of cannon. Pennsylvanian stock has risen considerably.

The latest news from Mexico is contained in the Diario, of Vera Cruz, of the 13th of January, at which period Santa Anna was still alive, and in freedom, but despairing of success. He has sent three of his officers to treat with the supreme government, the troops on both sides withdrawing into cantonments. The revolution was believed to be entirely at an end, and Santa Anna's submission complete.

There had been little or no business in the New York markets in the course of the week prior to the sailing of the packet, on account of the great snow storm, which had interrupted communication.

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA.

The experiment of opening a communication with India twice a month has commenced. On Monday news was received by the first of the intermediate mails from Calcutta, but it is only eight days later than that brought by the usual conveyance, which reached London at the beginning of the month. The mail was brought to Suez by the Peninsular and Oriental Company's ship Hindostan, and arrived there on the 4th instant, having left Calcutta on the 8th, Madras on the 13th, Ceylon on the 18th, and Aden on the 28th ult. The Great Liverpool brought the mail to Malta, and from thence it was forwarded to Marseilles by the Acheron.

It would have reached London sooner, had it not been for the bad state of the roads in France, from the snow. The intelligence by this mail, although somewhat scanty, is important.

There have been revolutionary movements both at Lahore and Nepaul. The capital of the Punjaub has again become a scene of confusion and bloodshed. A revolution broke out there on the 21st of November, the object of which appears to have been to get rid of the Jumboo Rajahs. It is said to have originated in the intrigues of the mother of Dhuleep Singh, the young Maharajah. The struggle, whilst it lasted, was a fierce one. Heera Singh, finding that the few troops on which he could rely would not enable him to resist the movement, fled towards the British frontier, but was overtaken, together with Jellah Pundit, Mean Lab Singh, and several other of his followers, and slain. The heads of Heera Singh, the State Treasurer Pundit Jellah, and Mean Lab Singh, were brought to Lahore; and after having been carried about in procession by the Sikhs, were suspended from one of the gates of the city for general inspection. They were subsequently exhibited before the house of Kurruck Singh, then occupied by the Sirdar Jewahir Singh, and destined to have been the scene of his own death, could the Rajah have compassed his intentions. The result of the insurrection was the elevation once more of Dhuleep Singh to the throne. Jowahir Singh, his uncle, had been placed at the head of the Government, but there appeared to be but a slender chance that these arrangements would be permanent. The movement was not expected for the present, at least, to interfere with the policy of the British Government in that quarter; but it is considered, in some quarters, extremely probable that Goolab Sinhg, who is believed to have had some hand in this insurrection, will avail himself of the opportunity of augmenting his already large possessions, and attempt to erect himself into an independent Sovereign; whilst the Affghans may be expected to seize upon Peshawur. Should such turn out to be the result, the interposition of the British Government in Lahore will be rendered imperative.

The revolution in Nepaul was not of such a sanguinary character. The Rajah had promised to abdicate in favour of his son. When the time came he refused, on which the son, assisted by some chiefs, deposed him. The new Rajah is only 17 years old, and an idiot. The Government would be compelled to interfere. The war, however, was expected to be one of diplomacy rather than of arms.

The news from Scinde is still unfavourable. The Highlanders at Sukkur were still dying off. Upwards of 200 men, women, and children had perished since their arrival. They were to be removed immediately.

The non-arrival of the ships Runnymede and Briton, the former from London, with recruits, and the latter from Sydney, with a detachment of her Majesty's 80th Regiment, and nine officers, together with all the mess plate, caused some uneasiness, and great fears were entertained for their safety. The Company's steamer Enterprise had been sent in search of them.

Sir Henry Hardinge continued to reside at Calcutta, but had not been called upon as yet for any active military measures.

A small island at the entrance of Saldanha bay, within the Cape of Good Hope territory, has been surveyed and reported to have on it 30,000 tons of guano, the exportation of which the Government permits on payment of a duty of 20s. per ton.

His Royal Highness Prince Waldemar of Prussia reached Calcutta on the 3rd January from Ceylon, in the Spiteful war steamer.

The sentence of cashierment of Colonel Moseley is confirmed.

Some of the deposed Ameers of Scinde have come to Europe by the Hindostan.

CHINA.

The news from China is of some importance, but does not extend beyond the 26th of November. The Emperor still lived, but no hope was entertained of his ultimate recovery.

There has been rather a serious disturbance at Hong-kong in consequence of a registration decree issued by Government, which was resisted by the Europeans, who in an address to Council styled it as "iniquitous, arbitrary, unconstitutional, and despotic." A good deal of bickering was the result between Government and the Europeans, as the former refused to answer the address. Three thousand Chinese left the island, and at last the Government deemed it fit "to amend and modify" the registration ordinance. There were still, however, some articles in the "modified" decree which were objectionable. The consequence of this is, that while Macao is crowded with junks, few or none have come to Hongkong, Most of the Chinese who left the island had, however, returned. The report that the Emperor had abdicated in favour of a near relation is totally without confirmation. Opium had considerably declined in the Chinese markets.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord CAMPBELL, in moving for leave to bring in a bill to abolish deodands, stated several inconsistencies and absurdities connected with the present law. For instance, if another man took his (Lord Campbell's) sword, without his leave, and killed any one with it, his sword became forfeited to her Majesty. ("Hear," and a laugh.) If a person on the top of a stage, being either intoxicated or asleep, tumbled down and the coach passed over him and killed him, the horses and the coach, and everything in the coach, even the passengers' luggage, were included in the forfeiture. If a man fell from a ship in salt water there was no deodand; but if he fell from a ship in fresh water, then the ship, with the furniture and the cargo, was a deodand. Lord Campbell stated that Mr. Wakley, the Coroner for Middlesex, had given his opinion that deodands did no good.—The LORD CHANCELLOR agreed that the practice of the law of deodands was most absurd, and he would not oppose the bill. But he suggested that, as deodands formed part of the extraordinary revenues of the Crown, it would be respectful to obtain the consent of the Crown before the bill should be carried further. The bill was read a first time.

Earl DALHOUSIE laid on the table some reports of the Railway Board, which gave rise to some conversation upon the subject, but no new fact of further interest was stated. The house adjourned at half-past six.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.—On the motion for going into committee of ways and means for the purpose of considering the sugar duties, Mr. M. GIBSON moved as an amendment, "That no arrangement of the sugar duties will be satisfactory and permanent which does not involve an equalisation of duty on foreign and colonial sugar." Mr. GIBSON, in support of this amendment, entered into the question of protective duties at considerable length, contending that they did not increase the revenue; that, while they imposed a tax upon the great body of consumers, only a portion of that tax went into the Exchequer—the greater part of it going into the pockets of private persons; that they did not benefit imports, nor encourage exports; and that the continuance of them was at variance with the principles laid down by philosophers and political economists, and adopted by the Government.—Mr. EWART seconded the amendment, and complimented Mr. Gibson for having, in a moment of inspiration, taken the question out of his (Mr. Ewart's) hands.—Mr. JAMES said he could scarcely command patience to discuss such a proposition, emanating from those who had once advocated emancipation, but who would now apparently revive once more "a property in man," for the sake of obtaining cheap sugar.—Mr. RICARDO contrasted the Government proposals in regard to corn and sugar, and said he could hardly believe the same person proposed both.—Sir G. CLERK spoke against the amendment, and Mr. VILLIERS in support of it.—Mr. MILES (of Bristol) contended that estates in the West Indies were in a most distressed and ruinous condition, and could not afford an open competition with foreign slave grown sugar.—Lord HOWICK supported the amendment, upon the understanding that its object was to reduce the duty on foreign sugar to the same amount as that which was paid by colonial, and he thought at the same time that Government should avail itself of the present opportunity to reduce the duties paid by all sugars.—Mr. GLADSTONE said that to the equalisation of the foreign and colonial duties he was not inclined to object as an abstract proposition; but when he considered that the policy pursued by this country had been to maintain the principle of protection, he could not think that Parliament would be justified, for the sake of establishing an abstract proposition, in drawing down ruin on the heads of those who had trusted in its enactments.—Mr. LABOUCHERE then spoke in opposition to the proposal, and Mr. COBDEN in support of it. The other speakers were Mr. Cardwell, Mr. Bright, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord Sandon. On a division, the numbers were—

For Mr. Gibson's amendment	84
Against it	211
Majority	—127

The house adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Their lordships sat to-day only for a quarter of an hour, and the business transacted was utterly unimportant.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The house met at twelve o'clock to discuss the Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill. On the meeting of the house in the evening, Mr. WALLACE occupied some time in strictures upon the conduct of the judges of the Court of Session in Scotland, and moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter the constitution of that court. Ultimately, however, the motion was withdrawn.

PHYSIC AND SURGERY.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of medical practice throughout the United Kingdom. The measure had three leading objects to which he adhered—first, the establishment of a Council of Health, which would give him the general control of all the medical and surgical bodies of the United Kingdom, and which would be so constituted as to assist to give advice to the Executive Government in all cases affecting the health of the community. The second object was to secure to all medical practitioners throughout the United Kingdom equal facilities for practice, and at the same time secure to the public an equality of attainments. The third object was to give to the public the guarantee that the practitioners had undergone the necessary examination, and had come up to the required standard of medical or surgical skill. The alterations which he proposed to make in the bill printed last year, were principally these. He proposed a repeal of the Act of Henry VIII., which gives the Royal College of Physicians the exclusive right of practising in London and within seven miles of it, only with respect to practitioners registered under the Bill; leaving an exception for those who had graduated in medicine at Oxford and Cambridge, in the hope that some arrangement would be made by which they could come under its operation. He proposed only a partial repeal of the Apothecaries' Act—so far as would affect parties registered under this bill—thus leaving all existing penalties untouched, for which the Society of Apothecaries might go if they pleased. He proposed to make it a misdemeanour for every unregistered person to pretend to be authorised to practice as a physician, surgeon, apothecary, doctor, or other recognised designation. He proposed the repeal of that part of the Apothecaries' Act which renders it necessary for the examiners to be of the Civic Guild of London, and in lieu thereof, that they should be general practitioners of ten years' standing. Twenty-five years he proposed to fix as the age when a person should be deemed qualified to practise as a surgeon, unless he had passed his examination as a licentiate. He proposed, likewise, that the Council of Health should make provision for an examination in midwifery. The right hon. baronet advised the general practitioners to be satisfied with their connection with the College of Surgeons, and not to insist on a separate charter. With respect to the constitution of the Council of Health, he adhered, in substance, to his last year's plan.—Mr. WAKLEY said, although he was strongly opposed to the other bill, Sir J. Graham had evinced a desire, by the alterations he had made, to consult the wishes and interests of the practitioners of medicine, that he was not disposed to object to the present measure. He hoped, however, that time would be given to the medical profession to consider the bill before the second reading. The bill was read a first time. The second reading was fixed for the 7th of April. The house sat till one o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.—On the motion that the order of the day for going into Committee of Ways and Means be read, Lord J. RUSSELL moved the following resolution:—"That it is the opinion of this house, that the plan proposed by her Majesty's Government in reference to the sugar duties professes to keep up a distinction between foreign free labour and foreign slave labour sugar which is impractica le and illusory; and without adequate benefit to the consumer, tends so greatly to impair the revenue as to render the removal of the Income and Property-tax at the end of three years ex tremely uncertain and improbable."—Lord J. Russell in support of this view of the case, argued that the Government pursued an inconsistent course in regard to slave labour. He said—With regard to copper, it is proposed in the present year to admit the copper ore raised by slave labour, and with regard to cotton, you propose this year to take off the entire duty; and yet the Government do not propose to make any distinction between the cotton which comes from slave states, raised by the labour of slaves, and that which comes from the East Indies or elsewhere, raised by free labour; and, accordingly, we find that those who have been always the greatest oppo nents of slavery, the philanthropists, who take the view that you ought to discourage all the products of slave labour (while admitting that you cannot propose to exclude all the products of slave labour with respect to what is established), have stated that they regard with dissatisfaction the proposals of the Government in the present year with reference to cotton, coffee, and other products of slave labour.—(Hear.)—The noble lord entered into the sugar question at great length, and con tended that Sir Robert Peel might preserve the whole amount of the revenue he required, if he would but admit all foreign sugar, and decrease the amount of protection he now proposes to give. Taking the price of foreign produce at 20s, if he were to add a duty of 28s., he could not have a less price than 48s.; and if he had a very much less duty the consumer would obtain a great benefit, and there would be the chance of increased consumption. It was very doubtful as the matter now stood, whether the £1,300,000 calculated on by the right hon. baronet would be the total loss to the revenue; on the contrary, it appeared that unless the consumption increased at the rate he expected, the loss to the revenue would be £1,800,000 or £1,900,000.—After a speech from Mr. Labouchere, in support of the amendment, Mr. Gladstone contended that Sir R. Peel's plan was not illusory. He entered into an elaborate defence of it, showing that the principle of it had been sanctioned by the house on many former occasions, and that it could not be suddenly departed from, without inflicting great injury on our colonial dependencies, and without giving an enormous stimulus to the slave-trade inCuba and the Brazils. He reminded the house of the immense sacrifices it had made during many years to obtain the extinction of slavery, and advised it, if it were determined to maintain no longer these discriminating duties, to maintain no longer any armed force for the suppression of the slave-trade. He pointed out the inconsistency of placing a number of cruisers on the coast of Africa, to prevent the exportation of negroes to Cuba and Brazils, and of giving by our fiscal regulations, to the planters of those countries, such encouragement to produce a greater amount of sugar as would unquestionably induce them to obtain slaves at every hazard. He should give his decided opposition to the resolution.—Mr. Macaulay said he would not have two standards of right and wrong, nor strain at a gnat and yet swallow a camel. But this was exactly what the Government was doing; for they not only took the tobacco of the United States which was the produce of slave labour, but they also interdicted the free labourer of Ireland from cultivating it in his own country. Why was this? Because they got a duty of 600—nay, 1200 per cent. on the foreign tobacco, the produce of slave labour, and would find a difficulty of deriving any revenue at all from the home grown. If then moral obligation were to yield sometimes to fiscal regulations, why were they to be debarred from the importation of Brazilian sugar? But, Sir R. Peel at the very moment in which he debarred the country from this importation of Brazilian sugar because it was slave-grown, took off all the duty on cotton imported from the United States, which was slave-grown also. He then drew a horrible picture of the treatment of the slave population in the United States, and proceeded to say, that though he felt himself justified in voting that evening for the resolution, he had no intention to vote against the proposition of Sir R. Peel on a future evening to exempt cotton from all duty.—Sir J. Graham contended that the moral, social, and industrial condition of the colonies required the distinctions now proposed to be maintained, both with reference to their improving ability to compete with other countries, and the necessity for abating the slave trade.—Mr. Charles Wood reviewed the calculations on which the sugar estimates have been framed, contending that the benefit to the consumer will only be three-farthings instead of three halfpence, and urging that the whole question resolved itself into a tax on the British public for the benefit of the West India planters.—Sir R. Peel taunted Lord John Russell with being adverse to the Income-tax without openly opposing it; and asked if he would venture on a reduction of taxes to the extent of more than three millions without the aid of the Income-tax? The noble lord's speech, in great part at least, would have warranted his voting for the amendment of Mr. Milner Gibson the other night; but oscillating as he was between the Ministerial and the Opposition benches, he had come to the conclusion that the West Indies required some protection. It sounded very well to announce that "protection was the bane of agriculture," yet at the close of last session Lord John Russell had intimated that local burdens required some protection to agriculture; and he had disturbed the agricultural mind by vague expectations that he would propose the repeal of the Malt-tax. Notwithstanding which, he had no doubt that the noble lord would vote for the proposed reduction on glass and cotton, and, moreover, in spite of the support of his agricultural friends, would aid the Government in resisting the repeal of the Malt-tax. He admitted that there was an apparent inconsistency in the admission of slave grown cotton and the refusal of slave-grown sugar; but it was difficult to take any course which was not open to the charge of inconsistency. An anti-slavery feeling was spreading all over the Continent; and though this country was the only one which made active exertions to suppress slavery, our sincerity was not questioned, and our example was likely to be imitated.—Lord Palmerston said that our persevering efforts to put down the odious traffic in slaves were neutralised by the loss of that mutual right of search which the present Government had thrown away, and the want of which could not be compensated by any increase in our cruisers and sailors. The attempt to discriminate between slave-grown and free-grown sugar was a distinction without a difference; by maintaining it we withdrew the stimulus of wholesome competition, and gave a protection which was injurious to our home interests, without any countervailing advantage to the colonies.—Sir C. Napier made some remarks upon the slave-trade. A division then took place, the result of which was—

The house adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

The Rubric.—Earl Fortescue presented a petition from Exeter and Southmolton, and from the Rev. William Carwithan, D.D., for a revision of the law attached to the observance of the Rubric in the service of the Church. The noble earl entered into the various circumstances connected with the recent proceedings in the diocese of Exeter, and remarked upon the excitement which had been created by the differences of opinion in regard to the Rubric.—The Bishop of Exeter said he should not ask the house to hear his defence, for he had no defence to make, and proceeded to mention the steps he had taken to settle the differences that prevailed. Our readers are familiar with the letters published by the right rev. prelate on the subject. The petition was ordered to be printed.

Some conversation took place on the opening of the letters of the Italian Exiles, in which the Earl of Aberdeen denied the justice of the charge that he had caused the death of the Bandieras and their companions.

Their lordships then rose.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

The House met again at 12 o'clock. The Companies' Clauses Consolidation Bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed, and Lord G. Somerset said he should move the third reading of the bill on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill was again brought under the consideration of the house. Several clauses were agreed to. The Chairman reported progress, and it was arranged that the bill should be proceeded with on Tuesday at 12 o'clock.

The Post-Office Spy System.—Mr. Wakley presented a petition, agreed to at the meeting of the electors of Finsbury, expressing disgust at the spy system, and stating that the petitioners consider it due to themselves, "as well as to Mr. Duncombe, to demand from the House of Commons such an investigation into the proceedings towards him as shall either justify the implied suspicions of the Government, or fully establish the innocence of our long-tried and faithful representative."

The Game Laws.—Mr. Bright presented petitions, numerously signed by farmers and landholders in Horsham, Sussex; Alnwick, in Northumberland; from the western side of the Severn, Gloucestershire; and Ruislip, in Middlesex, all praying for the abolition of the Game-laws. The honourable member then said, the motion which he had given notice of bringing on this evening was a motion for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the operation of the Game-laws. He then entered into an examination of the outrages committed by poachers, and referred to the recommendations made by several committees, with a view to amend the Game-laws.—He brought forward a great variety of facts, in support of his position, and concluded an able and temperate speech, the tone of which drew several compliments from the members on the Ministerial side of the house, moving for a committee of inquiry into the subject.—An animated discussion ensued, in which Mr. Henry Fitzhardinge Berkeley made an effective speech in favour of the present system. As the Government consented to the motion, however, the debate was not a very prolonged one.—Motion agreed to.

Viscount Duncan then brought forward his resolution on the Window Tax, but the debate was adjourned, and the house rose at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday.

On the motion of Lord Brougham, Britton's Divorce Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Earl of Clarendon gave notice of the intention of the Marquis of Normanby to bring the question of the Irish constabulary forward on Tuesday next.

Sugar Duties.—Lord Monteagle moved for certain papers relative to the sugar duties, which were ordered.

The Writ of Error Bill was read a second time, and the house adjourned at half-past six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday.

Mr. W. B. Baring took the oaths and his seat for the borough of Thetford, and Mr. C. Tower for the county of Berks.

After the presentation of several petitions, Sir T. Fremantle announced that the Government intended to amend the act with regard to mixed marriages, celebrated by Roman Catholic clergymen; but as the bill had not yet come into operation, he thought it would be better to wait and see how it would work.

The Post-Office Spy System.—At the conclusion of the speech of Mr. Disraeli, who seconded Mr. Duncombe's motion that Colonel Maberly, the Secretary of the Post-office, should attend at the bar of the house, with certain minute-books, Sir J. Graham defended his official conduct, but again refused to answer the question whether he had opened Mr. Duncombe's letters. At the same time he said distinctly, that he knew nothing against him which in the least degree reflected on his personal character, or his duty as a loyal subject.—Lord Sandon and Mr. Warburton said a few words.—Lord J. Russell gave his opinion, that the declaration of Sir J. Graham altered the position of the question, and he should therefore now vote against the motion, as he believed there had been sufficient discussion.—After several other members had addressed the house, Sir R. Peel replied to the remarks of Mr. D'Israeli. He said he did not wish that hon. gent., or any other man, to forfeit his independence. He said he should pursue the course which he thought best for the public interest, and if he subjected himself to the vituperation of Mr. D'Israili, or to the want of confidence of the house, he was ready to pay the penalty. (This declaration was received with much cheering).—On a division the numbers were—

For Mr. Duncombe's motion	113
Against it	188
Majority against the motion	—75

Sugar Duties.—On the question that the house should resolve itself into committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Hogg moved an amendment, to the effect that there ought not to be any discriminating duty between sugars Muscovado and clayed, not being refined.—After a long discussion it was arranged that the amendment should not be pressed at present, but that Mr. Hogg should have another opportunity of moving it.—Adjourned at half-past twelve.

COMMONS.—Miscellaneous Business.

Notices of Motions.—The Reduction of the Glass Duty.—Mr. Barclay gave notice that, in the committee on the glass duties, he would move that a drawback of duty be allowed for the stock on hand.

Sugar Duties.—Mr. Williams gave notice that he would move in the committee, or on bringing up the report on the sugar duties, that the operation of the resolution for reducing the duties be postponed till the 1st of April.

Art-Unions.—On Tuesday, on the motion of Mr. Wyse, the select committee on Art-Unions was re appointed.

New Writ.—A new writ was ordered for the election of a member of Parliament, for the borough of Shaftesbury, in the room of Lord Howard, now called to the House of Peers as the Earl of Effingham.

New Member.—On Wednesday, Mr. W. H. P. Carew took the oaths and his seat for the eastern division of Cornwall. The hon. member was introduced by Sir R. Inglis and Sir T. D. Acland.

Dartmouth Election.—The Select Committee to consider the petition against the return of Mr. Somes, for Dartmouth, will be chosen on Tuesday, March 11.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Court at Buckingham Palace.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Royal Family, are at present at Buckingham Palace. On Sunday her Majesty and the Prince attended divine service in the private chapel at the Palace, and during the week the Queen and Prince have taken their accustomed promenades and carriage airings. On Wednesday the Queen held a Court, for the reception of her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess Stephanie of Baden, who has recently arrived in England. Her Royal Highness and suite arrived at the Palace accompanied by his Excellency Count Dietrichstein, the Austrian Ambassador. The Earl of Aberdeen attended during the reception.

Grand Entertainment given by the Russian Ambassador.—His Excellency Baron Brunow gave a magnificent entertainment on Wednesday evening at Ashburnham-house, commencing with a banquet, which was graced with the presence of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. After the banquet, which was of the most superb description, the Baroness Brunow had a soirée. His Royal Highness the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, the French Ambassador, the Turkish Ambassador, and many other foreign Ministers, as well as nearly 200 members of the aristocracy, honoured the Baroness with their company on the occasion.

Birthday of the Duke of Cambridge.—Monday was the birthday of the Duke of Cambridge. In the forenoon the Duchess of Gloucester paid a congratulatory visit to the Duke and Duchess. Prince Albert, attended by Col. Wylde, also arrived at Cambridge House, to pay a visit of congratulation to the royal duke. In the evening his Royal Highness's tradesmen illuminated their houses.

Death of Lady Elizabeth Bourke.—We have to record the demise of Lady Elizabeth Bourke, which took place at Cheltenham. Her ladyship's death was quite unexpected, having, on the evening previous to her demise retired to rest apparently as well in health as usual. The deceased was third daughter of the third, and sister to the present, Earl of Mayo.

The Queen's Visit to the Duke of Norfolk.—We understand that, according to the present arrangements, her Majesty and Prince Albert's visit to the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, at Arundel Castle, and the Duke and Duchess of Richmond, at Goodwood, is intended to take place during the Easter recess.

Funeral of the late Marquis of Westminster.—On Tuesday the remains of the late Marquis of Westminster, were interred at the village of Eccleston. The funeral was strictly private, otherwise a display might have been seen worthy of the character of the noble dead.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Election of a Common Councilman.—On Monday a wardmote of the ward of Broad-street was held for the purpose of choosing a Common Councilman to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. G. Hastings Hep pel. Mr. Alderman Musgrove, the alderman of the ward, presided. Mr. Barton proposed and Mr. Simpson seconded the nomination of Mr. Thomas Willoughby Foster. No other gentleman being named for the office, the re solution was put and agreed to unanimously. Mr. Foster returned thanks.

Mr. T. Duncombe and the Electors of Finsbury.—On Wednesday evening a crowded public meeting of the electors of the borough of Finsbury, was held at White Conduit House tavern, Islington, for the purpose of taking into consideration the accusations made against the Government by Mr. Duncombe, relative to the opening of his letters under an order from Sir James Graham; also to demand of the House of Commons an inquiry into such. At half-past seven o'clock the chair was taken by Mr. Richard Taylor. A letter from Mr. Duncombe was read, declining to be present, as he considered the matter a personal affair. In the conclusion of his letter he says:—"The expression of your independent opinion, I hope, will assist me in obtaining that satisfaction, without which, I am convinced you will agree with me, I cannot continue a member of the present House of Commons, with either advantage to you or credit to myself." The meeting was addressed by Mr. Turton, Mr. T. Hodgskin, Mr. Walker, Mr. G. Rogers, Sir Charles Napier, Mr. Blewitt, M.P., and Mr. Wakley, M.P., who expressed themselves most strongly against the system of postage espionage, and against Sir J. Graham individually, and resolutions in accordance with the speeches were carried unanimously.

St. Marylebone Bank for Savings, No. 76, Welbeck-street, Cavendish Square.—The fifteenth annual general meeting of this institution, was held on Thursday, the 27th of this month, at the office, No. 76, Welbeck-street, Cavendish Square. The Rev. J. H. Spry, D.D., in the chair. It appeared from the several reports read to the meeting, that the progress of this bank continues to be of a very favourable description; no less than 2,684 new deposits having been made in the last year, 15,124 deposit accounts remained open on the 20th November last, of which no less than 9,503 held balances averaging less than £4 5s. 10d. each. Upwards of £350,089. was then invested with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt; this amount has since risen to £353,089 4s. 7d. and is rapidly on the advance. The continued evidence thus afforded of the strong and growing disposition of the working classes to provide against the casualties of life, will prove a source of gratification to all reflecting minds; and it may indeed be hoped that this provident disposition has its influence in improving the character and conduct, materially contributing to this class of workmen, being the last to be discharged whenever establishments are reduced from scarcity of work.

Ear Dispensary.—The Committee of the Royal Dispensary for Diseases of the Ear, will give a grand fête early this season in aid of the funds of the charity. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, the Duchesses of Northumberland, Buccleuch, and Sutherland, the Marchioness of Londonderry, the Countesses of Jersey, Tankerville, St. Aulaire, Viscountess Sydney, the Ladies Stanley, H. Clive, Denison, and Sondes, and most of the élite of the Nobility patronise the fête.

Tailors' Benevolent Institution.—The eighth annual meeting of this institution was held on Monday last at the Freemasons' Tavern, Mr. Cutler in the chair. From the report read by the secretary, it appeared that the health of the 73 inmates of the asylum had been good. The funded stock of the institution amounted to £11,304 4s. 5d., being an increase on the year of £178 4s. In consequence of the present state of the funds, and there being but one room vacant, the directors deferred their usual half-yearly election for pensioners until August next.

The Whitechapel Distillers' Case.—Mr. Baron Rolfe, sitting in Judges' Chambers, has made an order in the case "Smith v. Cameron," to stay the proceedings till the ourth day of next term.

LAW INTELLIGENCE

The Doncaster Race-Course Stand.—Judgment has been given in the Court of Exchequer, by Mr. Baron Alderson, in the case of Wood v. Ledbetter, which was argued during the late term. The judgment was a most elaborate composition, and after reviewing the several cases relied on by the plaintiff and defendant, it resulted in a decision in favour of the latter. The question raised for the consideration of the Court was, whether the defendant, acting under the orders of Lord Eglintoun, as steward of Doncaster races, was justified in turning the plaintiff out of the Grand Stand, he having purchased the usual ticket of admission for the whole meeting in the usual manner. On the part of the plaintiff, it was contended that this ticket conveyed such an interest in land as required a revocation by deed; whereas it was urged, on the part of the defendant, that it operated simply as "leave and license," and, as such, might be recalled at pleasure, and by verbal notice to quit. Mr. Baron Rolfe at the trial adopted the view of the defendant, and the verdict accordingly passed against the plaintiff. Mr. Baron Alderson said the Court had come to the conclusion that the direction of Mr. Baron Rolfe to the jury was correct, and, consequently, that the rule to set aside the verdict and for a new trial must be discharged.

The Messrs. Smith and the Excise.—Messrs. Smith, the distillers of Whitechapel, have commenced actions of trespass against the officers of Excise who made the seizure of their stock, utensils, &c., upon the distillery premises at Whitechapel, on the 2nd of November last. The cause, which is entitled Smith v. Cameron and others, has given rise to a long argument before the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; but it turned upon legal points, and was of an ex parte character.

The Charge against a Baronet's Daughter.—It was expected that the charge of stealing, preferred against Miss Osborne, would be investigated at the Middlesex Sessions, which have been held during the week, but no witnesses, except a policeman, appeared to go before the Grand Jury. The Judge ordered the recognizances to be estreated, with the exception of that of the policeman, but said the prosecutor might, if he liked, press the case next Sessions.

POLICE.

Treatment of the Dead in Metropolitan Burial Grounds.—The Police-court at Clerkenwell was on Tuesday crowded to excess by respectable inhabitants of the parish, in consequence of an application to Mr Combe for his advice and interference to put down an alleged abuse in Spa fields burial-ground. Mr. Watt, a pawnbroker and silversmith, of Exmouth street, Clerkenwell, the back of whose premises is immediately contiguous to the burial-ground, said that the ground did not contain more than two acres. It had been employed for interment upwards of fifty years, and the average yearly number buried there was between fifteen and sixteen thousand; thirty burials had taken place there in one day, and the nuisance arising therefrom was so great, that it affected the health of the neighbourhood, and it was impossible for the inhabitants to live in their houses through the continual stench. Parties were in the habit of disinterring the bodies shortly after they were buried, and the bones and coffins burned. Mr. Combe said, if the place was such a nuisance as described, the parish ought to indict. Inspector Penny, G, stated that he had frequently seen fires in the burial-ground with fresh sound coffin wood, and the plates of coffins strewed about. The coffins were those of children and adults. A Mr. Green was in the burial ground on these occasions. Mr. Combe recommended the applicants to petition the board of guardians, and if they would not interfere to apply to the Poor-law commissioners; and, if they refused, to go to the Secretary of State upon the subject. Reuben Room, formerly a grave-digger at Spafields burial-ground, said he had been employed there six or seven years. He left two years and four months ago. He had frequently dug up bodies that had been newly buried to make room for others. He had an altercation with Mr. Green; and on telling him he would leave, Mr. Green told him to go, as he could get others from other places where the same sort of thing was done.—Mr. Watts. Within six years ten thousand bodies have been buried there.—Mr. Walton, engine-keeper, of Clerkenwell, said that he had been called with his engine to the churchyard, in consequence of the burning of coffins and bones, and the grave-digger opposed his entrance. He had been called more than once. He had found coffin-boards dying up the chimney, and rib bones were on the fire, and a most horrible stench like putrid flesh.—Mr. Watts: A lady named Wilson (now present) whose house was near the bone-house, had been obliged to leave through the nuisance.—Mrs. Wilson confirmed this fact.—Mr. Combe said he had no jurisdiction at present, as no one was charged before him. Present the case to the board of guardians; and if you can find out anybody to warrant a charge before me, I will execute the law.—Mr. Watts: The bodies are burnt at night. A party is here who has seen the bodies dug up in a most disgusting manner and burnt at night, when they (the parties) thought they were unobserved. A female here stated that she was usually employed in the back part of premises overlooking the burial-ground. At night she had seen them dig up the graves and shovel out the bones and human flesh by "shovels-full," which so disgusted her that she called out to them "Shame." The gravedigger threw the loose hair which was torn from the heads of the bodies back again to the earth, with which it was mixed up. Reuben Room said this had been often done, and, if necessary, he could give a description of a similar kind of what took place under his own notice in this burial-ground. The parties left the court with a determination to apply to the parish board.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Incendiary Fire at Streatham.—On Monday night, shortly before eight o'clock, a fire, the work of some incendiary, broke out upon the extensive premises belonging to Mr. Henry Coe, jun., known as Bridge-house Farm, situate at Lower Streatham, about three miles from Croydon. The issue of a great body of flame through the roof of one of the outbuildings, filled with straw, led to the alarming discovery. The fire was not entirely extinguished until nearly eleven o'clock, and not before the building in which it commenced was burned to the ground, and its contents consumed.

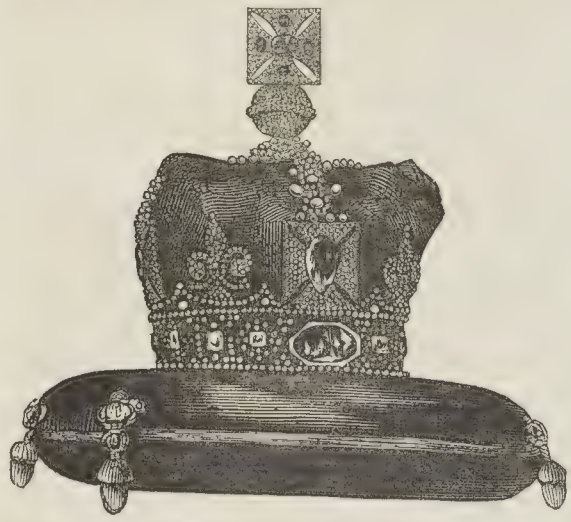
Extraordinary Case.—A few days ago a little boy of five years old, named Redmond Prenderwell, was brought to Guy's Hospital, after having drunk boiling water from the spout of a tea-kettle. The rapid swelling and inflammation which ensued had so completely obstructed the air passage, that death from suffocation seemed inevitable, and on the arrival of Mr. Edward Cock, he determined at once to open the windpipe below the seat of mischief, as the only chance of saving life. Before this could be accomplished the child had quite ceased to breathe, and life appeared wholly extinct. By means of artificial respiration, carried on through the opening in the windpipe, animation was soon restored, and the child is now rapidly recovering from the effects of the injury, and the subsequent operation.

The Camberwell Poisoning Case.—On Monday, the inquest on this mysterious case was resumed before Mr. Carter, at the George Canning's Head, Grove-lane, Camberwell. After other, but not very explicit evidence, the Coroner summed up. The two first branches of inquiry, he stated, were quite satisfactorily answered, namely, the identity of the bodies and the means by which their death had been caused, which was clearly shown to be the poison of arsenic taken in their tea; but the third inquiry, as to how and by whom it had been administered, was the question of difficulty. He carefully went over the evidence, and pointed out its bearings as it might affect the three individuals who only seemed to have had any means of access to it, namely, Mr. Montague, Mrs. Montague, and George May; and left it entirely to the jury to say whether any of these, and, if any, which, could be in any way held to be culpable. After upwards of two hours' deliberation, the jury returned a verdict, that the deceased persons came to their deaths by having taken the poison of arsenic in their tea, but by whom administered there is no evidence before them to show.

Alarming Fire in Grosvenor square.—On Monday evening a fire broke out at the mansion of the Hon. Captain Duncombe, M.P., at No. 22, Grosvenor square, adjoining the residences of the Earl of Derby and Sir G. Talbot. The engines were quickly in attendance, and on two firemen, named Loder and Hall, entering the hall the flooring suddenly fell in, the supporting beams being entirely burnt away. They were immediately extricated from their dangerous situation, and were not seriously hurt. In the meantime, the most active measures were taken to extinguish the fire, which was prevented extending beyond the basement of the mansion. The fire originated from the over heating of a hot air stove, which communicated to the flooring of the hall. The property is insured.

Election for the County Tipperary.—At the nomination for this county, Richard Albert Fitzgerald, Esq., of Muckridge, was unanimously declared as the successor of the late Hon. R. Otway Cave. The very Rev. Dr. Laffan proposed Mr. Fitzgerald; and the Mayor of Clonmel, Charles Bianconi, Esq., seconded the nomination.

Death of Vice-Admiral Wollaston.—Vice-Admiral Wollaston died at Bury St. Edmunds a few days ago, in the 78th year of his age. This gallant officer entered the navy in the year 1781, was made a lieutenant in 1790, commander 1796, captain 1801, rear-admiral, August, 1840, and vice-admiral of the blue at the last promotion in November, 1841. He was midshipman of the Formidable in Rodney's actions.



The New Tariff.—An accurate report of the speech of Sir R. Peel in introducing his new Budget, has been published by Clarke, of Warwick-lane, at one penny only. All the articles exempt from duty are also given, and in order to enable the public to judge of the reductions made, the duties imposed by the Tariff of 1842 are specified.

Robbery at Kew Church.—The village of Kew has since Sunday last been the scene of great excitement, in consequence of some thieves having effected an entrance into the church, and carried off an iron chest containing the parish registers. The churchwarden has offered a reward of ten guineas for the apprehension of the offenders.

The Murder by Poachers at Croome.—On Wednesday, the nine men apprehended for the murder of Thomas Staite, on the estate of the Marquis of Worcester, at Croome, were re-examined, and the whole of them were committed for trial.

THE CROWN JEWELS.

The Crown Jewels, or Regalia, used by the sovereign on great state occasions, and kept at the Tower, have been, for nearly two centuries, one of the Sights of London. Owing to the high charge of admission to view these superb insignia of Royalty, the visitors were few, and the interest taken in their history was of trifling import. The reduction of the admission charge, within the last five years, has, however, led to a vast increase of visitors; and the anxiety to possess some accurate representations and descriptive details of the Regalia has proportionally increased.

THE PRINCE OF WALES'S CROWN.

Still, it is not exclusively on this account that we have chosen the present opportunity for presenting to our readers the annexed Series of Illustrations; but rather from these precious gems and items of costly state being at this moment the subjects of a dispute of great national importance. We refer to the well-known proceedings which have been instituted in the Court of Chancery by the King of Hanover against the executors of his late Majesty William IV., for the recovery of certain jewels of great value, which are supposed to be in the possession of her present Majesty, as part of the property of the British Crown. The matter has, for several days, been argued by counsel before the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and Chief-Justice Tindal, for the purpose of reporting their judgment thereon to the Queen in council; but this report has not yet been made. The King of Hanover's claim is stated to comprise two classes of jewels—first, those which belonged to the Electorate of Hanover, and are claimed as heir looms inseparable from that ancient inheritance of the Guelphic family; secondly, certain jewels bequeathed to the House of Hanover, as heir looms, by the will of Charlotte, Queen of George III. Among the latter, are Queen Anne's necklace, and a star made for her husband Prince George of Denmark; also, a valuable set of jewels, bought by George III., in 1761, of his uncle, the old Duke of Cumberland, which were worn by Queen Charlotte on her marriage, and are said to have been given to her as a present by the King. On the other hand, it is maintained that these last-mentioned jewels were paid for out of the Exchequer, with moneys to the amount of £54,000, appropriated by Act of Parliament for the maintenance of the dignity of the Crown; and that, consequently, they cannot be alienated from the Crown of Great Britain. There seem to be two principal questions to be decided between the parties; the one, as to the alienable, or inalienable nature of the property in dispute, or, in other words, whether the jewels in question can be so attached to the one Crown or the other as to go with the inheritance; and the other, whether they can be identified at this time, having, no doubt, been set again and again, and altered into various shapes, to suit the taste and purpose of the successive Kings and Queens that have worn them. It is not, therefore, unreasonable to infer, that a portion of these jewels has been set, or made up, in certain of the Regalia shown to the public, at the Tower,

The first express mention made of the Regalia being kept in this palatial fortress, occurs in the reign of Henry III., previously to which they were deposited either in the Treasury of the Temple, or in some religious house dependent upon the Crown. Seldom, however, did the jewels remain in the Tower for any length of time, for they were repeatedly pledged to meet the exigencies of the Sovereign. An inventory of the jewels in the Tower, made by order of James I., is of great length; although Henry VIII., during the Lincolnshire rebellion, in 1536, greatly reduced the value and number of the Royal store.

"The office of Keeper of the Crown Jewels, conferred by the King's letters patent, became, in the reign of the Tudors, one of considerable emolument and dignity. Under Henry VIII., Thomas Cromwell (afterwards Earl of Essex) filled this office. In the time of Charles II., however, the situation had lost much of its importance and value; and it was then that, to make up for the decrease in the official salary and perquisites, the Regalia were first allowed to be exhibited to the public. In this reign, too, occurred the desperate attempt made by Blood and his accomplices to possess themselves of the Royal Jewels, an attempt as outrageous in its plan as extraordinary in its results." We quote these details from Mr. Hewitt's excellent account of the Tower. The present keeper of the Regalia is E. L. Swifte, Esq. barrister-at-law, to whose courtesy our artist is indebted for assistance in making his drawings of the Jewels.

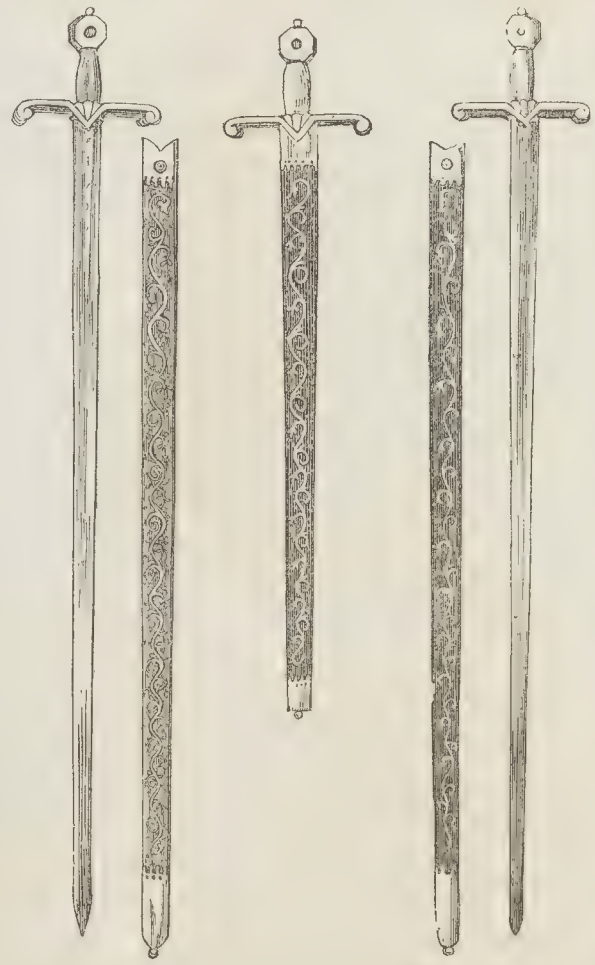
The Regalia were originally kept in a small building on the south side o the White Tower; but, in the reign of Charles I., they were transferred to a strong chamber in the Martin Tower, afterwards called the Jewel Tower. Here they remained until the fire in 1841; when being threatened with destruction from the flames which were raging near them, they were carried away by the Warders, and placed for safety in the house of the Governor.

CORONATION SPUR.



In 1842, they were removed to the new Jewel House, which is much more commodious than the old vaulted chamber in which they were formerly shown. Of this new Jewel House, with the mode in which the jewels are exhibited, engravings will be found in No. 36 of our journal. We shall now proceed to describe the several superb items engraved upon the annexed page. It should, however, be observed, that they are the symbols of royalty, which, from the restoration of the monarchy, have descended to our days.

THE QUEEN'S, or IMPERIAL CROWN, was made for the coronation of her present Majesty. It is composed of a cap of purple velvet, enclosed by hoops of silver, richly dight with gems in the forms shown in our illustration. The arches rise almost to a point, instead of being depressed, are covered with pearls, and are surmounted by an orb of brilliants. Upon this is placed a Maltese or cross pattée of brilliants. Four crosses and four fleurs- de-lis surmount the circlet, all composed of diamonds, the front cross containing the "inestimable sapphire," of the purest and deepest azure, more than two inches long, and an inch broad; and, in the circlet beneath it, is a rock ruby, of enormous size and exquisite colour, said to have been worn by the Black Prince at the battle of Cressy, and by Henry V. at the battle of Agincourt. The circlet is enriched with diamonds, emeralds, sapphires, and rubies. This crown was altered from the one constructed expressly for the coronation of King George IV.: the superb diadem then weighed 5½lbs., and was worn by the King on his return in procession from the Abbey to the Hall at Westminster; but, on arriving at the Hall, he exchanged this crown, for one about half the weight, made by Messrs. Rundell and Bridge for the occasion, the jewels being lent for the purpose. This light crown was broken up immediately afterwards.

The Old Imperial Crown (St. Edward's) is the one whose form is so familiar to us from its frequent representations on the coin of the realm, the royal arms, &c. It was made for the coronation of Charles II., to replace the one broken up and sold during the Civil Wars, which was said to have been worn by Edward the Confessor. With Charles's Crown, the act of coronation is performed: it is of gold, and consists of two arches crossing at the top, and rising from a rim or circlet of gold, over a cap of crimson velvet, lined with white taffeta, and turned up with ermine. The base of the arches on each side is covered by a cross pattée; between the crosses are four fleurs-de-lis of gold, which rise out of the circle; the whole of these are splendidly enriched with pearls and precious stones. On the top, at the intersection of the arches, which are somewhat depressed, are a mound and cross of gold, the latter encircled with a fillet, the former richly jewelled, and adorned with three pearls, one on the top, and one pendent at each limb.

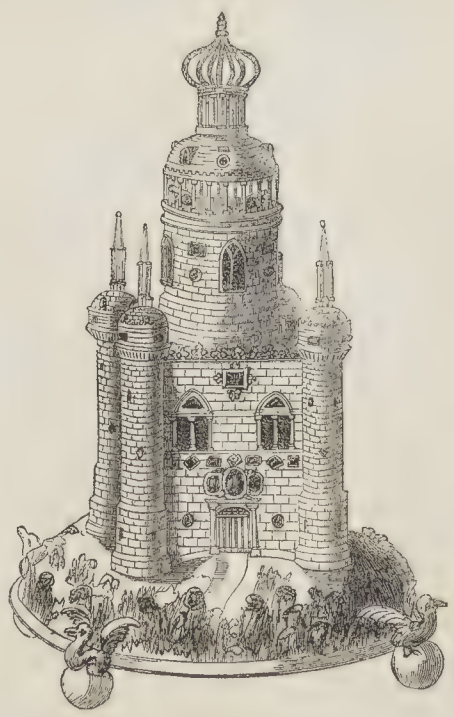
The Prince of Wales's Crown is of pure gold, unadorned by jewels. On occasions of state, it is placed before the seat occupied by the Heir Apparent to the throne in the House of Lords.

The Queen's Diadem, or circlet of gold, was made for the coronation of Marie d'Este, consort of James II.: it is richly adorned with large diamonds, curiously set, and the upper edge of the circlet is bordered with a string of pearls.



The Queen Consort's Crown is the one used at coronations when the sovereignty exists in the male branch. It is of gold, set with diamonds of great value, intermixed with pearls and other costly jewels. The cap is of purple velvet, faced with ermine.

The Imperial Orb, or Mound (fr. monde), is an emblem of sovereignty, said to be derived from Imperial Rome; and to have been first adorned with the cross by Constantine, on his conversion to Christianity. It first appears among the Royal insignia of England on the coins of Edward the Confessor but, Mr. Strutt authenticates a picture, "made in the year 996," which represents that prince kneeling between two saints, who bear severally his sceptre and a globe, surmounted by a cross. This part of the Regalia, being indicative of supreme political power, has never been placed in the hands of any but Kings or Queens Regnant. In the anomalous case of William and Mary as joint sovereigns,—the "other world" that Alexander wept for, was created; and the spare orb is still to be seen among the Royal jewels of England! This orb is a ball of gold, 6 inches in diameter, encompassed with a band of gold, set with emeralds, rubies, and pearls. On the top is a remarkably fine amethyst, nearly 1½ inch high, which serves as the foot or pedestal of a rich cross of gold, 3¾ inches high, encrusted with diamonds; having in the centre, on one side, a sapphire, and an emerald on the other; four large pearls at the angles of the cross, a large pearl at the end of each limb, and three at the base; the height of the orb and cross being 11 inches.

STATE SALT CELLAR.

The Queen's Orb is of smaller dimensions than the preceding, but of similar fashion and materials.

We now come to the Six Sceptres. First is

The Temporal Sceptre of Queen Victoria, of gold, 2 feet 9 inches in length; the staff very plain, but the pommel ornamented with rubies, emeralds, and diamonds. The fleurs-de-lis with which this sceptre was originally adorned, have been replaced by golden leaves, bearing the rose, shamrock, and thistle. The cross is variously jewelled, and has in the centre a large table diamond.

Her Majesty's Spiritual Sceptre, Rod of Equity, or Sceptre with the Dove, is also of gold, 3 feet 7 inches long, set with diamonds and other precious stones. It is surmounted with an orb, banded with rose diamonds, bearing a cross, on which is the figure of a dove with expanded wings.

The Sceptres, Temporal and Spiritual (William IV.), differ from the preceding, as shown in the engravings.

CORONATION TANKARD.

St. Edward's Staff is a large golden rod, 4 feet 7½ inches long, with pike of steel at the lower end, about 4½ inches. The staff has foliated ornaments, and a mound and cross at the top. It is carried before the Sovereign, in the procession to the coronation.

The Queen's Ivory Sceptre was made for Maria d'Este, consort of James II. It is mounted in gold, and terminated by a golden cross, bearing a dove of white onyx. This sceptre has been shown, but without any authority, as the sceptre of Queen Anna Boleyn.

The Ampullæ is an antique vessel of pure gold, used for containing the holy oil at coronations. It resembles an eagle with expanded wings, and is finely chased; the head screws off at the middle of the neck, for pouring in the oil, and the neck being hollow to the beak, the latter serves as a spout through which the consecrated oil is poured into

The Anointing Spoon, which is also of pure gold: it has four pearls in the broadest part of the handle, and the bowl of the spoon is finely chased within and without; by its extreme thinness it appears to be ancient.

The Spurs (one of which is engraved) are also used at coronations. They are of gold, elaborately wrought at the edges and the fastening: they have no rowels, but end in an ornamented point, being what are commonly denominated prick spurs. New richly-embroidered velvet straps were added to them for the coronation of George IV.

The Armillæ, or Bracelets, are of solid fine gold, chased, 1½ inch in breadth, edged with rows of pearls. They open by a hinge, and are enamelled with the rose, fleur-de-lis, and harp.

The Royal Swords are named Curtana, or the Sword of Mercy, which we have engraved, sheathed; the Sword of Justice to the Spirituality, which is obtuse; the Sword of Justice to the Temporality, which is sharp at the point; and the Sword of State. Of these, the last alone is actually used in the coronation, being that with which the Sovereign is girded after the anointing; the rest are only borne in the procession by certain great officers.

A plain Gold Ring, with a large table ruby, on which is engraven a plain or St. George's cross, is always prepared for the coronation; but, of course, it must be newly made, or, at least, set, for each sovereign.

In the same chamber with the Crowns, Sceptres, and other Regalia used in the sacred ceremonial of the Coronation, is a very interesting collection of Plate, formerly used at Coronation Festivals; together with Fonts, &c. Amongst these are

The Queen's Baptismal Font is of silver, gilt, tastefully chased, and surmounted with two figures, emblematic of the baptismal rite: this font was formerly used at the christening of the Royal Family; but a new font, of more picturesque design, has lately been manufactured for her Majesty.

SACRAMENTAL FLAGON.

The Salt-cellars are worth the inspection of the curious, both for their singular forms, and rich workmanship. We have engraved six of these superb table appointments, with one of the Salt-spoons. The most noticeable is that represented in the centre of the foot of the page—the Golden Salt-cellar of State, which is of pure gold, richly adorned with jewels, and grotesque figures in chased work. Its form is castellated, and it has hence been called a "model of the White Tower," to which, however, it bears a very slight resemblance: the receptacles for the salt are formed by the removal of the tops of the turrets.

There are, besides, in the Collection, a large Silver Wine Fountain, presented by the Corporation of Plymouth to Charles the Second; two massive Coronation Tankards, of gold; a Banqueting Dish; and other dishes and spoons, of gold, used at Coronation Festivals; besides a beautifully-wrought service of Sacramental Plate, employed at the Coronation, and used also in the Chapel of St. Peter in the Tower. We have engraved one of the Tankards, and a Flagon.

"Veteranus" informs us that many years since the game of billiards was often played on board of line-of-battle ships, both at sea and at anchor, even when the sea was rather rough, and probably is so still, but not with the ordinary balls and table. The rudder-head is the table, and the backgammon men supply the place of balls; a hollow is made for the pockets, and the ledges of the rudder, which forms a moderate-sized table, are the cushions. These flat men do not easily slide from the lateral motion of the ship, and they obey the impulse of the queue, or mace, readily enough.
Several communications, not answered this week, will be replied to in our next.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1845.

THE Sugar Question will be debated in every possible shape and form in which it can be brought before the House; two nights of this week have been given to it; notices of motions on the same subject are still on the paper of the House, and others are daily added, so that though the first in order of precedence are disposed of, others take their place, and the list does not diminish. There appears to be several nights' discussion to be gone through before the Government get the House into the Committee of Ways and Means, and fairly and fully enter on the explanation of their plan. These debates are necessary, doubtless, and useful; but they are the reverse of interesting, the arguments are worn threadbare on both sides, and the speeches have consequently a wonderful sameness. Like the countenances of the sister nymphs in Ovid, they are all alike, though not exactly the same:—

Facies non omnibus una
Nec diversa tamen; quales decet esse sororum.

The same facts are repeated—the same opinions propounded—and all that can be done is to vary them a little, so that they are all, as we have said, neither quite alike nor altogether dissimilar.

Mr. Milner Gibson, as one of the champions of the Free Traders, came forward on Monday with his proposition for equalising the duty on all kinds of sugar, wherever or however grown, to make the duty in fact one of revenue only, and to do away with duties differential, discriminating, or protective, altogether. The House is not at all prepared to admit the proposition, and the motion was defeated by a large majority.

The Whigs, who coquet as it were, with Free Trade, but do not like to "commit themselves" to any extreme opinion, bring forward their condemnation of the present plan, but without substituting another. Lord John Russell says it is quite illusory to try to keep up the distinction between slave grown sugar and that produced by free labour, when it comes from foreign countries; the duty, therefore, on all foreign sugars might be equalised, but he would still keep up the differential duty in favour of the produce of our colonies. Lord John Russell is, in fact, a protectionist, with a slight abatement or relaxation of the principle on one point. There is an inconsistency in this of which Sir Robert Peel has made most effective use against him; all his arguments are in favour of Free Trade, and against protection; but against a Free Trade motion he gives his vote. It is the same with his opposition to the Income-tax; he denounces it as oppressive, inquisitorial, unequal, unjust, objectionable in every way. The public read the speech and say, "good; we are also for the most part of the same opinion." But what does the same public think when the same Lord John who so condemns the tax, uniformly votes in its favour, when any attempt is made to modify its most objectionable features?

And all the Whigs follow in his train, speaking against the tax and voting for it. They thus lay themselves open to the retort so triumphantly made by Sir Robert Peel on Wednesday evening:—

I am surprised at observing that while honourable members continue to make attacks on the Income tax and on the policy of continuing it, they, nevertheless, determine to vote in its favour. If honourable members object to the Income-tax, why not vote against it? If the Income-tax be so inquisitorial and so oppressive in its tendency as they state it to be, why concur in my proposal to continue it for three years longer; and more particularly so when you say there is no sufficient ground for the belief that this tax will cease at the end of three years? You say that you see reason to think this tax will be continued even beyond the three years; how, then, I ask, can you reconcile your avowed and direct objection to this tax to the fact of your being placidly contented to vote in its favour?

There seems to us no getting the Whig party out of the dilemma in which they are placed; we doubt if they can extricate themselves. The country can have neither sympathy nor admiration for men who thus oppose their opinions to their practice, support what they condemn, and vote for what, if we believe their own words, is most oppressive. Why, what is the use of an Opposition? Why is it a recognised element in the working of our Constitution? We have always thought it was to act as a check to the acts of the Government of the day, if they should be considered "inquisitorial," or "oppressive," or "unjust." A fair, upright, and consistent Opposition in the House of Commons is the only security the people have against the power of a majority degenerating into oppression. To afford that protection, it is by no means necessary to carp and cavil at every measure of the Executive; nay, in many things a generous support may be given to it. But, on the other hand, it is a complete betrayal of the duty of an honest Opposition, believing a measure to be bad, mischievous, and deserving of all the adjectives that can be heaped together for the description of evil, to give to that measure all the active support which the trust delegated by the people enables a representative to bestow. This is what the Opposition, with a few exceptions, has done, and its members, as a party, may depend on it they will have their reward. They are alienating from themselves the confidence of the people, just at the juncture when the Government is winning support and popularity among the great trading interests of the kingdom. There is nothing Englishmen so much despise as insincerity, and of this, since the commencement of the Session, there has been an abundant display in the ranks of "Her Majesty's Opposition." Lord John Russell's proposition on the sugar duties was negatived, we should add, on Wednesday evening, by a majority of 95.

MORTALITY AMONG STATESMEN, NOBLEMEN, AND MEN OF LETTERS.

DEATHS OF THE MARQUIS OF WESTMINSTER, THE EARL OF MORNINGTON, SIR T. FOWELL BUXTON, AND THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH.

When men of elevated rank, distinguished ability, or lofty and acknowledged genius, are passing from among us, bound on their higher journey, and leaving to us the memory of their worth or vices—the landmarks of their busy existence, and the contemplation of their world-career—it becomes not only a wholesome study, but a duty which man owes to himself in his acquirements of self-knowledge, to bestow some thoughtfulness and regard upon the lives and deaths of persons who held like prominence in society, and were placed by genius or destiny upon pedestals before mankind. It cannot be amiss, then, to glance at that rapid obituary among the celebrated which we have so lately had to record, and which, within only the past and the present week, has included the Marquis of Westminster, the Earl of Mornington, Sir Fowell Buxton, the Rev. Sydney Smith, and poor Blanchard, the poet-author, more known to the public by his works than by his name.

We are not going to pen biographies, or even life-sketches, of any of these distinguished persons—but we are going to see how and why they were distinguished, and what mental sway they exercised over their brotherhood in a world which they have left for ever.

The Marquis of Westminster has left behind him a character which it behoves society scrupulously to weigh, and that because we do not think society ever derived its rightful claims from its possessor. In saying this, we do not violate the precept nil nisi bonum in any offensive sense. The Marquis of Westminster was a good man; inoffensively amiable—irreproachable of conduct—an exemplary husband and father—and, in all matters of social intercourse, presenting a softened aspect of disposition which most men beheld with approbation and esteem. But the Marquis of Westminster was more than the mere quiet English nobleman studying the amenities of a high and peaceful station; he was, if we mistake not, the very richest peer in all the land, and in that capacity we do not think that he put sufficient faith in that truest and most forcible axiom—a moral responsibility that property has its duties as well as its rights. If it was not the good fortune of the Marquis to have been largely endowed by Providence with mental capacity—if he was not born a statesman, and if the genius of Giffard could not make him one—if his want of real learning was quizzed by Sheridan in his youth—and if the mediocrity of his talents did not correspond with the powerful influences of his station in maturer years—the world tolerated these drawbacks, and assuredly the fault of them was not to be set down to him. But if, on the other hand, the possession of the most enormous and unbounded wealth in lands and houses, in funds and forests—if holding the keys that could spring the fountain of a river of gold, held in times of need and activity, with no other apparent anxiety than carefully to hoard, and assiduously to increase this unnatural stream of riches—if he has left behind him rather, proofs of the eligibility of his investments than monuments of the beauty of his charity, or the glory of his love—if, in a word, the money chest of Dives, the broad lands of his hereditaments, and the Pimlico speculations, so admirably profitable, which bear the name of Wilton, Eaton, and Belgrave—all titles of his family—if these be all that attach to the memory of the Marquis by which he is known by the people, or rendered remarkable as a public man, then, we repeat, that property must, in some measure, have forgotten its duties; and that, with regret for the death of the abstract good nobleman, is mingled some mortification, that the means were neglected which might have made him also a public benefactor.

Stars, ribands, titles, squares, terraces, and parks, will not give the Marquis that position in the history of his country, which the wealthiest patrician in England ought always to obtain. The arts alone open a field of fame and beauty which tell their indelible story in the civilization of empires.

In the Earl of Mornington society lost—after he had long and well served it—a man of a very different order of mind from that of the titled Crœsus of Moor Park. His life is worthy of regard in several aspects. Born in that great family which produced the Victor of Assaye, the Peninsula, and Waterloo—as well as the great statesmanship of another Wellesley who directed the mightiest branch of our territory and power beyond the seas—he affords a peculiar contrast, mingled with some points of resemblance too, to the character of the brother who was a scholar and statesman, and of the brother who was and is a statesman and a warrior. No doubt he had always in his earlier life great ambition; but the elements of greatness which gave vitality and success to the Marquis of Wellesley and the Duke of Wellington, the lamps of their genius, which crowned their acts and arms, were not within him; he had good talents wedded to mediocrity—he had something of the literary and poetical tastes of the Marquis, and a good deal of the matter-of-fact business perseverance of the Duke and such ents and habits alike he devoted to the public service, often with great sagacity, and always with plodding earnestness and industry. He thus presented the example of moderate ability, pursuing the functions of duty to the fullest extent that society could demand; and was not the worse, but rather the better in his nature, for having loftier aspirations than his mental strength had the full power to realize. We say this without reference to his politics, in which, with one slight exception, it is not our purpose to take part.

He passed through a long routine of official situation, and filled many offices without incurring any amount of public odium, except during his partial administration of the affairs of Ireland in 1809. There the crisis which beset him was altogether far, far above his genius, and completely tested the mediocrity which we have given as the characteristic of his talents. The Ministry of that day were in no better odour of triumph for their prosecution of the Roman Catholic Delegates then, than are the Ministers of this for the state trial of O'Connell, and as the Old Agitator was then a young giant, he gave a very considerable crushing and flaying to the Irish Secretary.

Lord Maryborough did not abandon his political career until he had the sagacity to perceive that although he was fulfilling duties, he was not acquiring distinctions, and then he took the discreet measure of throwing himself into the background of public affairs. He displayed in this as in many other matters, considerable judgment. He is not a man for history—but he lived to prove what energy, activity, and perseverance will accomplish, even without genius, towards social elevation—although we must omit to make allowance against his official merits for the natural influence of the more majestic power of his distinguished brothers. Doubtless, too, he will long continue to hold a corner in the public memory, on account of his being a member of so glorious a race.

At the name of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, we are able to bestow one of those gentle tributes of departed worth. He was a philanthropist labouring in the cause of brotherhood, humanity, and liberty. He was not greatly gifted, and was but moderately schooled with learning or adorned with accomplishments; but he had a studious and thoughtful—a pure and tutored mind; and if he allowed the fever of public ambition to burn within it, it was rather the hope to associate his name with works of freedom and of peace than to plunge into stormier turmoil of political excitement. His principal attention was directed to the improvement of prison discipline, the destruction of the odious barbarity of burning the Hindoo widows, and the total abolition of the trade in slaves. In and out of Parliament he directed his mind to these ends with untiring patience, bearing the odium of the imputation of quackery with more self-consciousness of duty than thought of anger; and though he lately withdrew himself from public life, he has descended to the grave with a Christian reputation and a good name.

We come now—not to speak it invidiously—to the noblest Roman of them all, for vigour of intellect, genius, and wit.

The Reverend Sydney Smith was one of the most remarkable men of his own or any age. We are not going to speak of his career from the time of his leaving Oxford, with a strong foundation of learning upon which to work his fame, to the period of his death as the celebrated Canon of St. Paul's; but, as we said, only to glance at the sources of his distinction, which are those of which we are ever most proud—those of which it ever gives us the dearest pleasure to approve. Springing in the gifted mind, and flowing over the intellect with a grace and glory which inspire and forge within us—yet in the heart and in the brain—the one precious link of intelligence and immortality which seems to bind us to Heaven. Sydney Smith was of the most highly gifted of God, whose servant he was upon earth.

In periodical literature he was a giant—having made the celebrity (in conjunction with Brougham and other bright spirits) of the "Edinburgh Review," as Giffard, once the tutor of the Marquis of Westminster, made the "Quarterly." Mr. Smith was himself a tutor to the family of the member for Cirencester—Mr. Beach. In politics he was a Whig, and a consistent one, but he helped his party with a fearless independence of it that was most delightfully refreshing. Who will forget his conjured picture of Lord John Russell directing the channel?

As a wit, he was really the chief star of modern society, and literature. Poor Theodore Hook alone equalled him in readiness and brilliancy, but Hook was never so powerful nor so punishing in his sarcasm. Although the Catholic question has been so long drowned in the whirlpool of political events—still the point, pungency, ay, and even the popularity, of Peter Plymley's letters remain. The lectures and sermons which taught and delighted thousands, have twenty thousandfold been multiplied in print. But his letters of attack on persons or grievances were, and are, inimitable. Where shall we find anything more withering than his epistles upon the Pennsylvanian bonds, or his searching sarcasm against the railway directors who locked him up in their carriages. All that he has done, however, indicates ability of the highest order—mind, power, reasoning, judgment—in a word—genius.

THE DECORATIVE PAINTERS OF THE NEW CONSERVATIVE CLUB-HOUSE.

To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

SIR,—In answer to Mr. F. Sang's letter, published as an "advertisement" in the Times of Monday last, charging you with "a very erroneous statement," in having "associated the name of another individual with his own," as painters of the beautiful encaustic decorations of the New Conservative Club-house, I have to inform you that not only was M. Naundorf associated with him, but that thirteen "individuals" besides shared with him the responsibilities of the work. The names of these artists are—Beenson, Schleicher, Fahn, Kitzerow, Hundt, Wolf, Haberstroh, Schröder, Fischer, Bachmeir, Claussen, Ehlers, and Holm; and as a perpetual memorial of their several labours, their monograms, along with Mr. Sang's, are actually placed on a series of ornamental shields painted in the bordering of the hall ceiling. It is true that Mr. Sang took the general direction of the corps, but not, as he himself must acknowledge, to the extent of depriving the executive painters of their personal share in the credit which attaches to their united performances. I am, sir, your obedient servant, STEPHEN SLY.
Feb. 27, 1845. 11, Bouverie-street.

[Of course, we do not wish to deprive Mr. Sang of any credit which is justly due to him, for the execution of the work in question; and we have inserted the above letter as the explanation of the Artist who copied the Monograms.—Ed.]

MR. WARD.

This gentleman (whose portrait appeared in our journal of last week) was born March 21st, 1812, and is the eldest son of Mr. William Ward, who distinguished himself so much by his manly and straight-forward conduct when member for the City of London, and who is also the well known cricketer.

Mr. William George Ward is also the great-nephew of Mr. Plumer Ward, who, soon after leaving Christ Church (where he was educated), was called to the bar; and in the course of a few years produced his elaborate work on "The Law of Nations." This book first attracted Pitt's attention, as evincing no ordinary talent and conception of the subject, and led to Mr. Plumer Ward's future advancement in political life.

Mr. W. G. Ward commenced his career by obtaining the gold medal for the best prose Latin composition, at Winchester, when only 15 years of age; and where he was also senior prefect for some time. In 1831, he entered Christ Church, where he kept all his terms; but wishing to remain at Oxford another term, previous to going up for honours, the Dean objected. The result was that he took his name off the Christ Church books, and succeeded in getting a scholarship at Lincoln. In 1835, he obtained what is called an open fellowship at Balliol, and was shortly after appointed mathematical tutor.

It is hardly necessary to say that originally his opinions were anything but "Tractarian" (indeed, we hear little of them till the end of 1835); on the contrary, he was decidedly opposed to this party, and was an enthusiastic admirer of the late Dr. Arnold, and the present Archbishop of Dublin. Whilst an undergraduate at Christ Church, Mr. W. G. Ward was a constant attendant at the debating club, called the "Union," and distinguished himself greatly by his eloquence.

MURDER IN HAMPSTEAD FIELDS.

Last week, in our latest impression, we mentioned the discovery of the body of a murdered man in Haverstock field, Hampstead. The deceased turns out to be Mr. James Delarue, a professor of music, residing near Euston-square, but no relative to the firm of Thomas De La Rue and Co., Bunhill-row, as was reported. An inquest was held on the body at the Yorkshire Grey Tavern, Hampstead, on Monday evening, and the evidence given will best explain the circumstances of the murder, about which, as usual, the penny a-liners have invented a great many unfounded but exciting incidents. The face of the deceased was covered with blood, and the head was much mutilated.

Mr. Richard Rogers Perry was first called: He said I am a surgeon, and reside at Hampstead. About a quarter before nine o'clock on Friday evening I was called to this house to see the body of the deceased, by a policeman. I found it lying in the cottage where it has just been viewed by the jury. On examination, I found that the deceased was quite dead, and that he had received several wounds on the head. At the back of the head I found a wound of great extent, lacerating the scalp to the length of about four inches, and another smaller wound just above it, about an inch and a half long. The first wound appeared to me to have completely divided the scalp, but the second wound did not. There was a large contusion over the right eye and temple, and a wound in the centre of it, from which blood was still oozing, and also a bruise on the left temple. I have no doubt that the wounds I have described were inflicted by some blunt cutting instrument.

By the Coroner: I have no doubt but the wounds I have described in the scalp are also connected with a much more deeply seated injury, but I cannot speak positively on this point, as the head has not been shaved. I have no doubt but the wounds I have described are the result of blows, and that they have produced death.

Edward Hilton: I am a master baker, residing at West-end, Hampstead. On Friday evening I was on business at No. 6, Haverstock-terrace, the house of a Mrs. Bakewell. (Haverstock-terrace is by the side of Hampstead-road.) I was standing just opposite the gate which leads into the field or garden, and heard screams of murder, which seemed to come from Bellsize-lane, in the direction of a dead wall there. The cries were repeated from six to eight times. I thought they sounded like the cries of a woman.

Coroner: What did you do.—Witness: I thought that some man was beating his wife, because the sounds appeared to be those of a woman's voice. I spoke to Mrs. Bakewell's servant, and said, "Young woman, do you hear cries of murder?" She made no reply, however, and shutting the door went into the house. Whilst I was on the steps of the door I heard the cries of murder, and went towards the field. I entered the field to the extent of 20 rods, but then I heard no more cries. After this I went on my business, and in two or three minutes I met a policeman, and told him to search the field down by the outside wall. I did not go with him. I know now where the body was found; it was exactly in the track whence the cries came, the corner of Haverstock field, very near a pond, and half a mile from the spot where I was when I heard them.

Daniel Delarue, the brother of the deceased, said: I am a compositor, and live at the Albion Coffee-house, No. 26, Upper Marylebone-street. I identify the body as that of my brother, James Delarue. He was a professor of the pianoforte, and resided at No. 55, Whittlebury-street, Euston-square, in the parish of St. Pancras. He was in his 33rd year. He was not married, to my knowledge. I last saw him alive on Sunday se'nnight, the 16th of February, on which occasion he asked me to get him a ticket for the Anti-Corn Law League meeting. He was in very good health, and was at home on that day. He taught in various directions, but principally in this. I know of no appointment he had on Friday evening. He carried money, and a great deal sometimes, about him. I know of no one who intended to do him any harm.

Coroner: Have you any suspicion of anybody meditating mischief against him? If you have, I do not ask you to say who it was now, but was that the case?—Witness: No Sir.

John Baldock, police constable 304 S, said:—I am stationed on duty at Hampstead. Last Saturday at a quarter past 7 o'clock, I was on Haverstock-hill. Mr. Hilton, the baker, told me there were cries of murder in a field behind the hill. I had not heard any cries. I went to the field in company with Mr. Hilton, who was coming out of his house on the terrace at the time. When I got into the field I listened to hear if any one was running. I took the pathway, but found nothing. I left the field, having gone right through Bellsize lane. I then met my sergeant, to whom I communicated what had occurred, and we examined the field together, and discovered the body of the deceased in the west-end corner of it, close against the railing, on the other side of which is a path at four or five feet distance, leading from Primrose-hill to Bellsize lane. There was a dead wall belonging to Bellsize house, close at hand. Deceased was lying on his back quite dead, but the body was warm. He was dressed entirely, but his hat lay about two feet from his left foot. I remained with the body while my sergeant went for a stretcher, when the body was brought to this house. The inside of the hat was bloody.

The hat was produced. The lining was stained with blood, but not extensively. It was bruised, and the blow had cracked the side of it. The blow, by the appearance of the hat, would seem to have been given by a round cudgel.

Witness continued.—His coats were both open. I found two keys in his left trousers pocket, and a tin snuff-box in his coat-pocket; also a letter. [The letter was handed to the Coroner. It was said to be from "Caroline," and requested Mr. Delarue to meet her at the place where they had spent so many half-hours together, as she had something of the first importance to communicate.] None of the pockets were turned inside out. There was a pocket handkerchief in his hat. There was no money in his pocket. The pockets of his trousers were buttoned up. I found a large pool of blood near the feet of the body; his shirt bosom was covered with blood. There was blood on the bottom rail of the fence, which has about three or four rails; also on the top railing where his hands had been.

Coroner: What makes you say "his" hands?—Witness: The print of some one's fingers bloody. I did not observe blood upon his hand. There were no marks of struggling; but the ground was frozen quite hard.

Coroner: Does any one know whether he had property about him?—Daniel Delarue: He usually carried a watch with a gold guard. I might say on every occasion.

Baldock: There was blood on the rails about two or three yards from the body. I went on the following morning, and observed a little blood on the wall. No weapon of any kind was found on the spot.

Thomas Fletcher, 24 S, sergeant of police, alluded to by the last witness, merely corroborated his statement.

James Kitchener: I live at No. 55, Whittlebury-street. I am a baker. am landlord of the house. Deceased, whom I identify, lodged with me, and had done so upwards of three years, since the time I took the house from him, he having kept it before I had it. I cannot say when I saw him alive last, as I did not constantly see him. I did not see him for a month together sometimes. I do not know that he had any watch or property about him on Friday, or that he had any engagement to meet any one that night. I suspect no one of intending to do mischief to him.

Susan Kitchener: Lives with her brother. Mr. Delarue lodged with them. Saw him on Friday evening at half past six, in the back parlour. He had on his hat and wrapper coat, and said he was going out. He did not say where he was going, but he told her to keep the fire in. He had a watch and gold chain. Saw it on Friday morning.

The Coroner here expressed a wish that the room should be cleared, as he wished to consult with the police as to the best mode of tracing the guilty parties. The room was accordingly cleared, and the jury sat with closed doors for nearly an hour, during which time it was understood that the Coroner had a long conversation with the police officers of the detective force and several of the witnesses who had been previously examined. At the end of that period the inquest was adjourned, in order, if possible, that further evidence might be obtained.

THE ADJOURNED INQUEST.—APPREHENSION OF HOCKER'S BROTHER.

The inquiry was resumed on Thursday morning, at the same place.

Another young man named James Hocker, a brother of the prisoner Thomas Henry Hocker, was apprehended on Wednesday night, by Inspector Grey, on the Coroner's order. When brought into the room he appeared dreadfully pale, but during the proceedings he manifested the greatest indifference, and as frequently observed to smile. He has a very juvenile appearance.

The evidence of Mr. Perry, the surgeon, which was taken at the first sitting, having been read over to him by Mr. Mills, the deputy coroner,

Mr. Perry proceeded to say, that since the last examination he had shaved the head of the deceased, and found various bruises, and three small wounds, two of which had penetrated the scalp, and one partially so; the left temple muscle was much softened, and eccessively black from the repeated blows. There was no effusion of any kind of fluid. No fracture of the skull was discovered; there was no extravasation, and the brain presented a perfect healthy appearance. He considered the cause of death to have been concussion of the brain—the result of repeated blows. Such injuries could not have been inflicted upon a man by himself or by a fall; it was quite impossible. The injuries might have been inflicted with a crow bar, or a very heavy stick or bludgeon.

By the Coroner: There were no marks or bruises about the body; there was a slight mark on the finger. The nose was dirty, and besmeared with blood, but there was no decided bruise upon it.

Inspector Grey called.

Mr. Wakley: Do you see any person present now who was in the prisoner's room when you took him into custody?—Inspector Grey: Yes, this person, his brother.

Police-Sergeant, 21 T, was next called, and repeated the evidence which he gave at the Marylebone Police court. The witness to day stated, that after the brother of the prisoner had said, "Tom, tell the policeman all you know about it," he added, "for he can see that you are telling him a lie."

By the Coroner: The precise expression used by the brother was "Tom, tell the policeman all you know about it, for he can see you are telling a lie."

The Coroner here remarked, that it was most unfair and repugnant to the administration of justice, that the accused, Thomas Hocker, should not be present to hear what was said against him. Two persons were now in custody, one taken by the police without a warrant and the other by his orders. One was present in this court, the other was not. He would put it to the jury whether they would proceed with an inquiry, the party accused of the murder not being present?—The foreman of the jury said his brother jurors were unanimous in not proceeding with the inquiry unless the accused party was present.

Mr. Wakley said, he should take care to mention the subject elsewhere, so as to obtain an alteration. If he failed he should resign his office of Coroner.

After some further conversation it was arranged that the inquest should stand adjourned until (this) Saturday morning.

James Hocker was then asked whether he lived at 11, Victoria-terrace?—He replied that the back room in which he and his brother had been found had been taken for them by their father, who had not room for all in his own house.

Mr. Wakley: What is your business?—Prisoner: I am a ladies' shoe maker.

Mr. Wakley: What is your brother?—Prisoner: He was a teacher of music, and kept tradesmen's books.

The father of the prisoners, who is not in custody, against whom there is no suspicion, and who is a very respectable man, was then called in and questioned. He stated that he was a ladies' shoemaker, living at 17, Charles-street, Portland town.

At this point the room was cleared, and the coroner remained in conversation with some of the witnesses for a considerable time with closed doors.

EXAMINATION OF THE SUPPOSED MURDERER, AT MARYLEBONE POLICE-OFFICE.

On Wednesday morning, a man who had been apprehended on suspicion of the murder, was examined at Marylebone Police-office, and of course there was great curiosity manifested. The prisoner was placed at the bar a few minutes after eleven. The name he had given was Thomas Henry Hocker, schoolmaster, No. 11, Victoria-terrace, Portland-town. His age, as stated on the police-sheet, is twenty two. He was dressed in a brown frock coat with velvet collar, black waistcoat and trousers, and had on a black satin stock.

Mr. Rawlinson (to the prisoner): You are of course aware of the very serious charge against you. Have you any friends or professional adviser present?—Prisoner: No, Sir.

Mr. Rawlinson: How long have you been in custody?—Prisoner: Ever since twelve last night.

Mr. Rawlinson: Then you have had time enough allowed you to send to your friends had you thought proper to do so.

The following evidence was then given:—

Edward Hilton, a baker, of West-end, Hampstead, who heard the cries of murder on Friday night, and John Baldock, the police constable who found the body, together with Sergeant Fletcher, were examined, but their evidence was precisely similar to that given before the coroner on Monday last.

The letter found upon the deceased's person, and signed "Caroline," was produced, but the magistrate declined for the present reading it.

Mr. Perry, the surgeon who examined the deceased body, then deposed to the nature of the wounds found upon the head. He attributed death to concussion of the brain, caused by a wound inflicted with a blunt instrument.

Sarah Kitchener, of 55, Whittlebury-street: The deceased lived at our house. I saw Mr. James Delarue for the last time, in the back parlour, about six o'clock on Friday evening. He went out shortly afterwards. He said he should be back in an hour or an hour and a half. He never came back. I have since seen the deceased body, which I know to be his.

James Kitchener, baker, of 55, Whittlebury-street, and brother to the last witness, who acts as servant: Deceased lodged at my house. I had not seen him for a week or a fortnight; sometimes I did not see him so often. I heard of this murder on Saturday evening, and on Sunday went up to Hampstead, where I saw a dead body, which was that of Mr. James Delarue. I was pretty sure it was he who had been murdered from what I had heard. I took the house of deceased three years ago last Christmas, when he became lodger instead of landlord. He had buried his mother and sister, and, therefore, gave up the house.

Mr. Rawlinson: Do you know that he had any enemies?—Witness: No; I do not.

Have you ever seen the person at the bar in the company of the deceased?—No; I have not.

Constable 21 T, on the Hammersmith and Chiswick Station: Between seven and eight o'clock yesterday evening I received information that Thos. Hocker (the prisoner) was the particular acquaintance of the deceased, Delarue, and that he had been seen with a considerable quantity of money in his possession. In consequence of this information I went with Inspector Partridge and Sergeant Bickerson to the prisoner's lodgings, at No. 11, Victoria-terrace, Portland-town. This was about a quarter past one this morning. I rang the bell, and a person came down partially undressed. I asked if Thomas Hocker lived there. He said he was Thomas Hocker. I then went in and told him I was a sergeant of police, and was going to take him into custody on suspicion of being concerned in the murder of the deceased Delarue. Up to that time he had not said anything. I asked him to show me his apartments.

Mr. Rawlinson: What! when you said you were going to take him into custody for a murder, he said nothing?—Witness: He said he knew Delarue. I told him I wished to see his apartments. He said, "I will show you them; follow me." He took me into a room on the second floor. His brother was in bed in the same room, and he told him to get up and dress himself. I commenced searching, when his brother said to the prisoner, "Tom, tell the policeman all you know about it." The prisoner then went to the bedside, took a watch from under the pillow, and said, "That is Delarue's; he gave it to me last Friday morning, about ten o'clock, for me to sell it for him." He afterwards gave me some duplicates, which he said related to other property which he had pledged for Delarue. (They were for a watch-guard and seal and a ring, pledged in September and October last.) I afterwards took him down-stairs, and his brother went with us. I then went to Inspector Partridge, who was waiting at a short distance, and gave him the watch and other articles. After that he was taken to Hampstead station. Inspector Partridge said to his brother, "It's no good your going with us, because you can't remain with your brother."

Inspector Partridge, of the A division of police: The last witness came to me about eleven o'clock last night, and told me of the information he had received. In consequence of that I went to 17, Charles-street, Portland Town, at which house I was told that the prisoner's father lived then, and where I expected to get some important information, but failed, and therefore sent the last witness to Hocker's own lodging. When the prisoner was taken into custody he said he wished to go to his father's to put on a pair of boots. When he got there I told his father that he was apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in the death of Delarue. After he had put on his boots I took him back to his lodging in Victoria terrace, obtained a light, and went up to his room, examined every article, and found some old clothes between the sacking and the bed, and also some on the top of the bed. In the drawer of a table in this room there were letters, papers, and memoranda. The letters which the last witness gave me are 76 in number. These were in addition to those I found. I have not had time to examine them, but I believe they are all in the hand writing of one young lady. On the mantle shelf I found a half sovereign and a shilling. The prisoner said he had more money, and he supposed he had dropped a sovereign on the bed, and on going towards it he found the sovereign on the bed. From thence I conveyed him to the Hampstead station.

Mr. Rawlinson: Was there not something said about a button being found?—Inspector Partridge: Yes, sir; but we have not yet had time to compare it with the clothes of the deceased. If your worship will give us a remand, we shall be able to bring witnesses to prove that the prisoner made several purchases of new clothing on the Saturday.

Joseph Shackell stated: I am an inspector of the A. division of ("Detective") police. I received information of this murder on Saturday-night. On examining the place where the crime had been committed, I came to the conclusion that deceased had been robbed, and learned that he had had a watch with him on the Friday, at two o'clock. I then, with other officers, proceeded to the deceased's lodgings in Whittlebury-street, and, with a number of obscene prints, found, rolled up, some bills and receipts; one of the bills was for a watch, which had been purchased of Mr. Finer, in High Holborn, in May last. The description of the watch given in the bill answers exactly with that of the watch delivered up by the prisoner, and which was seen in the possession of the deceased at two o'clock on Friday.

Susan Kitchener re-called, said she could not identify the watch, but thought the chain attached to it was the same as that she observed on Mr. Delarue on Friday. He got up a little after nine on that morning, and breakfasted as soon as he came down.

Mr. Delarue identified the watch as that of his deceased brother, but the chain attached, he said, was not that which he had seen on it on the Sunday previous to his death. The chain then attached was a solid gold chain worth about five pounds.

The Magistrate having been informed that there was no more evidence forthcoming at present, addressed the prisoner, and said—I find it necessary to detain you upon this charge, and you will be remanded, unless you can tell me anything to convince me of your innocence. You will use your own discretion as to saying anything, but it is my duty to tell you, that whatever you do say will be taken down, and may be used against you.

Prisoner (in a calm tone of voice, and unshaken manner): I will say one thing, and that is, that I can bring witnesses to prove that I did not leave home on Friday evening until a quarter or ten minutes to eight. That is all I will say to day, if you please.

Mr. Rawlinson: Well, then, I shall remand you until Tuesday next; and in the meantime, if the Coroner chooses to see you, I shall have no objection.

Prisoner (calmly): Very well, Sir.

The prisoner was, about two years ago, assistant master at an infant school, in North street, Lisson-grove, but was discharged from his situation.

ADDITIONAL PARTICULARS.

The curiosity usually excited in the public mind by occurrences of this description seems upon the present occasion to be greater than ever. Immense numbers of persons have visited the field which was the scene of the murder. The visitors were not confined to persons of the lower classes of society. Several carriages containing ladies, on Tuesday, drove up to the field, and gentlemen on horseback, attended by their grooms, rode across to view the place. Not content with seeing, many brought away boughs and twigs from the surrounding trees, and chips from the fence against which the unfortunate man fell after he was struck, and whereon the marks of the bloody fingers of the murderers were imprinted. It may be remembered that after the murder of Weare by Thurtell, the rage for collecting relics was so great, that a whole hedge disappeared, and the water in the pond in which the body was thrown, was diminished by the bottles full carried away to be stored in the museums of private collections.

The particulars published in the journals respecting this murder are, in many instances, very incorrect, with the exception of the evidence at the inquest.

We, therefore, omit many of the surmises which have been made on the subject, and merely supply particulars either received from good sources or from which the inaccuracies have been expunged.

It appears that the murdered man, who is but 33 years of age, had for some period been acquainted with a young woman, with whom, according to the letter found in his possession, he was in the habit of having occasional meetings in the neighbourhood of the locality where he met his tragical end. Shortly before 7 o'clock on Friday evening week, the murdered man was seen in company with the girl in question. They were seen together in the neighbourhood of the Swiss Cottage, and she was observed to leave him, taking her direction towards the Regent's-park.

The ground has been measured, and the distance of the spot where the body was found from Haverstock-terrace is 460 yards, whilst the exact distance of the place from the Swiss Cottage is 640 yards. Upon a minute examination of the marks of blood, alluded to at the inquest, found upon the second rail of the stile, near which the body was discovered, it appears that the marks are those of the fingers of a man's left hand. When Mr. Delarue was found, he had his glove on his left hand, but no marks of blood are visible upon it

Mr. Delarue was of French descent, and most respectably connected, and possessed property in the funds.

LATEST INFORMATION RESPECTING THE PRISONER HOCKER.

After Hocker had been examined at Marylebone Office, Inspectors Shackell and Haynes, of the detective force, proceeded to the residence of Hocker's father, No. 17, Charles-street, Portland town.

The inspectors, on their arrival, made known to the father of the alleged murderer the object of their visit, and at once, without any hesitation on the part of the father, every facility was offered them to make a search of the premises. They were first shown into a front room on the first floor, which was the one occupied by his son, who also had a lodging where he was captured, No. 11, Victoria-terrace. Secreted in this room were a pair of trousers, stained with blood and covered with dirt; a pair of stockings, the legs of which were also bloody, the blood having gone through the trousers; and a Macintosh, the front and back of which were also splashed with blood. On these things being shown to the unfortunate parent, he identified them as those of his son now in custody. A further search was pursued, but nothing else was discovered, and Shackell and Haynes left the place with the clothes in question in their possession, and Inspector Shackell at once proceeded to the Marylebone Police-court, where he explained to Mr. Rawlinson, the magistrate, who had not then left the bench, the important discovery which he had made.

A button was found in the field near the spot where the deceased was murdered, and also one found at the lodgings of the accused, in Victoria-terrace, and on Inspector Haynes comparing them together they exactly matched each other, and on the inspection of the prisoner's coat two buttons were missing, and on comparing both of these buttons with the remainder of those on the coat they exactly tallied with them. The pair of drawers which the prisoner had on, were, on examination, found to be also spotted with blood.

It was at first supposed that three men were engaged in this horrid affair, and the inspectors having instituted the most rigid inquiries upon this point, are still of the same opinion.

When the van drove up to Clerkenwell prison, Hocker instantly leaped out, and was conducted inside the prison. He appeared downcast when delivered over to the proper authorities, who, as is the usual custom, immediately led him to an apartment in order to be minutely searched, with a view to prevent his having anything in his possession whereby he might lay violent hands upon himself. He submitted to this with evident reluctance, and on taking off his clothes the interior part of the cuffs of his coat was found covered with blood. On taking off his drawers they were also discovered to be marked with blood. After this search the prisoner was taken to the place in the prison appropriated to persons under so heavy a charge, and very strict guard and watch were placed over him.

Saturday Evening.

THE HAMPSTEAD MURDER.—LATEST PARTICULARS.

The jury again assembled this (Saturday) morning at the Yorkshire Grey Tavern. The prisoner, Thomas Henry Hocker, however, was not present, as it appeared that although Sir James Graham had given directions that he should be produced before the Coroner, Mr. Kilsby, the Governor of Clerkenwell prison, had declined to produce him without an order from the Visiting Justices. This circumstance gave rise to a long discussion. The jury were disinclined to proceed without the prisoner, and Mr. Wakley made some stringent remarks upon the obstacle which had arisen. The inquest was therefore adjourned till Monday, and in the meantime the requisite steps will be taken to have the prisoner in attendance.

Yesterday morning, soon after the opening of Marylebone Police-office, the father of the prisoners, accompanied by a friend and Mr. Furlong, an inspector of the S division of police, had a private conference with Mr. Fell, the Chief Clerk, and made known some important particulars relative to the prisoner Thomas Henry Hocker; one fact connected with which is the finding of one of the deceased's rings in the bed-room of that prisoner. The ring is stated to be of great value, with one large diamond stone, and was found by the father of the prisoner under some rubbish in one corner of the apartment, when, being anxious to facilitate the exertions of the police, he immediately disclosed to them the discovery he had made. Some other facts, it is said, obtained by the police through other channels, were made known, and the whole of them having been noted down by Mr. Fell, were immediately despatched by Wells, one of the officers connected with the establishment, to the Home Secretary.

James Hocker is still at the station-house, at Hampstead, and seems somewhat dejected and very reserved. The other prisoner is at the New Prison, Clerkenwell.

A further search has been made by Mr. Shackell at the apartment of Hocker, in Victoria-terrace, and he found concealed there a large pair of shoemaker's pincers, stained with blood; and it has since been ascertained that the alleged murderer has been recently known to go out with these in his possession.

It appears from the statement of Mr. Watson, of Turnham-green, who first gave the information which led to the apprehension of Hocker, that on Saturday night he saw at Victoria-terrace the accused, who exhibited a quantity of money, unusual with him. The latter accounted for the circumstance by saying that a female in Park place, Regent's park, had lent him 12 sovereigns, but that person negatives the assertion.

The whole of the letters found at the lodgings were examined, and compared with the letter which has been so frequently alluded to found on the person of the deceased after the murder, and signed "Caroline," and the handwriting is said to be identical. The female supposed to be "Caroline" has been discovered to be residing in the Adelaide-road, and it is understood that a summons was issued for her attendance before the Coroner at the adjourned inquiry.

The funeral of the murdered man will take place on Sunday afternoon at Hampstead Old Church.

The diamond ring above alluded to was yesterday shown to the deceased's brother, who at once identified it. On further search being made the gold chain described by Mr. Daniel Delarue as being attached to his brother's watch when he last saw him alive, was discovered, and there are here and there spots of blood on it. It will be remembered that a portion of a blood-stained shirt was found by Inspector Partridge at the prisoner's lodgings in Victoria-terrace. The remainder of the said shirt, also having on it spots of blood, was discovered on Thursday night by Inspector Shackell, at the father's dwelling. The letter found on deceased's person had the envelope stained with blood. A third black kid glove, covered with blood, was found in the clothes of the deceased, and on its being compared with the one discovered by the police at Hocker's residence, it is found exactly to match.

It is rumoured that Lord Robert Grosvenor has been left a legacy of £200,000, under the will of his late father the Marquis of Westminster.

INDISPOSITION OF LORD WYNFORD.—We regret to state that Lord Wynford is seriously indisposed at his seat, Leasons, Kent.

FUNERAL OF THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH.—The remains of the Rev. Sydney Smith were yesterday laid in the cemetery of Kensal-green. The funeral was private, being attended only by a few of the nearest relatives and friends of the deceased.

SHAFTESBURY ELECTION.—Richard Brinsley Sheridan, Esq., a Whig, is a candidate for the vacant seat for the borough of Shaftesbury. Mr. R. B. Sheridan is the grandson of the illustrious Richard Brinsley, and has a magnificent seat in the county of Dorset.

DEATH OF MR. WOODRUFFE.—Mr. Woodruffe, one of the barristers practising in the Insolvent Debtors Court, died at his residence at Bayswater, on Wednesday evening, leaving a very large family.

UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION.—This day (Saturday) the annual meeting of the members of this institution was held. Sir Henry Pottinger presided, and the room was extremely crowded. After a brief address from the chairman, laudatory of the objects of the institution, the report was read. It appeared that the number of members who had joined the institution during the year had not been sufficient to counterbalance the loss by deaths and withdrawals. The additional members had been 109, making the total 4185. The deaths and withdrawals had been 195, thus leaving the remainder 4009. The number of visitors had been very great, amounting to 22,767. The total receipts during the year had been £12,081 14s. 2d.. There remained a small balance. It was resolved that means should be adopted for increasing the funds, and also for obtaining a charter of incorporation. The meeting after a vote of thanks to the chairman, and some other routine business, separated.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.—The new duties on sugar are not to come into operation until the 14th of March, even although the resolutions should be passed by the House of Commons on Monday.

THE LACE TRADE.—According to the Nottingham Review of yesterday, the lace and hosiery trades are still further improving.

FATAL FIRE.—Yesterday afternoon, a fire broke out in the private dwelling-house belonging to Mr. John Franklin, situate at No. 5, Upper Garden-street, Vauxhall, occasioned by a child playing with lucifer matches. Upon some of the neighbours entering the place, they found the bed and furniture in a blaze, and a child, about three and a half year's old, enveloped in flames. After some trouble, the inmates and neighbours succeeded in tearing the burning apparel from the child, but it shortly afterwards expired. The flames were soon extinguished.

POST-OFFICE ROBBERY.—Yesterday, Edward Spicer, a guard of the mail train on the Southampton Railway, was brought before Mr. Jardine, at BOW-STREET, for final examination, charged with stealing, on the 18th January last, a registered letter, addressed to Mrs. Ludlam, a widow lady of Charmouth, near Dorchester, containing a remittance amounting to £17 16s., the property of the Postmaster-General, the particulars of which we have already published. A few witnesses connected with the Post-office having been examined to complete the evidence, the prisoner was fully committed for trial. The prisoner was again charged with stealing, on the 10th of January, another registered letter, containing a quantity of jewellery. On this charge the prisoner was again remanded.

DEATH OF THE LANDGRAVINE OF HESSE HOMBURG.—The Countess of Naumbourg, wife of the reigning Landgrave of Hesse Homburg, expired on the 21st February, after a prolonged illness, at Homburg-es-Monts.

"THE LAST RIPENING SUNBEAM." PAINTED BY LANCE.—BRITISH INSTITUTION.

FINE ARTS.

To the Exhibition of the British Institution, just opened, Mr. Lance has contributed some very clever "fruit-pieces," in which his excellent mode of treatment is most invitingly displayed. The picture we have chosen—"The Last Ripening Sun-beam"—is the best of its class in the collection: the fruit has not the waxy evidence of art, but the rough bloom of nature. The pine-apple, on which a strong light is falling, is admirably painted.

The last ripening sun-beam is bidding adieu
To the fruits that beneath its warm influence grew:
How like to the farewell a parent bestows
When the child of his heart from its fatherland goes!
A fond benediction—a lingering gaze—
Half tears and half smiles, on his old visage plays;
While the bloom on the cheek of the young one is bright,
As it bathes for the last time in love and in light! W.

THE ELGIN MARBLES.—ADDITIONS TO THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

Some very interesting additions have just been made to the Elgin Collection, at the British Museum, which are so important as to call for special illustration. These are a series of casts from moulds made recently at Athens, for the King of the French.

Nos. 1 and 3, are figures of Victory, from the Temple of Victory, in the Acropolis: they are similar in style and execution to the Fates, and other female groups.

No. 2, is a female head, supposed to have belonged to one of the pediments of the Parthenon; but the size is considered to be too large (the face being 10 inches long) for any female figures in the Elgin Collection, except, perhaps, the fragment of Minerva. The back and one side of the head are cut off, exhibiting the marks of the chisel most plainly, apparently to admit the head to some limited space; or, if it should prove to be the head of Minerva, this provision may have been made for affix ing the bronze helmet.

Besides the above casts, there have been received a number of additional slabs of the frieze, which will fill several of the vacancies in the Museum series. There are, also, two metopes, of a character differing from that of any hitherto in our possession: they consist of male and female figures, without the Centaurs.

The casts, it is understood, were made under the direction of Mr. Fellowes, during his recent sojourn in Athens.

NEW MUSIC.

"Sha-Sha" Polka, Quadrilles, &c. Purday, St. Paul's Church-yard, London.

This is the age of polkas, waltzes, and quadrilles, and we can scarcely wonder then that the "Polkamania" has traversed the Atlantic, and found a resting place for a time, at least, in the "land of fun and fever"—Jamaica, which, as we learn from the title-page of these musical compositions, boasts its Jullien as well as our own fair land. They are from the pen of a man of colour—Mr. Francis Gilot Jullien—and have been long amongst the most popular of the dances performed at the Queen's Houses assemblies, Kingston, and are now, for the first time, given to the light in this country. Both polka and quadrilles are founded upon native negro airs, and while possessing much original melody, exhibit at the same time an intimate knowledge of the laws of musical composition, and a just sense of the requisites of harmony on the part of the negro composer, which give pleasing proof of how highly-gifted many of the dark children of Africa are, even in those matters which rank among the accomplishments of civilised life. The author, too, if we are to judge from the title-page, seems somewhat of a wag. It represents a full-length portrait of the artist himself, baton in hand à la Jullien, while around the border are characteristic designs embodying some sly hits at the latter; such as that which exhibits him in the act of mesmerising John Bull, with his polkas, quadrilles, &c., while in another he is seen availing himself of John's lethargic state, to place under his own foot the works of Mozart, Bellini, &c., and standing upon them to raise up into the most exalted place, his own productions.

Altogether this composition is very elegantly brought out, and from their own intrinsic merits, we have no doubt these quadrilles will become as popular in this country as they have been in Jamaica.

OPENING OF THE "MEDINA STEAM FRIGATE DOCK," AT COWES.

In our journal of the 6th July last, No. 114 (Vol. V., page 3), we gave an account of the launch of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steam-ship Braganza, from the building yard of Messrs. Thomas and John White, of Cowes, where she had been previously hauled up, and lengthened 30 feet amidships. At the same time we took occasion to refer to the laying of the foundation stone of a new capacious steam frigate dock, on the premises of those eminent ship-builders. We have now the pleasure of recording the completion of an undertaking which will, doubtless, prove an advantage to the shipping interest at large, both British and Foreign.

When dry docks were formerly constructed, they were generally adapted to circumstances of a local nature and to suit the requirements of the times; the old régime in the transition of the mail, gave way to steam, and Southampton became the resort of the Peninsular, the Oriental, and the Royal West India Mail packets. The rapid stride which steam has made since the first transatlantic navigation took place, and no accommodation having been provided for such huge floating leviathans of luxury and utility, it was suggested to the Messrs. White to construct a capacious graving dock for their reception, when requiring repairs; thereby avoiding the dangerous and tedious navigation from the Isle of Wight to the Thames.

Cowes was, therefore, selected for the purpose. Its central position in the British channel—the prompt and easy communication with London, vid Southampton—and the advantages which its harbour affords, have made it the rendezvous of vessels of all nations; its easy access renders it available to vessels seeking repairs. The premises of the Messrs. White offered an advantageous position for a graving dock, of the capacity required, the spot being sheltered from all winds, and having ample room abreast for laying large ships afloat at low water. In April last they commenced operations; the works have since been carried on vigorously, and the Dock and its approaches have been completed.

Monday was the day appointed for the opening of the gates. At 9, A.M., the water was admitted by means of "the sluices;" and, shortly afterwards, the gates were opened amid the deafening cheers of those assembled to witness the gratifying scene. At about noon, the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer, Braganza, entered the harbour from Southampton, and without letting go the anchor, steamed through the Dock Gates under the guidance of her pilot, in the short space of one hour and twenty minutes from leaving Southampton; and in less than fifteen minutes afterwards, the Dock Gates were closed upon her, as shown in our Engraving.

As the steamer entered the Dock, gaily dressed with her signal flags from each mast-head, the Cowes brass-band struck up "Hearts of Oak," followed by "Rule Britannia," and other national tunes. The Dock was then formally named "The Medina," from the name of the local river. On closing the gates, the air resounded with the hearty cheers of the spectators. It is a singular coincidence that the Braganza should be the first vessel to enter the Dock; she was on the slip adjoining, when the first stone was laid; and now has been ordered to be docked and refitted for an India voyage.

The dimensions of the dock are as follow:—

	feet.
Extreme length from the head to the gates	257
Breadth	62
Depth of water on the sill at Spring tides	16
Ditto Neap tides	13
Height of the Blocks under the keel	5

The whole works are most substantially built; in shape, the Dock resembles the interior of a large ship, having a circular bow, the sides and bottom forming an inverted arch. The foundation on which the blocks are laid, is nearly a solid mass of bearers across the Dock, set in concrete resting on a bed of blue clay, which, by boring, has been ascertained to extend to a depth of 200 feet, consequently the work is free from land-springs. The Dock-heads consist of massive piers and wing-walls, built of huge blocks of Portland stone, also on a foundation of concrete; the entrance is sufficiently broad to admit the largest steam-frigate, without the necessity of unshipping her paddle wheels; and, from the wing-walls on either side of the gates, two stages or platforms, on piles, extend, parallel with each other, to the length of 100 feet into the river, between which the mud has been excavated to the level of the bed of the river. On the right of the Dock, is situated the engine-house, in which is a powerful steam-engine for emptying the Dock; the engine being made available for many other purposes, as a saw mill, drilling-machine, &c.

Of the advantages and capabilities afforded by this fine Dock, we need only remark, that being constructed in everypoint of strength and magnitude, it may be regarded as of national importance; it is the only one in the British Channel; it is contiguous to the first arsenal in the United Kingdom, and it would be capable of rendering accommodation to the Government should such be required on an emergency.

OPENING OF THE NEW STEAM-FRIGATE DOCK, ISLE OF WIGHT.

ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY STATIONS.

Considerable apprehension has been entertained by lovers of the sweet rusticity of English landscape, lest the Stations on lines of Atmospheric Railway should destroy the picturesque character of the inland districts, by giving them the chimneyed aspect so singularly indicative of manufacturing localities. It appears, that for the purpose of blowing off the air withdrawn from the Atmospheric tubes, and discharging the surplus steam from the powerful engines to be used in effecting the exhaustion, tall chimnies, or "stalks," as they are technically called, will be necessary at the Stations. These would, of course, be very unsightly objects, and as such are justly objected to by all persons of taste, to say nothing of the gentry who might be favoured with one or more within sight of their park walks or drawing-room windows. To get over this difficulty, it has been determined by the architects of the Croydon and Epsom line, to give their chimneys an architectural character, and to relieve their baldness by the addition of proportions and decorations which have hitherto belonged almost exclusively to the bell-towers of the early Gothic churches. And, as in the opinion of the promoters of this scheme, beauty is as cheap as deformity, they have taken another step in the right direction, by a resolution to construct the station and engine houses in the style of the half-timbered manor houses of the middle ages. Our engraving exhibits one of these Stations, now in the course of erection, with the improvements we have described.

ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY STATION.—CROYDON AND EPSOM LINE.

Brighton, Lewes, and Hastings Railway.—The half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of this company was held on Monday at the London-bridge terminus, William Nash, Esq., in the chair. The report stated that the directors had completed the arrangement with the Brighton Company, who were now registered proprietors of 3500 shares. The directors had been actively engaged in promoting every necessary step towards the vigorous progress of the undertaking. After recounting, at some length, the contracts into which the directors, on behalf of the company, had entered, the report stated that the various schemes suggested by the South Eastern Company, with a view to compete for the Hastings and London traffic, had received the most careful consideration of the directors in respect of the lines proposed between Tunbridge and Hastings, and also a revival of the Headcorn line. The engineer's report stated that between Lewes and Brighton where the heaviest works were to be encountered, great progress had been made, particularly on each side of the Fulmer tunnel, six hundred yards in length. Between Fulmer and Brighton, five occupation bridges had already been built, and the public road, bridge, and viaduct over the London-road would soon be put in hand. The report was adopted.

General Steam Navigation Company.—The usual half-yearly meeting of the General Steam Navigation Company took place on Tuesday, at the offices of this corporation, 69, Lombard-street. There was a numerous assemblage of proprietors. The chair was taken by John Wilkin, Esq. A report from the directors, and the accounts for the year ending the 31st of December last, were read. From these it appeared that the transactions of the company had been followed by increased prosperity, and that the general condition of this corporation's affairs was highly satisfactory. The customary dividend and bonus being declared, thanks were voted to the chairman and directors for their continued exertions to promote the interests of the company.

The Fine Arts Commission.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert presided on Tuesday at a meeting of the commission for promoting and encouraging the fine arts in the rebuilding the Palace of Westminster. The meeting was held at Gwydyr House, Whitehall. The commissioners present were the Marquis of Lansdowne, Viscount Palmerston, Lord Colborne, Sir Robert Harry Inglis, Mr. Henry Hallam, Mr. Thomas Wyse, and Lord Mahon.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ELECTION FOR THETFORD.—The Hon. W. B. Baring was on Monday re-elected member for Thetford, without opposition. The proceedings were opened by H. A. Bartlett, Esq., the mayor. Leonard Shelford Bidwell, Esq., proposed, and Thomas Withers Gill, Esq., seconded, the nomination of Mr. Baring.

INCENDIARY FIRE NEAR DUNSTABLE.—A destructive fire has taken place in the village of Wingfield, near Dunstable, which destroyed two farm-houses and seven cottages, the inhabitants of which lost all their furniture. The fire broke out on Friday week, on the farm of Mr. Osborn, and communicated to the farm of Mr. Jones, and thence to the neighbouring cottages. There seems to be little doubt entertained of its having been caused by an incendiary. If so, it is the third incendiary fire in that neighbourhood within a short time.

REPRESENTATION OF EAST KENT.—The election is fixed for Monday next. William Deedes, Esq., of Sandling Park, the chairman of the East Kent Sessions, a Conservative, it is expected will be returned without an attempt an opposition.

THE LATE MURDER IN BATTERSEA.—It will be recollected that Dalmas who was convicted of the murder of a woman in Battersea-fields, was sent to Bethlehem Hospital because he was supposed to be mad. The officers of that establishment have, however, given their opinion that he is perfectly sane. This extraordinary circumstance has been duly reported to the Secretary of State, and the consequence is that Sir James Graham has issued an order for his removal from Bethlehem to his old quarters at Millbank prison, previous to his commuted sentence being carried into execution. The prisoner will now, consequently, be transported for life to one of the penal settlements.

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

There has, then, been—a stiffish breeze in Scinde—and not only a breeze but a blow—which struck Heera Singh and settled him, not giving him a settlement for life, but a settlement by death, of which it appears he had no real expectancy. The butchers of the East, considering the heat of their country, are very cool in their slaughter. An English deserter has been taken, and is very likely to get his desert. Lord Ellenborough's British honours were delighting the troops and disgusting some of the civilians, neither of which results would now, we presume, ruffle a curl of his lordship's Hyperion caput. It would amount to a satyr if it did. A little bit of a disturbance at Hong Kong had driven away a matter of 3000 Chinese, but the Celestials returned as soon as the Governor had modified his proclamation.

In France, the Ministry carries on, but it is under close-reefed topsails, and their vessel doesn't like the gale. St ll she weathers it, and that is being so far on the gain.

Parliament has been unusully sleepy. A dull heavy debate on sugar, propounded by Mr. Milner Gibson, propounded a pretty little plan of ruin for the colonies, and advanced towards the more economical sweetening of general tea. Some people are never satisfied—and even though near a million and a half of sugar tax has been remitted, Mr. Gibson—without a deeper wallowing in the saccharine. Certainly, when he was a boy his schoolmaster could never have whopped him with a sugar cane.

What a set of lazy dogs the Lords are! They are literally doing nothing—unless Lord Campbell's attack upon deodands be considered crack legislation. Well, a deodand is rather a ridiculous affair, unless, indeed, in the case of a railway accident, where a few lives have been lost by the economy or carelessness of directors; and then we think a swinging deodand a capital thing. It is something to touch their pockets, when certainly nothing would touch their hearts. Apropos of railways—as Parliament is introducing so many of them, that a coach must shortly become a natural curiosity, we do hope that that eminent assembly of paternal patriots may not forget its dear children—the people—in reference to third-class carriages! Let a little comfort be legislated for, and see if cold, and catarrh, and rain, and rheumatism, may not be in some measure averted from the humble race of beings who have so many opportunities of attaining to the possession of those luxuries in other ways. It is occasionally bad enough to die for want of food, shelter, or clothing; but to die of a third-class carriage, is a most provoking climax of human contingency. Do not let the law too much patronise the griping and merciless selfishness of the profit-mongers of these fruitful speculations.

We cannot touch upon this subject without remembering that poor Sydney Smith, who wrote upon it so brilliantly, so bitterly, and so well, is no more. The arrow of his wit hath lost its feather—it will be winged no more. What a remarkable fatality the last few days has recorded between the great and famed. The Marquis of Westminster, the Crœsus of the aristocracy; the Earl of Mornington, the brother of our famous Duke; Sir Fowell Buxton, the gentle and earnest advocate of the slave; Sydney Smith, the Whig luminary, who projected the Edinburgh Review; and Laman Blanchard, one of the favoured spirits of literature, who has left beautiful flowers to be gathered in nearly every garden of the periodical world. Here are many warnings compassed into a small span of time.

Another literary death also recently befel, but it escaped society; and we have nowhere seen it noticed by the Press. It was that of a gentleman of the name of Churchill, the "Tydus-pooh-pooh" and "Man of Genius" of "Fraser's Magazine." We know several Members of Parliament who owed much to the exercise of his great powers of writing and speaking in their behalf. He was the especial aide de camp of Major Fancourt, whom he accompanied to Hanover, when he became Secretary to the King. We fear he suffered the too frequent fate of gifted beings, and had not many friends around him when he died. Peace to his manes.

Sir James Graham has made a move in public favour upon the subject of the bill affecting the medical profession, and Wakley has met him with full and handsome conciliation. There is some chance o good legislation yet upon this important subject. We wish we could say as much for the "Letter Question," which is partly burked. Only partly, however, for Dun combe is not a man to see his offspring killed before his face without having, like the Old Turk in Don Juan, a good paternal struggle in their favour.

The list of articles on which duty is abolished—and really it is an ample one—glass, coal, hemp, and flax, tanned articles, feathers, oils, and nearly half a thousand et cetera, figure in regimental array. Also society is to be physicked more easily by a cheaper arrival at its drugs.

There has been a horrid murder at Hampstead. We are not fond of meddling with such a topic at any time, but we touch this particular tragedy for the purpose of glancing at the insufficiency of public protection in our lonely suburbs by the police force. Those dull roads, lanes, and fields that skirt the metropolis, are indeed miserably watched, for your Peeler likes to be in company himself, and seldom lavishes his affections upon hedges, ditches, and stiles. The kitchen area has for him a brighter and a deeper attraction; and he would rather keep order where order is pretty sure of being able to keep itself, than upon the solitary highways of plunder and assassination. It appears to us that under proper regulation, such a murder as has taken place at Hampstead ought to have been an impossibility!

* * * * * *

Lumley opens his "House of Glory" next Saturday, and we look for a rare treat. Covent Garden has, we believe, closed profitless, and is again to be devoted to the League. The third Gustavus rules at Drury Lane; while at the Haymarket the industrious and amiable Peake has produced a comedy which makes the welkin of that particular theatre ring with laughter. Jerrold has an accepted comedy here; we hope its starry passages may shine more bright than cold; we dread wit that makes the blood creep.

And now, reader, au plaisir till the opening of another budget.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Unless we are to have four winters this year (we have already had three small but spirited editions), spring has fairly arrived, and with it the genial season of national sports—for the million. Hunting and shooting and coursing are not popular pastimes in the common sense of the expression; they are more or less exclusive—the appurtenances of the landed interest. Spring, and her maturer sisters Summer and Autumn, are the parents of the people's sports—races, regattas, cricket, and the boon catalogue of out-door diversions, which a man may enjoy without leave or licence of his fellows. It is a goodly sign of the times that these latter are in the ascendant; a fact by no means to be regretted, that the day for privileged sports is not far from sunset. From the hour that shooting was made a class-right, the seeds of its demolition were sown; it has become a nuisance, or the source of one, and of course its end is at hand It is no longer a question between landlord and tenant, but an affair of social policy. When murder is the consequence of collisions between gamekeepers and poachers, it is not taking a liberty with logic to call the preserver, in whose covers the death is occasioned, an accessory before the fact. "Hunger," says the proverb, "will break through stone walls:" can we be surprised that it does as much for a keeper's head, when represented by a lusty young fellow who has been taking air and exercise (and nothing else) for the preceding forty-eight hours, with the odour of a roast pheasant reeking "in his mind's nose?" Talking of breaking heads naturally leads us to the present status of the chase, and there has been a lull, indeed, in the metropolitan districts—but "the dogs of war" are loose in the provinces. Two hunts—those of my Lord Gifford and Mr. Drax. The boundary question has led to an awful shedding of—ink. That worse has not come of it in the latter is highly creditable to the Christian spirit of those who took part in the performance. It is really astonishing where they got their forbearance, and their vocabulary of forcible phrases. The best days of the chase are numbered—that is to say, according to the estimate of the thick and thin squirearchy who remember with mournful reverence the despotism of the hall—the absolutism of the master of hounds, and the way in which he was wont to dispose of the refractory, or any superfluous bill that he might have accumulated, before he left his good hall in the morning. Before their next anniversary, the leading field sports of winter will very probably be subjected to some wholesome revisions: in their present character they are neither national nor popular.

With the month on which we enter to day the turf season commences—the first race of the year will be run on Wednesday next, at Liverpool, after the steeple chase is disposed of. We cannot, then, better preface our general notices of it than with a slight analysis of its materials and prospects. The account of horses in training is, perhaps, twice as large as it ever yet has been. This, no doubt, is good; but not so their distribution. The public gets infinitely the worst of the prevailing fashion of sending race-horses to "the great stables," as they are called—places where you may see a "string" brought out to exercise as formidable as the relief of the household cavalry on its way to the Horse Guards. For instance, the Dawsons, at Middleham, have eighty, or thereabouts; and if the practice goes on as it has been progressing during the last few years, it is by no means improbable that all the horses engaged in some of the great stakes may be trained in the same establishment. As it is, what with "confederacies," as partnerships in racing-studs are very properly designated, and the "pulls" in favour of the masters who patronise the crack trainers; and the "lines" picked up by the select coterie of jockies, and the like; the interest (and indeed the principle) of the turf is sadly damaged. To such perfection does this system lead at Newmarket, that the favourite at starting beats the field in eight cases out of twelve—or, perhaps more frequently, at head quarters. It must not be supposed that this is the result of trials transpiring—it is the effect of money sent into the ring. Proprietors find the lengths of their horses; before starting they must get their money on—and the crowd follows suit. The principal betting race at this moment is the Chester Cup. For that event several of the stables will be in a condition to measure every animal backed, or brought out; and what chance has the public but to follow suit? But they will, peradventure, buy in at the present quotations: then they must purchase with the chance of losing should their fancy start, the chance of his not starting should they invest, and the chance of his not being the nag of the stable even should he run. The great training-stable scheme is the most hazardous that has ever been offered for popular opinion since racing was made a mercantile pursuit. During the current month there will be ten race meetings; the most regular being that at Warwick, where sometimes a fancy three-year old shows—as, for example, Coronation in 1841. The most attractive feature in that affair is—for the metropolitan—the drive from the Rugby station to the town—through Kenilworth, and all its classic points d'appui, one of the most rural districts in England. Here—that is at Warwick, not Kenilworth—the coming events generally throw a gleam of their shadows before: and something leaks out touching the Epsom diplomacy. Should the essay, made this year for the first time, to give a racing character to the great March festival at Liverpool succeed, and gain ground, very probably the early birds will be at work there in future. If any symptoms of that sort manifest themselves on Wednesday next, we shall be there to see—and chronicle them for the behoof of that gracious public to whom we trust we are a faithful servant.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—There was a very good attendance this afternoon at the Corner, and business was the order of the day. It will be seen that Cataract was a great "pot" for the Chester Cup; he was backed for a large stake by the stable, and was almost, if not quite, as good a favourite as Semiseria, whose friends were passive. Several others were backed, but we have mentioned the only tangible feature. The Derby betting was rather interesting, the Cobweb colt having again receded, while Ironmaster, Anti-Repealer, and Clear the-Way, had plenty of supporters, at improving prices. We give the general prices at the close:—

Thursday.—Very few of the Chester Cup nags were in favour this afternoon; nor, although he became "first in the throng," was there any outlay on Cataract; the movement was brought about solely by "bearing up." Semiseria was at a discount; nor was the Danebury Saint in any estimation with those who are presumed to have the confidence of the stable. Of the Irish lot, Ned of the Hill, alias Yheoman ac Knuc, alone was in any demand. The Derby betting had no other effect on the prices than to bring Clear-the-Way more prominently into notice, and to show an inclination to back Ironmaster with all the risks; nothing, however, was done. Latest averages.—

The Windsor Grand Military Steeple Chases have now been definitely fixed by the stewards (Major Lawrenson, of the 17th Lancers, and Captain Martyn and Lieutenant Tollemache, of the 2d Life Guards), to come off within a short distance of Windsor, on Wednesday, the 2d of April. They will be entirely confined to one day. The entries for the first chase (which will be exclusively for horses belonging to military officers) and for which eight horses are named, are closed. The second race will be for a sweepstakes of five sovereigns each, with 30 sovereigns added, and the winner to be sold for £150. The third will be a hack race of two sovereigns each, with £10 added, and the winner to be sold for £60. For the first two races the horses will run in a circle, going twice over the ground, so that the public will be enabled to have a view of the whole of the race from the stands on the starting and winning field. A line of country, with less difficult leaps, has been selected for the hack race. The entries for the two last races will close on the 31st proximo.

Hungerford and Lambeth Suspension Bridge.—On Thursday last the half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors, was held in Villiers-street, Strand, Mr. W. Hawes in the chair. The report stated that the directors had resolved upon opening the Bridge to the public, on the 24th of March, being Easter Monday. The works, the report added, would not be quite ready by that day, but sufficiently so to enable the directors to afford the public the use of the Bridge, and which they propose shall be four weeks free from toll. The report next stated that by the 22nd of April, every part of the works would be finished; and when, in accordance with the resolution of the general meeting of the proprietors, held on the 15th. of February, last year, the directors have fixed the toll to be collected, at one halfpenny for each passenger.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—Since Monday a fair average quantity of English wheat has been received up to our market, yet the show of samples this morning was not to say extensive. For all descriptions the demand was in a very depressed state, and Monday's figures were barely supported. In foreign wheat, as well as grain under lock, so little was doing that the rates were almost nominal. As the maltsters are generally well in stock, the barley trade was very dull, and the quotations had a downward tendency. Malt and oats were likewise heavy, and the turn lower. All other grain unusually dull.

Arrivals.—English wheat, 6640; barley, 2750; oats, 2270 quarters. Irish: wheat, —; barley, —; oats, 7150 quarters. Foreign: wheat, —; barley, —; oats, 870 quarters. Flour, 4890 sacks; malt, 3550 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 48s; ditto, white, 46s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 30s to 36s; grinding barley, 27s to 30s; distilling, 26s to 30s; malting ditto, 33s to 35s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 58s to 63s; brown ditto, 56s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 59s to 60s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s, potatoe ditto, 23s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s to 22s; ditto, white, 21s to 23s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 38s to 40s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 35s to 36s; white, 33s to 35s; boilers, 36s to 38s, per quarter. Town made flour, 42s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, —s to —s; Dantzig, red, 38s to 43s; white, 50s to 54s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s to 24s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 16s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to—, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Notwithstanding the present somewhat advanced period, buyers of all kinds of seeds continue to be very cautious in their operations, and previous rates are with difficulty supported, if we except those of the spring tares.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic, crushing, 40s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa —s to —s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s, per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 18s, per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 8s to 14s; white ditto, 10s to 13s. Tares, 6s to 7s 6d, per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £24 to £26, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 5s. per 1000: Rapeseed cakes £6 15s to £7, per ton. Canary, 46s to 50s, per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 6½d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 2d; barley, 32s 4d; oats, 21s 7d; rye, 30s 2d; beans, 35s 0d; peas, 35s 3d.

Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 45s 5d; barley, 33s 4d; oats, 21s 6d; rye, 30s 11d; beans, 35s 3d; peas, 35s 6d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 5s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 7s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—Since our last there has been a very inactive demand for most descriptions of tea, and low congou must be quoted 1d per lb lower. Green teas support full prices. The imports this week from China have exceeded 2,000,000 lbs, in four vessels.

Sugar.—The speculative feeling to purchase, arising from the proposed alterations in the duties, having somewhat subsided, the demand from the grocers is heavy, and, when parcels are forced, a decline of from 6d to 1s per cwt in the value of raw sugars must be submitted to. Refined goods almost nominal.

Coffee.—Ceylon parcels, owing to their abundance, have met a dull inqui y, at a reduction of quite 1s per cwt. In West India very little passing, at barely late rates Costa Rico has fallen 2s to 3s per cwt, and all other kinds of coffee are extremely dull.

Cocoa.—In West India we have very few sales to report. Dark red Trinidad has gone at 42s to 44s; fair, 44s; and grey, 40s 6d to 42s per cwt. Foreign in fair request, at full prices.

Rice.—We have rather more inquiry for Bengal, at full prices. Other kinds of rice are quit as dear.

Provisions.—Rather an extensive business is doing in the inferior kinds of Irish butter, at ful prices. Dutch is in better request, and the best qualities are producing 98s to 110s per cwt. The stock of bacon being large, that article is inactive, at 38s to 39s for heavy Waterford, landed; and 39 to 41s for sizeable. Lard is in better request, at full prices. In other kinds of provisions little doing.

Oils.—There is more disposition shown to purchase most descriptions of oil; prices in consequence have an upward tendency.

Tallow.—Although only a moderate business is doing in this market, prices are supported. P. Y. C. on the spot is selling at 39s 6d; inferior and second sorts, 39s to 39s 3d. For forward delivery the quotations range at 39s 3d to 39s 6d per cwt Town tallow, 39s to 40s 6d.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; useful ditto, £4 12s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s; wheat straw, £1 18s to £2, per load.

Wool.—The imports of foreign and colonial wools are on the increase, yet the demand continues active at fully previous quotations.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes being large, the demand is heavy, at prices varying from £3 to £4 per ton.

Coals (Friday).—Hasting's Hartley, 16s; Tanfield Moor Butts, 15s; Haswell, 20s 3d; Kiloe, 18s 9d; Adelaide, 19s 3d; Gordon, 16s 3d.

Hops (Friday).—Notwithstanding our markets continue in a very inactive state for all kinds of hops, prices, arising from the holders being by no means anxious sellers, are mostly supported. The supply of hops on offer is very small. Sussex Pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £7 10s to £8 4s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £8 5s to £10 0s; Choice ditto, £10 5s to £12 12s; Mid Kent bags, £7 15s to £8 15s; East Kent ditto, £11 0s to £12 8s.

Smithfield (Friday).—For the time of year, the supply of beasts on sale here to-day was somewhat numerous, but of a very middling quality. For all descriptions of beef the demand was in a depressed state, and Monday's quotations were barely supported. There were offering 30 oxen and cows from Holland, and 60 Scots from Aberdeen. Sheep—which were in limited supply—commanded a steady sale, at full prices. The veal trade was inactive, but we can notice no alteration in figures. In pigs very little was passing, at late rates. Milch cows sold at from £16 to £19 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 4d; prime large oxen, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 10d to 4s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 8d to 3s 2d; second quality ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 3s 10d to 4s 6d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 10d; neat small porkers, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; suckling calves, 18s to 30s; and quarter old store pigs, 16s to 20s each Beasts, 713; cows, 190; sheep, 3030; calves, 128; pigs, 310.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a very inactive demand here to-day, and prices were barely supported. Per 8lbs. by the carcass:—Interior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 10d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 8d; prime large ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; ditto small ditto, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; large pork, 2s 10d to 3s 8d; inferior mutton, 2s 8d to 2s 10s; middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d: prime do. 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal 3s 10d to 4s 10d; small pork, 3s 8d to 4s 2d. Robert Herbert.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

There has been more usual fluctuation in the English Funds during the past week. Consols, on Monday, after advancing, yielded to sales on behalf of the Court of Chancery, the price ultimately receding to 99⅞ to par. Notwithstanding the support afforded to the market by the daily purchases of the Government broker, amounting to about £15,000, on account of the Savings' Banks, and £4800 for the Commissions of the National Debt, the price receded on Tuesday, and on Wednesday a large sale of £50,000 again rendered prices flat. This depression has continued, and although for a time the market may have improved, the closing quotation for Consols has been generally about 99⅞ ⅝. The Exchequer Bill market continues very unsteady, a large sale on Tuesday producing a decline at once of 6s., from which, however, it has in some measure rallied. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. have maintained their price, supported by the purchases of the Government broker; the closing quotation is 103⅞ to 104. Reduced Three per Cents close at 100¼. Bank Stock maintains its price, quoting 212 to 213. India Stock is 282; Exchequer Bills, 64 to 66; and Consols for money and account, 99⅞ ⅞.

Spanish opened flatly on Monday, and the general tendency of the business was to sales, Mexican alone improving in its quotation from some purchases made on other than speculative accounts. Portuguese has improved on the receipt of the last news from Lisbon, the closing quotation being 60½. The American mail brings the intelligence that the February dividend on the Pennsylvanian debt has been paid, and will be paid here shortly. The probability of this fact was exclusively communicated in the Illustrated News of Jan. 4th. Maryland Stock has risen, from the belief that the legislation of that state will follow the good example. Advices from Mexico mention that Santa Anna has made his submission to the new Government; Mexican, consequently, improved a shade, and closes at 35⅝; Brazilian quotes 89⅜; Spanish Actives are 27½; Three per Cents, 40¼; Venezuela Two per Cents, 44 to 45; Dutch Two-and a-Half per Cents, 63⅜; Four per Cents (Certificates), 98⅞.

The Railway Market was considerably depressed at the beginning of the week, and although slightly improved since, it is far from being firm. The new lines are gradually receding, Trent Valley being an exception. Among those that have declined are, Churnet Valley, Rugbys and Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton and Dudley. Brightons were in better demand as the week advanced, and Dovers improved to 41¼ on Thursday. The closing prices of the week are:—Birmingham and Gloucester, 132½; Bristol and Exeter, 59; Churnet Valley, 7⅜; Cornwall, 4⅞: Dublin and Galway, 2⅜; Eastern Counties, 17⅜; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 65; Great Western (half shares) 98½: Lancaster and Carlisle, 29½; Birmingham Stock, 229; Blackwall, 7½ Brighton, 60½; Croydon, 18½; London and York, 6⅞; Direct Northern, 2 Manchester and Leeds, 138; Midlands, 126; Newcastle and Berwick, 14½; Rugby, Worcester, and Tring, 3⅜; Shrewsbury and Wolverhampton, 4; South Devon, 16; Dovers, 41¼; Trent Valley, 20⅛; York and North Midland, 102½; Sheffield and Manchester, 104; Boulogne and Amiens, 6½; Bordeaux and Toulouse, 2½; Great Northern of France, 5⅜; Paris and Lyons, 2⅞; Paris and Rouen, 42⅞; Rouen and Havre, 30.

Saturday Morning.—Consols yielded to heavy sales yesterday, and closed at 99⅜ for money, and ⅞ for time. It was pay day in the Railway Market, and prices rallied slightly towards the close. South Eastern, Great Western, and Manchester and Birmingham, closed at improved quotations.

RECEIVING OFFICE.

SATURDAY NIGHT AT THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

NEWSPAPER DEPARTMENT.

The establishment of a fortnightly mail to India, which has just come nto operation, and the great increase of newspapers and stamped periodicals transmitted by post, have suggested the annexed illustrations of the Saturday labours at the Post-office, by far the busiest of the week, more especially in the above department.

In no branch of this admirably-regulated establishment is greater energy and activity displayed than in the Newspaper department. Here, as indeed in all the various divisions of this leviathan office, the greatest precision and accuracy are carried out even into the most minute details of the immense and important business transacted, but with much more toil and exertion. This department is on every evening a busy scene; but on Saturdays especially, the appearance of the large room, appropriated to Newspapers solely, is of the most animated description. Upwards of four hundred clerks and sorters are here busily employed, assorting the papers into their respective departments, and "sacking" them; whilst numerous auxiliaries are constantly passing to and fro supplying them with papers, thus preventing the loss of time and confusion which would be attendant upon each one serving himself. Others, again, are employed in removing the sacks, as filled, into the ante-room, or into the railway vans. On this evening, business commences at half-past four o'clock, being an hour earlier than the usual time, in order to meet the pressure of duty attendant upon the extra number of newspapers forwarded. The papers are brought up to the office from the various branch offices and receiving-houses, as well as from the offices of publication, in vans appropriated to that purpose, as well as by the mail-carts and postmen; but above this, an immense number are posted at the General Post-office itself; the boxes at which place are open free until six o'clock, after which time until half-past seven, one halfpenny is charged upon each paper received; and the amount thus paid, varies from about £50 to £100 in one night.

As six o'clock draws near, the streets and avenues by which the office is approached become a busy scene; hundreds of men and boys, some mounted on horses, others on foot, are seen, each one anxious to outstrip his neighbour, all hurrying in an impetuous stream, with their weighty burthens, and, intermixed with vans and carts, dashing along at a somewhat hazardous rate. While all this is going on in the street the scene in the Entrance-Hall is still more exciting: here the number of papers to be received accumulates so rapidly, that the usual mode o posting is useless; the windows are thrown wide open, and several porters, unencumbered with coats or hats, mount the sill to hoist the papers, sacks and all, and throw them into the office. Our first engraving, sketched from the gallery of this room, during the heat of business represents the scene immediately before the clock strikes six; when those who have been hurrying and striving to be there in time, growing impatient of delay, and fearing the time will pass before their turn arrives, throw their papers into the office in all directions, in a litera shower of news.

The greatest excitement continues, and hundreds of faces are turned upward, anxiously watching the movement of the hands of the clock above; each glance at which is accompanied by extra exertion in forcing a passage to the window, through the dense mob of persons who surround it. Good humour seems to prevail throughout, until the first stroke of the hour, when, the window suddenly closing, puts an end to the struggle, and the jeering of the successful at the disappointed not unfrequently ends in a general melée.

Whilst this is passing at the window, the clerks and sorters are busily engaged inside, arranging the papers received. As soon as the window closes, the parts of the room near it, which are literally piled up with the packets, are cleared; the sacks are emptied, and the papers passed to the assorters, who are packed closely together by long ranges of tables, divided into compartments, as will be seen by our second engraving. The newspapers, fifty or a hundred at a time, are brought in on trays: these they divide into their respective post-towns by laying them in separate heaps; they are then removed, as they accumulate, by the auxiliaries, each of whom collects from the sorters for a certain post-town, and by him the papers are deposited in the sacks for the railroads and mails. The large towns—as Liverpool, Manchester, Derby, Hull, &c.—whither the greatest proportion of papers are sent, have a separate room appropriated for their arrangement in sacks These sacks are affixed by the mouth to a strong wooden frame, running around the room, as shown in our third engraving; the papers are then brought and packed as closely as may be; and, as fast as filled, are tied and sealed, and removed in the vans to their respective railways for dispatch. Each of these sacks when filled weighs from two to three cwt.; and to many of these large towns are dispatched as many as six or eight, or even more than that number, in one night.

BAGGING FOR THE GREAT TOWNS.

DEATH OF THE EARL OF MORNINGTON.

Our announcement of the continued serious illness of the Earl of Mornington will have prepared our readers for his decease. The noble earl expired on Saturday night last, at his house in Grosvenor square. The first Earl of Mornington married the eldest daughter of Arthur, first Viscount Dungannon; and of this marriage the late Earl was the second son, the eldest being the late Marquis Wellesley; the third, the Duke of Wellington; and the fourth, Lord Cowley, now British Ambassador at Paris. The noble earl just deceased was born at Dangan Castle, in the county of Meath, on the 20th of May, 1763; and three years previous to that date the eldest son of his father first saw the light; these two brothers, therefore, attained to the same age; the younger having survived the elder during a period equal to that which constituted the difference of their ages when both were alive.

Lord Mornington has, in his day, been known by several names or titles first he was the Hon. William Wesley; then the old orthography and pronunciation of the name were revived, and he became Mr. Wellesley; then Mr. Wellesley Pole; next he obtained the prefix of Right Honourable; this was followed by the title of Lord Maryborough; and finally, in the month of September, 1842, he became Earl of Mornington.

The late noble earl married, 17th May, 1784, Catherine Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the late Admiral the Hon. John Forbes, who so distinguished himself against the combined fleets of France and Spain, second son of George, third Earl of Granard, by whom, who survives the venerable earl, he had a family of one son and three daughters, namely Lady Mary Charlotte Ann, born February 5, 1786, and married to the late Sir Charles Bagot, who died on the 2nd instant; the Honourable William Viscount Wellesley; Lady Emily Harriet, born 13th March, 1792, married to Lord Fitzroy Somerset; and Lady Priscilla Anne, born 13th March, 1793, married to the Earl of Westmoreland, our ambassador at the court of Berlin.

The noble earl, previous to his elevation to the peerage of the United Kingdom, in 1821, represented Queen's County for a period of upwards of twenty years, both before and after the Union. He was clerk of the Ordnance in 1802, and in 1807, and subsequently chief Secretary for Ireland. He also filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland. In 1815, under the Earl of Liverpool's administration, he took office as Master of the Mint; and when the Duke of Wellington, in 1828, was First Lord of the Treasury, his lordship was Master of the Royal Buck Hounds. He again took office under Sir Robert Peel's administration, in 1834-5, when he accepted the office of Postmaster-General. Since that period, the noble lord has abstained from taking any active share in politics. He was a zealous but consistent Conservative.

The deceased earl is succeeded in his title and estates by his only son Wm. Pole Tylney Long Wellesley, Viscount Wellesley, born 22nd June, 1788

"ICE TREE," MIDDLE TEMPLE.

The subject of our Engraving represents one of the most curious effects of the late frost, in the metropolis. A great portion of our readers must remember the solitary little fountain in one of the courts of the Middle Temple—a spot enshrined in the amber of Miss Landon's poetry,* and in the humour of Mr. Dickens' "Martin Chuzzlewit." Upon the north side of the fountain pool stood a low tree; and, during the severe weather, the spray from the jet of water, as it fell upon the branches, became incrusted into icicles, and a kind of fairy frost-work, which had a very beautiful appearance. The phenomenon (for such it really was) attracted the notice of several persons; but, in the midst of their admiration, the tree broke down with the weight of its incrustations.

Our Engraving is from a Daguerréotype, taken for this journal: it shows the beautifully frozen tree, with the wintry background, and a portion of the Middle Temple buildings. Whilst the artist was operating for a second Daguerréotype, the tree fell, as we have described.

In the "Illuminated Magazine" for the present month, we find the following graceful lyrical address to this tree:—

Gelidis luxuriosa comis.

Exotic stranger, whence and what art thou?
A spectre rais'd from Flora's winter tomb,
In ghostly bloom!—
Fair Beauty sits upon thy snowy brow
As gracefully as e'er was seen
In summer woodland green,
Where weeping willow o'er some gentle brook
Hath seem'd to look
Into its mirror for the memory
Of happy hours that long have ceas'd to be—(Alas!
No glass
Can show us what we once could see,
And well descry,
Through Nature's own intending eye!)
Thou dost appear
A love lorn Dryad come
From northern forest drear,
To weep a tear
Over the wat'ry tomb
Of some false truant, fled
From thy cold arms to wed
A Nymph of warmer sky;—
And thither sent to die
To find his shallow grave
Beneath the tiny wave
That freezes e'en thy sigh!
Or art thou come to say:—no more
Shall here be trysting as before—
Fond hearts expectant shall not thrill
To meet beneath my icy chill!

If so, vain Tree!
I tell to thee
Fond hearts will brave the thunder shower
And when thou'rt gone—
Vanished before the warming sun,
True Love will keep th' appointed hour! W.

* Miss Landon penned some very beautiful Lines to this Fountain.

'ICE TREE," MIDDLE TEMPLE.

PARIS AND LONDON FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

To form an idea of present fashions, the Paris and the London vogues must be combined in one rapid glance. Paris is at this moment in a state of widowhood, lamenting the departed spirit of pleasure. To the uninterrupted succession of brilliant fêtes, routs, and concerts, to the incessant whirlwind of amusement has succeeded general silence and quietude. The court ceasing its receptions has given an example which all have of necessity followed; brilliant reminiscences are now all that is left. The King and his sons, who forget nothing that can increase their popularity, and who are fully conscious of the high influence exerted by the pleasures of a nation over its graver interests, have this season received more than usual, and the fêtes of the Tuileries have recalled, by their magnificence, the palmy days of Louis XIV. The necessity of luxury and expenditure amongst the aristocracy is well understood in France, and if the costumes of the men yet recall the days of the Directory, the ladies, with better taste and finer tact, now adopt toilettes which, by their splendid elegance, at the same time mark the distinctions of the different classes of society, and promote the welfare of the manufacturer and tradesman.

The novelties of the past season are beyond enumeration but amongst the coiffures, those à la Marie Stuart, the pouffs à la Maintenon, the charming petits bords, surrounded with garlands of diamonds, on little hats à la Raphael, with a slender waving white feather, are those chiefly destined to survive; whilst amongst the dresses, those in the lightest Tulle, trimmed with puffings of the same material, and interspersed with roses, giving an aerial and fairy-like appearance to their youthful wearers and for the married ladies, those embroidered in gold and silver-coloured silk in the most exquisite designs, harmonising admirably with the dazzling brilliance of the jewelled coiffures,—have attained the most enduring favour. A still more singular and picturesque costume consists of a dress whose skirt is embroidered with five rows of border à la Grecque, defined by golden threads; the corsage also in Grecian form, and very short sleeves looped up above with golden tassels. Placed over the braided hair at the back of the head, and as if to confine the knot of hair behind, is a golden resille, encircled by a branch of small wild grape-leaves.

Great preparations are already being made, and brilliant are the prognostics of the well informed. We hear of nothing but drawing-rooms, fancy balls, children's balls, tableaux vivants, reviews, and concerts, at the palace of the Sovereign and the mansions of the peerage, and other millionaires. Amongst those bright visions, one that is on the eve of being accomplished is the opening of the Grand Italian Opera, which will prove too small to contain the crowd eager to behold the extraordinary assemblage of artists from all countries, covered with the laurels they have each separately reaped in capitals distinguished for their fastidious taste, and who have come to lay them at the feet of John Bull, and receive from him the applause that is alone wanting to complete their European fame. But whilst such is the aspect of things on the stage, that of the house before the proscenium will offer scarce less interest, and we speak of costumes adapted for effect. Who that has ever witnessed it can forget the effect produced by the singing of the National Anthem at the Italian Opera in London? How much is the solemn and magnificent effect of the music given forth by so many voices, heightened by the sight of the concourse of beauty set off by the costliest attire, and the prestige of rank and birth standing around in sympathy. The costumes, therefore, for such an occasion must be of the greatest importance, and are with ladies the pressing concern of the moment.

Dresses of blue, white, or rose-coloured satin, open and displaying beneath, under skirts of silver-coloured moire, edged with silver embroidery, over which hang embroidered scarfs; others opened over under-skirts of brocaded gold, the extremity of the opening being caught up by a rose or a diamond, and round the waist a cordeliere of plain gold, gracefully twisted, and terminating in two tassels; or, dresses of gold and cherry-coloured satin, made à la Agnes Sorel, trimmed with gold chefs, and opening over a magnificent guipure skirt dress, caught up by gold ornaments of a spiral form, will be of the highest vogue. A turban of gold net-work, forming a small calotte, fastened on each side by two golden tulips, and the point of each leaf formed by a diamond, or ruby, present an admirable accompaniment to this style of dress.

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'.

Miss Cushman appeared as Lady Macbeth, on Friday evening last, and fully answered the expectations we had formed of her acting in this character. Her success was most complete; indeed, it is some time since we have heard such genuine and repeated bursts of applause as those which greeted her, throughout her performance. There was the same perfect absence of anything like a straining after an effect which we have before remarked in this lady's acting; and yet wherever it was required her energy had something in it that was really terrible. The part which appeared to make the greatest impression on the audience, was in the banquet scene of the third act. The effect of her earnest anxiety to talk away the suspicions excited in the breasts of the visitors by Macbeth's horror at the apparition of Banquo, was electrical. Mr. Forrest was less successful as Macbeth. From his previous performances we had expected better things; and we were grievously disappointed. His long pauses were wearisome and tedious to an insupportable degree: and there was a total absence of expressive passion to compensate for the wiredrawn periods of silence. It is true that he ranted at times, but it was with the half-energy of a man, who thinks such physical exertion beneath him, although he must do it to please his audience. They applauded vigorously, it is true: but they also hissed, and sometimes tittered, which was worse. The other characters were respectably played: which is all we can say for them. The choruses were given with much effect, and comprised the principal members of the operatic company, including Messrs. Allen, Leffler, and Hime; Misses Condell, Emma Stanley, and Grant; and Madame Feron. Some entr'actes, by Mr. C. Horn, were introduced; but there was such a noise in the house, which was densely crammed, that we cannot offer an opinion upon their merits.

Miss Cushman was announced to appear, on Thursday, as Rosalind, in "As You Like it." Her engagement appears altogether to have been a most fortunate stroke of policy on the part of Mr. Maddox.

SCENE FROM "MACBETH," AT THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

DRURY LANE.

Notwithstanding the entire failure of the last ballet, "Les Danaides," the business at this establishment has been above the average, even to such old performances as "The Bohemian Girl" and "Der Freyschutz," which have drawn one or two good houses. In the latter opera Miss Romer and Mr. King have obtained and merited very considerable applause; and their exertions in "La Sonnambula" have been similarly successful. Mr. Bunn announced his benefit for Monday evening next. The programme is attractive, commencing with the "Elisir d'Amore," followed by a divertissement conducted by Jullien and Kœnig: then a concert, sustained by the principal artistes of the theatre, and, lastly, the ballet of "Giselle." A mistake is made in the bill, in allusion to this ballet, which should be rectified. It is stated that it will be performed "for the first time on the English stage." This is wrong: the ballet of "Giselle" was produced, and with very good effect, at the Princess' Theatre, where it attracted for some time, the principal character being played by Miss Ballin. If we recollect rightly it was the season before last.

COVENT GARDEN.

This theatre has closed somewhat suddenly, with the announcement that it would be re-opened on the 3rd of March, with some attractive novelties. As no further notice has appeared, we feel inclined to doubt the statement. The season has been very short, and, we should expect, very unprosperous, "Antigone" being the only production that was of any service to the treasury. This is not so much to be wondered at, looking at the very slovenly and poverty-stricken style in which the legitimate plays were placed upon the stage. Nor, putting the Vandenhoffs on one side, was the company particularly strong: it is much to be regretted that there is not some authority established to prevent lessees running into wild speculations, in which example does not appear to be of the slightest benefit; and collecting together all sorts of unemployed and mediocre performers, who thereby get the stigma more indelibly fixed upon them of always joining forlorn hopes, and always failing in the enterprise. We could mention at least a dozen names of actors who are inseparably connected with struggling managements, half salaries, and sudden closures.

HAYMARKET.

On Monday evening "an entirely new and original comedy, in three acts," as it was called in the bills, from the veteran pen of Mr. R. B. Peake, was produced at this theatre. Properly speaking, it was a three act farce; but as the majority of successful comedies (so called) of late have come under the same category of dramatic writing, and have been applauded throughout by full and contented audiences, we do not feel disposed to grumble at the name. Mr. Squeers remarked that there was no act of Parliament against a man calling his house an island, if he pleased; so we imagine that Mr. Peake is at liberty to dub his humorous piece a comedy if he thinks proper so to do, without any serious punishment being attendant thereupon. This new comedy, then, is called "The Sheriff of the County." Everybody who has resided in the country perfectly understands the jealousies and ludicrous attempts to eclipse each other prevalent amongst the natives—going upwards from the wives of the chemist and grocer to the ladies of the rival medical men, and finally reaching the female members of the county families; for amongst the fair sex principally is the wish to outvie shown. Mrs. Hollylodge (Mrs. Glover) is of this order; and she has a "Mrs. Grundy" in the person of her neighbour, Lady Winkleworth (Mrs. W. Clifford) desirous of eclipsing the popularity of her patrician acquaintance. Mrs. Hollylodge contrives a plot with her brother, Mr. Smirker (Mr. Strickland), an attorney, to get her husband nominated sheriff of the county. Poor Mr. Hollylodge (Mr. W. Farren) is a quiet simple-minded country gentleman, seeking no pleasures beyond his garden and poultry-yard, and is terribly alarmed when he hears of the honour that has been thrust upon him: but, by the persuasions of his wife, consents to serve. And then his discomforts commence. A superb London footman, Nonpareil (Mr. Webster), fresh from the Mansion House, is brought down to drill the rustic servants into becoming deportment. Liveries come down from London—carriages are emblazoned—banners are painted—and the poor old gentleman is thrust into all sorts of fine coats, by mistake and design, until he scarcely knows what has become of his senses. In the end, however, Smirker is struck off the rolls, for tampering with some one in office during the progress of the scheme; and Mrs. Hollylodge finds all her plans defeated, to the overwhelming joy and content of her poor harmless husband. There was an underplot, in which Forrester (Mr. H. Holl), a young soldier, strikes his superior officer for insulting his sister Ellen (Miss Julia Bennett), and is thereby sentenced to death. But everything is adjusted in the end, and he turns out to be the nephew of Mr. Hollylodge.

It will be seen in all this there is great room for fun: and the notion has been admirably worked out by Mr. Peake. The dialogue is exceedingly smart, and full of puns, quaint ideas, and allusions, which never allow the audience to go to sleep for an instant. The equivoques, for there are one or two in the course of the piece, are neatly managed—especially that in which Nonpareil is taken by Mrs. Hollylodge for one of the officers. In fact, comedy or farce, if the object of the author was to keep a full house amused and laughing for a little over two hours, he succeeded to the fullest extent of his intentions. We need not say more of the acting of Farren and Mrs. Glover than that it was, as usual, most excellent. Mr. Webster's Nonpareil, too, was perfect. His very bow got a round of applause—we never saw a better illustration of a footman who might be supposed to have swallowed his own gold-headed cane. Mr. Buckstone had a very amusing part, that of Pansy, an "odd man" and gardener, addicted to the study of history, scraps of which he was perpetually turning out. His anxiety to know from Crawley (Mrs. Humby) whether she considered Jane Shore a proper person to have been a governess in a well-regulated family, was very droll; and his announcements of the company, at the ball, in the second act, were delicious. The last arrival, that of "the baker with the tarts!" threw the house into a roar of laughter as the drop descended. Mr. Strickland was effective in the attorney; and Mrs. W. Clifford played Lady Winkleworth with her accustomed care. Messrs. Holl and Howe had not very prominent parts, but they played them carefully; and Miss Julia Bennett was as attractive as ever in Ellen. The piece, which has been very carefully put upon the stage, was announced for repetition every evening, amidst loud applause.

Mr. John Parry commenced an engagement of twelve nights here on Monday, and has been nightly encored in Albert Smith's buffo romance, "Fayre Rosamonde." Altogether the Haymarket is doing well.

THE FRENCH PLAYS.

M. Lemaitre is creating a greater sensation than any member of the French company who has as yet appeared at the St. James's Theatre; and his successive performances in "La Dame de St. Tropez" attracted the most crowded audiences. The management has been attacked in one or two quarters for producing this "arsenicated" piece, on the ground that, in these days of death by poisoning, such representations make the crime fashionable. This is a good time for the literary professors of "virtuous indignation" and cynical humanity to take up, as it admits of high-pressure phrases and bitter invective; but it is founded on false reasoning. The agonies of a man dying from poison, portrayed with unmistakeable and clinical minuteness, and the certainty of its discovery by tests and re-agents, when demonstrated on the stage, would tend to stop rather than increase murder by that means; letting alone the circumstance that the ignorant class amongst whom the crime is most frequent do not attend the French plays. We admit that the taste which produced "La Dame de St. Tropez" is questionable—that its details border on the revolting; but this is entirely owing to the consummate manner in which the "pathology" of the piece is brought out, not to its morale. As well might we forbid the performance of the last act of "Othello," for fear that all gentlemen of jealous temperaments should go home and smother their wives, after witnessing its representation, and taking a lesson in practical asphyxia.

On Monday evening M. Lemaitre appeared in his celebrated character of Don Cæsar de Bazan, in the piece of that name, with the story of which the greater part of our readers are acquainted, through the means of the various adaptations lately brought out at our theatres. Of our English representatives of the character Mr. James Wallack certainly stood first. Mr. Webster was somewhat too heavy, and Mr. Charles Mathews too frivolous. The performance of M. Lemaitre was far superior to any of them; and, by placing it on a level with his impersonation of Robert Macaire, we give the highest praise that can be awarded to it. He never lost sight of the gentleman: in his most dissipated phases the high spirit of honour continually broke through his recklessness, even in the earlier scenes; where his apparent intoxication was portrayed in the same masterly style of acting that characterises all he undertakes. His interpretation of the rôle was in every respect a masterpiece, and was throughout continuously and warmly applauded. Mdlle. Clarisse appeared in Maritana, and sustained her reputation as a careful actress, although of no very great pretensions.

The "Auberge des Adrets" and "Trente Ans" are, we believe, in rehearsal, for representation, before M. Lemaitre's departure.

SADLER'S WELLS.

Success still continues to attend the exertions made by the excellently-conducted management of this theatre; and the last production, under its direction, promises to eclipse the others in every way. "Richard the Third," from the original text of Shakspeare, in preference to the hashed and interpolated melodrama, adapted from two or three separate plays, by Colley Cibber, was brought out here on Thursday evening, last week, and met with the most gratifying reception. The utmost pains have been taken in placing it properly upon the stage; and the same careful arrangement of the scenic effects, which we first had occasion to notice in the production of "Hamlet" at this house, has been studiously regarded. Thus, a view of the old banks of the river, in London, was admirably designed; so, also, was the battle-field, in which the two tents of the opposing powers were simultaneously presented. The costumes, properties, and general appliances were in similar good taste. Mr. Phelps' acting, as Richard, was careful and judicious, played in the same unaffected and level style, so characteristic of this gentleman's performance, which, if it never reaches a very high standard, at the same time always avoids even mediocrity. He is, in every respect, a "safe" actor; and as such, a valuable one. Mrs. Warner was most impressive, as the Queen, but we were not altogether pleased with Miss Jane Mordaunt's Lady Anne. Her appearance was sweet and graceful enough; but she lacked energy, and seemed to have an undecided conception of the part. Mr. John Webster was vigorous as Richmond, fighting, especially, with unwonted spirit: and Mr. H. Marston played Hastings very well. At the conclusion, Mr. Phelps and Mrs. Warner were called forward amidst a storm of applause, which lasted for several minutes. The tragedy was announced for repetition every night during the week.

ADELPHI.

Dramatists have various fancies; sometimes their taste runs on well-born scamps of the Don Cæsar de Bazan class; at others, on British sailors and venerable old men: Mr. Maddison Morton's last penchant appears to have been for unclaimed babies. The interest of one of his latest farces—"Young England"—turned upon a small character of this kind, and the same rôle was made use of, to perplex the comic gentleman in the droll interlude produced at this theatre on Monday evening. "The Mother and Child are Doing Well" is a translation from a French piece of the same name, "L'Enfant et la mere se portent bien," in which, we believe, Arnal played at the Variétés. The chief part in the present farce—that of Mr. Felix Fluffy—is entrusted to Mr. Wright, who is supposed to be a London tradesman, travelling in Jamaica. He is here entrusted with a strange infant, which he conceives to be the offspring of the young lady he is engaged to; and his confusion is increased by the jargon of a negro woman, who talks about the "murder" and the "piccaninny," which Wright muddles up into some disclosure about a murder in Piccadilly. At last he gets completely puzzled; and his mysterious bewilderment and floundering attempts to enlighten himself, were amongst the drollest things we ever witnessed. The other characters were well played by Miss Fortescue and Messrs. Paul Bedford and Lambert, but Mr. Fluffy was the part of the play, which he announced for repetition in a manner which convulsed the house with laughter. The farce was completely successful; and capitally received by a very crowded audience. The "Green Bushes" still continues to attract, and is likely to remain in the bills for some time.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The opening of this Theatre is, à ce qu'on dit, unavoidably postponed to March the 8th. Disappointments like these are not pleasant; the announcements should not be made unadvisedly; for even musical hope deferred maketh the ear sick. The opera of "Ernani," by the young composer Verdi, is spoken of in the highest terms by all parties: the light and severe in taste agree in saying that it is a work of no ordinary merit. We have hastily perused the score, but shall reserve our criticism until we have an opportunity of doing it ample justice.

MUSIC.

MADAME DULCKEN'S SOIREES.

The third and last of these agreeable meetings took place on Wednesday last, at Madame Dulcken's residence in Harley-street. A quintuor, by Schaffner, was the first of the instrumental pieces. Beethoven's quintuor for pianoforte, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, was subsequently played by Messrs. Grattan Cooke, Meyer, Jarrett, and Keating. His sonata in C minor, and Mendelssohn's concerto in D for pianoforte and orchestra, constituted the remainder of the instrumental selection. Madame Dulcken's performances were, as is usually the case, the very perfection of skill.

Mdlle. Schloss was the vocal star. She sang a manuscript recitative and aria (with orchestral accompaniments), composed expressly for her by Mendelssohn, and executed it, we would say, even to the composer's wish. In the second part of the concert, she gave Mozart's "All 'desio," and two songs by Schubert, which were enthusiastically received. Nothing else was so remarkably excellent as to deserve individual notice.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

We are doomed to hear every season some new pretensions to song which, if they do not succeed in making us forget the older and the better, at least distract our attention, and seduce our judgment, through the means of that siren—Novelty! Are operas like waves? or is the tide of song well described in the Latin line—or shall we have wave after wave efface the beauty of something we had noticed and loved before? These are questions which may interest the poet and confound the logician. But to be serious; a great novelty is a great thing, and is as scarce a commodity in music as in literature. The truth is that in these modern days novelty is hailed as beauty—innovation as improvement—and rule breaking, in every art and science, originality and genius! We hope that we may have an opportunity of speaking more favourably of Verdi's opera, which is to be produced on next Saturday.

"Labitur et labetur in omne volubulis ævum!"

NAPLES.—Pacini has produced two new operas—"Leonora" and "Francesca Donata." The former succeeded, the latter failed. Parish Alvars left on the 15th inst. for Vienna. He will reach London in March. His concerts here have won him both fame and money. This eminent performer has just finished an elementary treatise on the instrument. He has also just completed a pianoforte concerto written expressly for Madame Dulcken.

A pretty opera, by Clapisson, "Les Deux Bergers," has been successfully produced at the Opera Comique, in Paris. The music is of a pastoral kind, quite in Auber's manner, but very piquant. Auber's opera for the Comique is deferred till next month. Leopold de Meyer's recent concert passed off with the greatest enthusiasm. His "Marche Marocaine" was loudly encored. On the 12th, the King of the French gave a musical soirée, at which all the rank and genius of Paris were present. "Le Desert" of Felicien David was performed by an orchestra under the direction of Habeneck. The English Ambassador, M. Guizot, and Victor Hugo, were among the assembly.

MISS BASSANO.—This young lady is at Venice, where she has been performing in "Il Barbière" and "La Cenerentola," at Malibran's Theatre. Her next engagement will be at Genoa.

Henry Phillips will start for England on the 1st of July, and remain twelve months; after which he will pay another year's visit to the United States.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

It is now quite settled that Sir John Franklin is to make another expedition to the Arctic circle. The Erebus and Terror are to be equipped for the purpose. The expedition is expected to sail about the first week in May. The ships being in first rate order, will not require the least repair. The only alterations necessary will be for the purpose of applying the small steam-power and a screw-propeller to assist them in light winds or calms, which greatly prevail amongst the ice of Baffin's Bay. The officers will be immediately appointed. The intended route is through Barrow Straits, between Cape Walker and Bankes' Land, and thence to the continent of America to the westward of Woollaston Land.

The King of Sardinia has ordered fifty thousand livres to be appropriated for erecting a monument in memory of Columbus; and his Majesty has further appointed a commission, with the Marquis Durazza as president, to carry the project into execution. The statue is to be ready and inaugurated at Genoa on the 15th of September, 1846, on which day the meeting of the congress of Italian savans is fixed to take place in that city.

We read in the Augsburg Gazette:—"A Catholic priest, of the Government of Lublin, in Poland, has been hanged for exciting the peasantry to riot. No Bishop could be found to degrade him, as is necessary in all cases where an ecclesiastic is to be executed, until the Bishop of Kalish consented to do so."

A fatal event took place in the village of Rodoret, in Piedmont, last month, by which the Rev. Daniel Buffa, the clergyman of that place, and his family lost their lives. During the night an avalanche fell upon his residence, situated on an alpine steep; the clergyman, aged 29; his wife, 20; and their infant son, were discovered quite dead; a servant shared the same fate; a favourite dog alone survived. This sad catastrophe has occasioned a mournful sensation throughout the Protestant Valleys.

A fatal cattle disease had just broken out at Laeken, a few miles from Brussels. Twenty heads of cattle have already perished. The veterinary surgeons designate the disease as typhus charbonneux.

It appears, by a Parliamentary paper, that the sum applied to the reduction of the National Debt from Jan. 5, 1844, to Jan. 5, 1845, was £1,563,648 10s. 9d. The sum to be applied in the quarter between Jan. 7 and April 5, 1845, is £845,685 12s

The Belgian Government has received a proposition to construct a line of railway (without the guarantee of a minimum of interest) from Liege to Namur, to be extended hereafter to France, by way of Dinant.

According to authentic intelligence from the Caucasus, the early appearance of unusually severe cold, and the great masses of snow which cover all the hills, have impeded military operations on both sides. In the month of March, when the Cuban and the Tereck will become passable, the fighting will be renewed. All the reports of the great losses of the Russians during the year 1844, by the capture of the fortresses of Chunsak and Tamir-Hantshura, by the Circassians, so industriously spread through Persia and Turkey, prove to be quite unfounded. Notwithstanding the immense force with which this campaign was commenced on the part of the Russians, very few battles occurred, and only two of them can be properly called sanguinary.

A letter from Capt. Gruby, of the Wm. Ward, of Ichaboe, dated Dec. 21, states that an accident had occurred by the falling in of earth in a guano pit, whereby five men were killed. There were about fifty men upon a stage which also fell, but they escaped. Capt. G. states that the vessels then at Ichaboe would take away all the guano, and that several which had recently arrived would get none.

The King of Sweden opened the Session of the Norwegian Storthing, at Christiana, on the 10th ult. His Majesty left the Palace, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Crown Prince of Sweden, and the Princes Gustave and Oscar, the Queen, with Prince August and Prince Eugenia, having preceded her Majesty.

The Gazette du Midi, of Marseilles, states that the mail running between Rome and Florence was lately stopped by banditti, and robbed of the money and the letters it was carrying. The conductor was cruelly ill-treated.

A letter from Valparaiso, dated Nov. 12, says, "The British schooner Laura Ann arrived here yesterday from Tahiti. The news she has brought from thence reaches to the 6th of October. No material alteration had taken place in the state of affairs.

According to a letter from Frankfort of the 22nd of February, every day brings fresh intelligence of the change, for better or worse, in the health of the Empress of Russia. On the other hand, the special complaint (jaundice) under which the Emperor was said to labour, is a mere invention. It is, nevertheless, apparent that he has been much weakened in bodily health since the death of his daughter and niece, and that his mind even has received a manifest shock. More frequently than ever he is seen walking alone in the streets, buried in thought. So far, however, as the duties of government are concerned, he still shows himself to be the same clear-sighted and headstrong Czar.

The funeral of the late Dr. Heberden, who died at his residence in Cumberland-street last week, and who was one of the physicians, in conjunction with Drs. Willis and Halford, to his Majesty George the Third, took place on Tuesday at Windsor, the body being deposited in the family vault in the church of St. John.

A Constantinople letter of the 5th states that the Turkish Divan, obliged to cede to Sir Stratford Canning in the affair of Tripoli, have taken their revenge in the settlement of those provinces of the Lebanon which contain Druses and Maronites mixed. Sir Stratford Canning recommended a single authority; the French Ambassador preferred two, one Druse one Maronite, and the Divan adopted the recommendation of France.

It will be seen by the following accounts from various parts of the Continent that the severity of the frost has been frightful. At Augsburg, last week, the 96 fountains that supply the town with water were completely frozen up. The cold was at 22 degrees below the freezing point of Reaumur—17½ below zero of Fahrenheit. A Copenhagen letter of the 12th ult. states that the winter in Denmark has been more severe than in any preceding year since 1829. The Journal du Havre states, that on Thursday week the Seine, below Quillebœuf, was so covered with blocks of ice, that it was with the greatest difficulty that the tug-steamers could make their way through them up to the quay of that town; but get beyond it was impossible, the ice from thence up to Villequier being so closely packed that scarcely any interstices were to be seen.

Buenos Ayres letters of the 14th Dec. say:—"There is news from Montevideo up to the 11th inst., and it is reported that Riveira in person had defeated the first division of Oribe's cavalry, under the immediate command of Urquiga, which, most probably, will cause an early movement of the Corrientes army.

The Medical Times reports the case of a strong hostler who had never been bitten by a dog, having been attacked with hydrophobia, in consequence of a bite from a healthy horse on the arm. The symptoms were exactly those of hydrophobia, and the patient died in nine hours after the attack.

GREAT SAVING IN SOAP AND LABOUR.
Royal Letters Patent, granted March 4, 1844.

WARD'S PATENT WASHING and CLEANSING POWDER, manufactured at the Oldbury Alkali Works, near Birmingham. One great advantage which this powder possesses over others consists in its not injuring the hands of the persons using it. Other Washing Powders contain carbonate of soda in its free state, which, by acting upon the skin, inflames the hands and renders them sore and wrinkled. Other advantages peculiar to this powder may be stated as follows, viz.:—A saving of at least one-half of the soap which is necessary when soda is used. A great saving in the labour of washing. The colour of linen and other fabrics turns out far superior in whiteness to that which is given by any other means. From the wear and tear caused by the rubbing and mailding being diminished, the durability of the clothes is increased.
This Powder will be found very valuable in Scouring Greasy Floors and Tables, in Cleansing Brass, Tin, and other Utensils of domestic use, and also Publicans' Pewter Pots.
 Warranted not to injure articles, though made of the finest materials.
Sold in packets, at 1d., 2d., 3d., and 6d. each, with directions for using. Be particular in asking for WARD'S WASHING POWDER, as no other possesses the same qualities.—To be had of all Druggists, Grocers, Oilmen, &c.

Under the especial patronage of her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen.

WANTED, in a respectable family, a SITUATION as LADY'S MAID, or to take the care of Young Children. The Advertiser has never before lived in a situation, and will not therefore make salary an immediate object. The most satisfactory references of respectability will be given by addressing, A. B., 201, Strand.

BARTLE and JARVIS, 266, STRAND, supply a splendid FROCK COAT, with silk facings, from 35s. to 60s. DRESS COAT, same quality, from 32s. to 55s. Fit warranted, being cut upon a peculiar plan, entirely their own, calculated to fit every shape and size without difficulty, and at the same time, it may be observed, the prices are the same as those charged by the puffing slop sellers.

MRS. NEWMAN, now of Stratford House, Essex, late Miss Bowles, of the Rectory House, Bow (where she conducted a LADIES' SCHOOL for eighteen years), informs her Friends she CONTINUES to manage her present ESTABLISHMENT upon the same honourable principle, and in that liberal manner which has given so much satisfaction. Terms, 35 guineas per annum.—Omnibuses every five minutes from Leadenhall-street.

THE MINARET PARASOL, from the elegance and symmetry of its form, is by far the most beautiful yet introduced. The price does not exceed that of ordinary parasols, although a very graceful improvement has been effected in its construction. The attention and patronage of the public is requested to this elegant novelty, which can be had at any of the respectable drapers; and wholesale at all the wholesale dealers. Observe—The silver runner is stamped with the word "Minaret."

SEVERE COLDS.—But very few persons at this season are without Colds, and they being the precursors of many serious maladies, all should adopt the most speedy remedy. Nothing is more soothing to the irritated organs than pure Gruel, and EDWARDS' PREPARED GROATS will be found superior to any ever produced for making this diet to the utmost perfection, and as a daily Food for Children and Invalids it is invaluable. Sold by all respectable Grocers, Oilmen, &c., in packets and canisters, 6d. and 1s. each, and wholesale and for exportation, by EDWARDS BROTHERS, 99, Blackfriars-road, London.

DAVIES'S FINE WAX-WICK MOULDS, 6d. per lb; Candles, 5d.; Botanic Wax, 1s.; German Wax, 1s. 2d.; Fine Wax, 1s. 5d.; Genuine Spermaceti, 2s.; Transparent Wax, 2s.; Genuine Wax, 2s. 3d.; Hall, or Price's Composite, 10d., Mexican Cake, 9d. Yellow Soap, 48s., 52s. and 58s. per 112lbs.; Mottled 60s and 64s; Windsor, 1s. 4d. per packet; Brown Windsor, 1s. 9d.; Palm, 1s. 4d.; Rose, 2s; Almond, 2s. 6d. Sealing Wax, 1s. 6d. per lb. Vegetable Oil, 4s. 6d. per gallon Solar, 3s. 6d.; Sperm, 7s. 6d. For Cash, at Davies's Old-Established Warehouse, 63, St. Martin's-lane, opposite Slaughter's Coffee-house.

ANOTHER WONDER, or CURE EXTRAORDINARY by HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—Mr. Maguire, a respectable person, residing near Sunlays Well, Cork, was given over in a case of dropsy, and was perfectly cured, when pronounced to be at the point of death, by these wonderful Pills. Persons, either young or old, who become corpulent, bloated, or dropsical, may not only avoid apoplexy and other dangerous diseases attending thereon, but also regain the highest state of health, strength, and energy, and their figures become as tight, as light, and as good as in the days of youth.—Sold (also Holloway's Ointment) at Professor Holloway's Establishment, 244, Strand (where advice may be had gratis), and by almost all respectable venders of medicine throughout the civilised world.

COD LIVER OIL.—This natural Remedy, and certain Cure for GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, &c. &c., is, without exception, one of the most valuable discoveries of the present age; it is prepared, by a peculiar process, from the liver of the cod fish, and its efficacy in curing the above complaints, when all other remedies have failed, is attested by the highest medical authorities; so many cases of complete cure have now been published, and so many are daily occurring, that they are now considered as the result of every day practice. Prospectuses, containing a few only of the most remarkable Cures effected, are given with each genuine bottle of this remedy, and bear the signature of the only mercantile Agents, JONES and Co., 201, Strand. Sold by all Medicine Vendors, in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. each.

GREGORY'S SAUCE.—The attention of the Public is respectfully invited to Gregory's Sauce Epicurienne, a single trial of which will fully convince that it stands alone unrivalled for its peculiarly fine flavour, and that its usefulness in the "cuisine" department is not surpassed by any other sauce. It also greatly assists digestion.—Prepared only and sold wholesale by G. B. Gregory, Cook and Confectioner, Everett-street, London; and may be had of all the principal Oilmen, Grocers, &c., in town and country. N.B. This sauce is secured by Betts' Patent Metallic Capsule, which effectually excludes the air, and will keep good in all climates, and for any period. Sold in Bottles, half-pints, 1s. 6d.; pints, 2s. 6d. Agent of Liverpool, Mr. J. T. Pearce, 25, Wilton-street, Soho; Bath, Mr. Chas. Wood, Confectioner, Bridge-street; Shrewsbury, Mr. Evans, High-street, &c &c.

COX'S PATENT SPARKLING GELATINE for MAKING JELLIES, BLANCMANGE, &c., stronger than Isinglass, at one-third the price, is particularly economical and convenient for the use of Families, Hotel-keepers, Invalids, and others, and a profitable article for exportation. Sold, in packets only, by the principal Druggists, Grocers, and Oilmen in the United Kingdom, at 9d., 1s. 6d., 3s., 5s., and 7s.; each packet bearing the Patentee's signature.—Extract from Dr. Ure's Testimonial:—"London, 9th February, 1844.—I have much pleasure in certifying that the Patent Sparkling Gelatine of Messrs. J. and G. Cox is prepared by an excellent process, which, while it preserves entire all the virtues of this alimentary substance, renders it equally pure and beautiful. Examined by chemical tests, it is found perfectly free from acid, and fully stronger than the best isinglass in the London market, and affords a Jelly, in a few minutes, equal in all respects to, if not richer and more crystalline than that prepared from calves' feet."—Wholesale Agents: Edward Curtis, 11 Old Fish-street; John Clerk, 30, Mersey-street, Liverpool. Patent Gelatine Works, Gorgie Mills, Edinburgh.

MR. HACKETT, THE CELEBRATED AMERICAN ACTOR now performing in this country, gave the following unsolicited testimonial to the efficacy of PARR'S LIFE PILLS before leaving New York:—

To the Proprietors of PARR'S LIFE PILLS.

Sirs.—Having used PARR'S LIFE PILLS on several occasions when attacked by violent Bilious complaints, and having been fully satisfied of their efficacy, I beg leave in justice to you as proprietors of the medicine, to testify as much. Yours, respectfully,

W. H. Hackett.

Long Island, Nov. 9, 1844.

. The extraordinary effect of this medicine is the wonder of the age; it has been tried by hundreds of thousands as an aperient, and has in every instance done good; it has never in the slightest degree impared the most delicate constitution. Tens of thousands have testified that perseverance in the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS will completely cure any disease, and are living witnesses of the benefit received from this invaluable medicine.—Sheets of testimonials and the "Life and Times of Old Parr" may be had gratis, of every respectable Medicine Vendor throughout the kingdom.

Beware of spurious imitations of the above medicine. None are genuine unless the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS" are in WHITE letters on a RED ground, engraved on the Government Stamp, pasted round each box; also the fac-simile of the signature of the Proprietors, "T. ROBERTS and Co.," on the directions. Sold by all respectable chemists, druggists, and dealers in patent medicine. Price 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and family boxes 11s. each. Full directions are given with each box.

BULL and WILSON are now fully prepared to submit their Spring assortment of FANCY WOOLLEN GOODS. Wholesale Parcels as 1st April. Office—Warehouse Entrance is No. 52, St. Martin's-lane.

NOTICE TO INVENTORS.—Office for Patents of Inventions and Registrations of Designs, 14, Lincoln's-inn-fields. The Printed Instructions Gratis, and every information upon the subject of Protection for Inventions, either by Letters Patent or the Designs Act, may be had by applying personally, or by letter, pre-paid, to Mr. Alexander Prince, at the office, 14, Lincoln's-inn-fields.

CROSBY HALL VAULTS, 35, Bishopsgate-street Within.—OLD BOTTLED WINES:—Port, 36s. and 42s.; Do., six years in bottle, 48s; Do. superior draught, 28s. and 33s.; Sherries, pale and brown, 36s. and 42s.; Bucellas, 32s.; Sherry (an excellent dinner wine), 28s.; Marsala, 24s. per dozen. Bottles, 2s. 6d. per dozen; hampers, 1s. per dozen. . Marsala per Quarter Pipe, £11 11s.

PEOPLE needful of Economy, will do well to observe that the EAST INDIA TEA COMPANY are supplying Six Pounds of either Black or Green Tea for Seventeen Shillings. Six Pounds of Coffee for Five Shillings; and other descriptions of Teas and Coffees at prices in proportion to their respective qualities.—Offices, No. 9, Great St. Helen's Church-yard, Bishopsgate.

HOBY'S IMPERIAL BLACKING has no unpleasant smell; its lasting polish equals patent leather, softens the upper leather, and alleviates the pain of corns and tender feet. Bottles 1s. 6d. and 1s.; paste 6d. London: 48, St. James's-street; Benetfink and Jones, 81, Cheapside. Edinburgh: Duncan and Co., 59, Princes-street. Dublin: Hodges, Westmoreland-street.—N.B.—Especially recommended for Harness.

STAMMERING.—Mr. HUNT, of 224, Regent-street, has returned to Town for the Season.—A Prospectus, containing Testimonials from the "Times," "Literary Gazette," "Medico Chirurgical Review," &c., as well as from Sir Peter Laurie, respecting the cure of Mr. George Pearson, who witnessed the treasonable attempt on the Queen's life by Francis, sent, on application as above, to any part of the Kingdom.

LESSONS IN MILLINERY AND DRESSMAKING.—Mrs. HOWELL, of 304, Regent-street, two doors from Margaret-street, sole inventress of teaching the art of Dressmaking in a series of Lessons, undertakes to convey to persons of the meanest capacity a correct knowledge of cutting, fitting, and executing, in the most finished style, in Six Lessons, for One Guinea. The correctness of this mode can be fully substantiated by reference to pupils.—Millinery and Dress Rooms.

LESSONS in the MAZOURKA, MAZOURKA VALSE, POLKA, and VALSE a DEUX TEMPS (as taught by Cellarius), by Mr. WILLIS, 41, Brewer-street, Golden-square. Private Lessons at all hours to Ladies and Gentlemen of any age, wishing privacy and expedition. An Evening Class on Mondays and Fridays. A Juvenile Class on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Terms may be had on application as above. The Rooms may be engaged by private parties.

SIR ROBERT PEEL has not made any alteration in the duty on Tea, and as the Income-tax will be continued, it behoves the economist, when purchasing articles of daily consumption, to look to quality as well as price. We hold the doctrine that "nothing is cheap that is not good." The Black Tea at Four and Sixpence per pound is both cheap and good, as are all articles sold by DAKIN and COMPANY, Tea-merchants, at NUMBER ONE, St. Paul's Churchyard.

CHINA, GLASS and EARTHENWARE.—JOSEPH WHITE (from Messrs. Green's, St. Paul's Church-yard) begs most respectfully to inform the Nobility, Gentry and Public, that he has recently opened Premises at No. 210, Regent-street, with an entirely new and splendid Stock of China, Glass, and Earthenware, which he is offering for Sale upon the best terms, for Cash only. Chandeliers, Lustres, Candelabra, and Table and Hanging Lamps, and every variety of Ornamental China. No. 210, Regent-street, opposite Conduit-street.

BERDOE'S VENTILATING WATERPROOF FROCKS (in lieu of the unhealthy "Macintosh," vulgar Tweeds, &c.) are light, portable, durable and economical; adapted for general use at all seasons, and a convenient substitute for a Great Coat. In appearance they are thoroughly respectable, equally free from singularity or vulgarity; are guaranteed to exclude any rain whatever; and no untried novelty, having been in extensive and most successful use more than six years. A large Stock in new and greatly improved materials now ready, of which an inspection is confidently invited. Made only by W. Berdoe, Tailor, Waterproofer, &c., 69, Cornhill (north side).

PALMER'S CANDLES.—PALMER and Co. caution the Public against spurious Metallic Wick Candles, which are frequently sold for theirs; they have had candles returned to them as bad, which, on inspection, have proved to be an imitation. Every Metallic Wick Candle made by Palmer and Co. has the word "Palmer" stamped on the top of it, round the wick, and also the name on the label.—Sutton-street, Clerkenwell.—DECIMAL PALM CANDLES, giving the light of three tallow candles, and requiring no snuffing, are reduced to 6½d. per lb.; Palm Moulds, six to the lb., for the Lamps 7½d. per lb. Sold by all Oilmen, &c.

TO CLERGYMEN AND COUNTRY GENTLEMEN.—The ORTHOCHRONOGRAPH; an instrument patented by WEBSTER and SON, Chronometer-makers to the Lords of the Admiralty and the East India Company, and introduced by Dr. Robinson at the late meeting of the British Association. By this instrument true time may be obtained at any part of the world, for the correction of clocks, watches, and chronometers, by the most inexperienced person, to a correctness not hitherto attained, but by those accustomed to the use of astronomical instruments. Its simplicity, portability, and the ease with which the results are obtained, will enable persons to keep their clocks and watches to true time. An explanatory paper forwarded free on the receipt of two stamps.

Webster and Son, 74, Cornhill, London.

SUPERIOR LOOKING GLASSES and Splendid Gilt PICTURE FRAMES.—CHARLES M'LEAN, 78, Fleet-street, respectfully informs the trade, artists, upholsterers, and the public, that they can be supplied with LOOKING GLASSES and PICTURE FRAMES, of the very best manufacture, at prices never hitherto attempted.—May be had gratis, and sent free of post to any part of the Kingdom, large Sheets of Drawings, representing the exact patterns and prices of 100 different sized picture frames, and 120 looking glasses, elegantly ornamented with designs made expressly for this manufactory. The trade supplied with frames in the compo. Fancy wood frames and mouldings, and room borderings. Old frames repaired and regilt. Glasses re-silvered. 30,000 frames kept seasoned for immediate delivery. All goods not approved of in three months taken back, and money returned.

COGAN and GILLO'S NOVARGENT or SILVER SOLUTION, re-silvers worn out Plated Articles, by instantly depositing a Coating of Pure Silver on the surface. It has been highly approved by Dr Ryan, Professor of Chemistry to the Royal Polytechnic Institution. Sold wholesale by Barclay and Sons, 95, Farringdon-st., London; and Joseph Rodgers and Sons, 6, Norfolk-st., Sheffield and to be had in bottles, with full directions, at 1s. or four in one 3s. each, of all the principal Chemists, Silversmiths, and Furnishing Ironmongers.

J. B. Cogan & R. Gillo

Beware of Imitations.—The Genuine are all signed on the wrapper, by the inventors,

VAUXHALL COMPOSITE CANDLES, 8½d. per lb.—PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES, 10½d. per lb. These are the London cash prices, but the Country ones vary with the distance from town. Both sorts burn exactly as well as the finest wax, and are cheaper, allowing for the light, than Tallow Moulds. Sold wholesale to the trade by Edward Price and Co., Belmont, Vauxhall; Palmer and Co., Sutton-street, Clerkenwell; and William Marchant, 253, Regent Circus, Oxford-street. Until these Candles become generally sold throughout the country, EDWARD PRICE and Co. will supply any private families unable to obtain them in their own neighbourhood, with a quantity not less than £5 worth, direct from the factory. On a line being addressed to Belmont, Vauxhall, enclosing a Post-office Order for £5 (payable to Edward Price and Co., not to Edward Price or Mr. Price), they will forward a box of the Vauxhall Composite, or of the others, or a mixed box as may be directed, to that exact amount.

TO THE LADIES.—The high and universal celebrity which ROWLAND'S KALYDOR continues to maintain, as an active, yet mild and soothing extirpator of all impurities of the skin, is, during the present period, most pleasingly evinced. This preparation, eminently balsamic, restorative, and invigorating, is equally celebrated for safety in application, as for unfailing efficacy in removing all impurities and discolorations; and imparting a healthy freshness and transparency to the Skin and Complexion. Its universally great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled shopkeepers, who give the title of "Genuine" Kalydor to compounds of their own manufacture, of the most deleterious character, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the Complexion, and, by their repellent action, endangering health. It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the words "Rowland's Kalydor" are on the wrapper. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included. Sold by the Proprietors, A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden, and by Chemists and Perfumers. . All others are Fraudulent Imitations!!!

ROWLAND'S UNIQUE PREPARATIONS (under the patronage of the several Sovereigns and Courts of Europe, and universally preferred).—ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for the Growth, Preservation, and for Beautifying the Human Hair. Price 3s. 6d., 7s., Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s. per bottle. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for improving and beautifying the Skin and Complexion. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included. ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, for the Teeth and Gums. Price 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.

Important Information.—Unprincipled individuals, for the sake of gaining a trifle more profit, vend the most spurious compounds under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty), they copy the labels, bills, advertisements, and testimonials (substituting fictitious for the real names and addresses) of the original preparations, and use either a fictitious name, or the word "Genuine," in the place of "Rowland's." It is, therefore, highly necessary to see that the word "Rowland's" is on the Wrapper of each article.—. All others are Fraudulent Imitations!!! The Genuine Preparations are sold by the Proprietors as above, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

SELF MEASUREMENT—GREAT ACCOMMODATION.

The following Directions will ensure an exact Fit, and will be found a most convenient accommodation. The measure may be taken with a piece of tape, and reduced into inches, stating the height of person, and if any peculiarity in figure; also whether taken over a Coat.

THOM, THE WEAVER-POET

DINNER TO THOM, THE INVERURY POET.

On Wednesday a dinner was given, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand, as a reception to William Thom, the hand-loom weaver, of Inverury. The chair was ably filled by Mr. W. J. Fox, on whose right hand was seated Mr. Thom. The guests were about seventy in number, ncluding many ardent admirers of the weaver-poet.

The experiences of Mr. Thom's career were modestly narrated in a volume of "Rhymes and Recollections," published a short time since. This appears not to be the weaver poet's first visit to the metropolis; for, on a former occacasion, work was ceasing, and food with it, and he had resolved to apply to the Aberdeen House of Refuge, when he, "on a cold, cold winter day," received a letter from the office of the Aberdeen Herald, enclosing five pounds, the gift of Mr. Gordon, of Knockespock, whose interest had been awakened by one of Thom's poems. He wrote a letter of thanks to Mr. Gordon, who made further inquiries respecting the weaver-poet, which were answered by him in a letter marked by spirit, good sense, and sincerity. The following was the result:

Ten days after sending the above letter (says Mr. Thom), I and my aughter were dashing it in a gilded carriage through the streets of London. Here was a change sufficient to turn the head of a bewildered weaver. Under the protection of my patron, Mr. Gordon, I remained there, and in other parts of England, upwards of four months, and paid great attention to all I saw and heard. I was introduced to many of the master-minds of yon great city. In the studio of Sir Francis Chantrey, I conversed with the lamented Allan Cunningham. I have listened to the eloquence, and heard the nonsense of those who gave laws to the people. I saw Majesty and Misery, and many of the paths between. There is not a purchaseable pleasure but was put within my power; and many are the delights of happy England, and kind the hearts therein; yet I longed for Scotland, and am again upon my heather and at my loom. Alas! for the loom though! Hitherto it has been to me the ship on which I voyaged o'er Life—Happiness and Hardship alternate steersmen—the Lyre and a light heart my fellow-passengers Now, amid the giant waves of monopoly, the solitary loom is fast sinking. Thus must the Lyre, like a hen-coop, be thrown on the wrecking waters, to float its owner ashore.

William Thom is, we believe, still a weaver, looking to his loom for support, and making of poetry only a cheering friend and companion; it has proved to him, however, something more, for it has gained him the notice and good-will of many, who are both able and willing to serve him substantially. Will Scotland cherish the poet? Let us hope it. She cannot but remember the death bed of Burns, the peasant of Ayrshire; may that recollection lead her, while she has yet the opportunity, to lighten the labours, and brighten the hearth of the weaver of Inverury!

We have given his portrait; it is taken from the life, and is an excellent likeness.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"H. P.," Newcastle; "F. N. M.;" "T. C.;" "W."—The solution of Problem 61 is right.

"S. R. C."—Thanks for the Problem. The solution is correct.

"An Amateur," Wisbeach.—The problem shall be examined.

"J. O. W.'s" little Problem is too simple for publication. His solution of 61 is the true one.

"L. W.," Pershore.—Make no scruple of applying for information when any difficulty occurs.

"F. G. S."—"The Chess Player's Chronicle" contains every game played between La Bourdonnais and M'Donnell. Hastings, of Carey-street. The famous Indian Problem is not, that we are aware, the invention of Ghulam Kassim.

H. D.," Kingston.—We doubt whether a wood-cut of the once celebrated Automaton Chess Player would possess any attraction for the pubic at the present day—but we are not the less obliged by the suggestion.—Yes! There is a book of Problems by Mr. Brown, of Leeds, lately published.—The Oriental gems, which were translated by Lewis, many years ago, can hardly be obtained at any price.

Mona," Isle of Man.—The class of problems in request with "Mona," would be caviare to the general taste, and therefore ill-adapted to a publication of this kind.

R. D. M.," Winchester.—Quite in earnest! Why, the very first authority we cited—Henry Stephens, himself—was "a Frenchman!" as "R. D. M.," a scholar, should recollect. We really have not leisure for the curious investigation suggested by our correspondent's comments, at this moment. Will he favour us with the tracing from Wilkinson's work, to which he alludes? He may rely upon its preservation.

Pen-howell."—In the Pion Coiffé game, it is the King's Kt's Pawn which is capped, and the mate must be effected with that Pawn only.—We never saw a game at these odds in print.

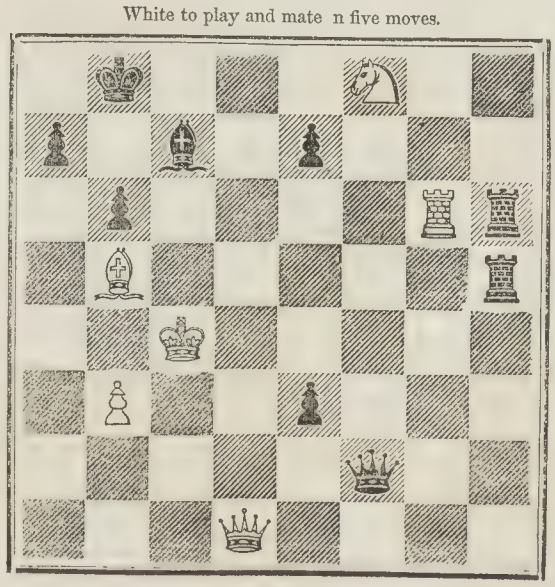
G. C. S.," Kensington.—Your solution is perfectly correct.

E. A. G."—We will consider the suggestions.

W. W. M."—The problem alluded to shall be again examined.

Miranda."—We will refer to the Problem No. 58, and report on your emendation next week.

T. R.," Horncastle.—Right.



Novice," Lancashire.—You may claim a Queen for every Pawn you can advance to the 8th sq., and have as many as you get on the board at the same time.

Novice," Fowey.—Correct.

DEATH OF THE REV. SYDNEY SMITH.—This facetious divine, whose serious illness we before announced, died last Saturday night at eleven o'clock at his house in Green-street, Mayfair. Dr. Holland and Mr. Hibberts (sons-in law of the deceased) were both in attendance on their lamented relative at the time of his death. Mr. Smith had attained his 74th year. By his death a canonry in St. Paul's cathedral becomes vacant. He was brought up at Winchester, which he left for a scholarship at New College, Oxford, in 1789, succeeding to a vacancy made by the marriage of the late Right Hon. Charles Bathurst, then Mr. Bragge. The late prebendary of St. Paul's was the son of Robert Smith, Esq., of Woodford Court, Essex. He entered the university at the age of seventeen, and proceeded to his degrees at Oxford, B.A., October 10, 1792; M.A., October 10, 1796, leaving his fellowship at New College on his marriage in 1800, with Miss Pybus, a daughter of Mr. Pybus, the banker. Mr. Smith had previously lived in Edinburgh, at the same time as Lord Brougham, Lord Jeffery, the late Sir James Mackintosh, and others. In conjunction with the above eminent men, he commenced the Edinburgh Review, which was under his editorship for a short period, and to which he contributed during the most part of his life. During the early period of his life Mr. Smith was not in very affluent circumstances, and for all the advancement he obtained was indebted, in a great measure, to his own industry. Most people will recollect his own joke of his residing in Edinburgh, and "cultivating literature on a little oatmeal." The Edinburgh Review had no contributor to its pages more witty than Mr. Smith. Indeed, with Lord Jeffery, he was its principal support for a very long period, and as a critic he will be favourably remembered. It is impossible to regard Mr. Smith's death but as a loss to the light critical literature of the age. His wit was inexhaustible, which, combined with a keen perception of the ludicrous, rendered him a formidable foe. Mr. Smith's literary labours were principally bestowed upon the Edinburgh Review; his only published work of any note being "Peter Plimney's Letters," which were written with great care, and produced considerable impression on the public at the time they appeared.

THE BISHOP OF ELY.—We regret to state that very unfavourable accounts have been received from Ely Palace as to the health of the right rev. prelate; the favourable symptoms which had manifested themselves having entirely disappeared within the last few days.

CHRIST CHURCH, ST. GILES.—The new church in St. Giles, Endell-street, is on the point of completion, and will be consecrated at Easter. Its title is Christ Church, St. Giles, and it is remarkable as being the first sacred edifice dedicated to the Protestant religion erected in London in which the entire accommodation is free to the public. The building is designed in the early English style of architecture. The tower is a conspicuous object both from Long acre and Holborn, and the whole structure is built of Bath stone and Kentish rag. The west front, which will be the most conspicuous part of the church, has a deeply recessed and ornamented doorway, over which is a very lofty window, composed of five distinct lights, the arches being enriched with the dog-tooth mouldings. The cost of the edifice does not exceed £4500, although 1000 free sittings are provided.

OXFORD, Feb. 22.—At an election held yesterday, at University College T. V. French and G. H. Curteis were chosen scholars on the Bennet foundation. George E. Ranken, from Eton, was chosen to the open scholarship, and J. A. Cree was chosen scholar on the Yorkshire foundation.

CAMBRIDGE, Feb. 22.—QUEEN'S COLLEGE.—Arthur Scratchley, B.A., has just been elected a Fellow of this Soiety.

THE LONDON UNIVERSITY.—The annual general meeting of the proprietors of the University College of London was held on Wednesday, in the theatre of the institution, Gower-street, the Earl of Auckland, Vice-President, in the chair. The report of the council stated that during the last session the number of pupils who attended the classes of the college and junior school was 834. The students in the faculties of arts and law numbered 183, and in medicine 312. The pupils in the junior school amounted to 339; 283 being the largest number of boys in the school in any single term. The number of new students up to the present time was 92. In the faculty of arts the number was the same as last year, the entries being 64. An increase in the amount of fees of £2106 showed that the entries for general education had been more numerous. At the examination of the University of London in arts, law, and medicine, the students of the college had sustained its high reputation, and had received their usual large share of distinction and rewards. During the year their receipts were £21,498, and the expenditure, including an investment of £5500 Consols, and £500 Exchequer Bills, was £20,522. The report was adopted. Lord Brougham was appointed president of the University, and various other officers were elected.

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.—On Tuesday, the 4th of February, the degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred by his Grace the Lord Primate and Vice-Chancellor of the University on the Rev. John David Hare, LL.B., Lecturer and Curate of St. Andrew's, Holborn, London.

CURIOUS SUICIDE OF A PENSIONER IN THE CHARTERHOUSE.—On Tuesday a long investigation took place in the Pensioners' Hall, in the Charterhouse, before Mr. Mills, on view of the body of John David Jones, aged 72, one of the pensioners of the institution, who committed suicide by cutting his throat with a razor. James Bell deposed that he was one of the carpenters connected with the establishment. About eleven o'clock on the forenoon of Saturday last, he was called by Mr. Angell to enter the deceased's room by the window. This he effected by means of a ladder, and discovered the old man lying on the floor, with his head and chest inside a coal bin; he was dead from the effects of an extensive wound across the throat, inflicted by a razor. William Ward, one of the servants, stated that he saw deceased in his room about nine o'clock on the morning in question, when he complained of illness. Witness at the time did not observe anything peculiar in his manner. The deceased was of very eccentric habits he had not been put under restraint. Mr. Miles, the surgeon, said the deceased had long suffered from an hypochondriacal affection, and constantly imagined himself indisposed. He laboured under delusions, and at one time accused witness of attempting to poison him.—Coroner: In this wealthy establishment, I should have imagined that persons might be employed to overlook the actions of those so situated.—Mr. Miles: The Act of Parliament does not allow of such; it would be turning the establishment into a lunatic asylum, and we should subject ourselves to an action at law Only two cases of morbid derangement have happened in the institution for the last four years and three-quarters. One of the patients is now an inmate of Bethlem, after having been examined before the commissioners of lunacy. The Jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

DEATH OF A SCHOOLBOY BY FIRE.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Payne held an inquest at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, on the body of John Harris, aged 11, belonging to Ward School, of Queenhithe. It appeared that, at dinner time on Thursday, deceased was punished by being "kept back," and confined to the school-room. He soon after began to toast some bread at the fire, and getting too near it, his pinafore became ignited, and then the remainder of his dress. His screams brought Mr. Robins, the master, to his assistance, who extinguished the flames, but not before deceased was dreadfully burned over the chest, arms, and face. He was speedily conveyed to the hospital, in which he died on Monday last. Verdict—"Accidental death."

THE GAME LAWS.

A COMMITTEE of the House of Commons is about to begin an inquiry into the operation and effect of the Game-laws. So many committees have inquired into so many things, with no other result of their labours than a Report, never used as the foundation of any legislative measure, that we begin to look on the appointment of a Committee rather as a form of acknowledging the existence of an evil, than as a step towards finding a remedy. Two years ago a Committee was appointed to inquire into the effect on the health of the people of the practice of interments in cities and towns; it sat, and took evidence which proved the existence of mischiefs of a most frightful kind; it drew up a Report, stating those evils, and the necessity of preventing them, adding an opinion that the duty of framing and bringing in a bill on the subject could best be discharged by the Government. Two years have elapsed since that Report was made; and the evil has gone on increasing in magnitude. Within the past week the question has been revived by practices of a most revolting nature in a London burial ground. The dead are outraged, and the living sent to the grave by pestilence; and yet, not only has there been no sign of any measure being brought forward by the Government, as recommended by the Committee, but only on last Wednesday evening, Sir James Graham declared that the evil was one impossible to remedy! Impossible! though in Paris they found it quite practicable almost a century and a half ago!

From this and other instances of the tardiness of the legislative body in dealing with admitted evils, the landed interest, somewhat alarmed, we believe, at the readiness with which Sir Robert Peel acceded to the motion of Mr. Bright, may derive consolation; the "beginning of the end" of the Game Laws has not arrived; they have a long lease of existence yet; the growth of many centuries, and the legacy transmitted to us from the Norman conquerors, they will not disappear in a single session, nor vanish at the bidding even of the League. If the landed interest only acts with a little fairness and liberality in the matter, we may go the length of saying that the Game Laws are in no danger at all. The feeling against them has arisen as much from errors and abuses connected with them that do not spring from the law, as from the law itself.

No one will dispute the right of a landowner to resist a trespass on his property of any kind, whether in pursuit of game or not; it is the mere protection the law extends to all property of every kind, and to take it away from land would be a gross injustice. The owner of that land so protected may also preserve the game—birds or animals—upon it. To say that doing so is a temptation to crime, is hardly an answer; the chains and watches, and bowls of coin in the windows of the jewellers and money changers, protected from the gaunt hunger and poverty that walk the street, by nothing but a fragile sheet of glass, are a temptation to crime also; but no one thinks of asking for an enactment to prohibit the display of the articles of the money-changer's trade. Game preserving is now, too, a trade—almost as much so as breeding poultry, so that the illustration bears the stronger on the case itself.

But admitting the right of the landowner to preserve game if he pleases, there are some things that he ought not to suffer to exist as the consequences of that preserving; game will eat, and that eating destroys the stock in trade and property of the farmer; from hence arises those complaints and outcries against the system which have at last made themselves heard with some effect in the House of Commons. For all damage and mischief of this kind there is always the remedy of compensation, and this the landed interest is free to give to any extent without any enactment whatever. Why should men want an Act of Parliament to compel them to be just and pay for the food of their live stock? They would not think of turning a flock of sheep into a farmer's green corn without reimbursing him for the damage; and it is said—and proof of the fact offered—that great mischief may be done even by a few score of hares.

To show how prompt and full payment of such damage alleviates the grievance of a Game-law, we will describe the system that prevails throughout a large portion of Germany; we have not yet seen it alluded to in connection with this question, but it might be worth some consideration, even by the recently appointed committee.

In Howitt's "Rural Life in Germany," he says—"The popular division of the land is a dead hindrance to hunting; it has been here and there attempted, and English packs of hounds have been imported by the princes, but the peasants put it down wherever it appeared in a very little time. The German bauers and farmers have no faith, and it is quite impossible to persuade them, as it has been attempted to persuade the farmers in England, that it does their corn good to have it in the winter trodden over and torn to pieces by a troop of horses. On the contrary, they insist on Wildschaden (damages done by game), wherever deer, or hares or other game, are encouraged by the nobility to the injury of the farmers' crops, and the laws support them strongly in this, giving them their damages strictly, so that many nobles and princes have yearly large sums on this score to pay. All field-sports, therefore, in Germany, resolve themselves into shooting; what they call the jagd or hunt is mere shooting, in fact hunting they have none. Of this the triebjagd or battue is the most striking and animated."

This mode of shooting has of late years become prevalent in England, though to us it appears more like slaughtering animals than hunting them. But in introducing the German fashion of shooting, the German obligation of paying strictly for the damage done by the game has been neglected. The one should in justice be accompanied by the other. In Germany the land is held in small portions; and though in England rented estates are larger, yet the damage is no less felt where the game is preserved, and it increases in proportion to the quantity. On the Continent enormous quantities of game are not found till we get into those provinces where an independent agricultural class does not exist, and where much of the feudal system still prevails—where there are but two classes, noble and serf. "In all countries," says the same writer, "there are here and there, however rarely, large estates, especially in wood, where the game is preserved by the wealthy owner for his pleasure; and in Austria, Moldavia, and Bohemia, where the estates are large, and rather in the hands of the nobles than the people—where, in fact, over vast extents of land, the people are serfs and property themselves—here game reaches the acmé of its abundance, and the love of field sports is ardent and universal." Throughout the Austrian provinces, we should add, where game is abundant, the proprietors make immediate compensation to the full amount of the injury sustained.

The mischief here is that the landlords, in bringing "game to its acmé of abundance," as it must be to admit of thousands of head being slaughtered in a day, have forgotten that they are not living in a wild tract of Bohemia, but in the midst of cultivated, overpeopled England, where every foot of land and every blade of corn has a direct value. The cultivator of the soil is injured, and the injurer is his landlord: the tenant must take whatever compensation the landlord chooses to give him; if he demurs, he has no lease of his farm, and is told he can leave it: his successor will probably, seeing the state of things, make a better bargain, but that is no consolation to the one who has suffered. It is here our system oppresses; and we are persuaded that a more strict regard to justice in dealing with these "game damages," as the Germans call it, would remove much of the unpopularity of the system, without any change in the law at all.

There are other evils for which the remedy is not so obvious. The enormous increase of the convictions for offences against the law are evident; perhaps if the cost of preserving game was made greater by the necessity of paying for what is consumed or spoiled by it, the quantity preserved would be lessened, and the temptation to poaching proportionately decreased. At present, too, the farmer's interest is in seeing the game thinned—he cares very little how; every pheasant shot is a destroyer the less, therefore he makes no exertions to check poaching. But were he certain of being paid the full amount of his loss, the general wish of the tenantry to be on good terms with their landlords, would induce them to assist in preventing trespasses. There can be no question that an excessive quantity of game is injurious to the morale of the people by holding out a constant temptation to break the law, and to make such a large preservation expensive, would be the most legitimate means of keeping it within reasonable bounds. A day's butchery among a cloud of creatures who can neither escape nor resist, may give a return of some thousands killed, with as much credit to the killers, as if their field of chase was the poultry-yard; but it is not a sport worth purchasing, at the price of prisons filled with our peasantry. The Crown can no longer devastate and unpeople half a county to make a hunting ground of it; nor can the landowners devour the "green herb for the service of man," without due payment for it, if they wish to be free from such a clamour against them, as that now raised on the Game Laws. Buckinghamshire is not Bohemia, and it is hard if the tenant farmers of England cannot get as much fair play as the German peasants. Let foreign modes of sport be introduced if they are liked; but import also the foreign practice of paying the full cost of them.

LIVERPOOL GRAND NATIONAL STEEPLE CHASE.

Settled and bent up
Each corporal agent for this terrible feat. Macbeth.

Some six or seven years ago this chase was established for the purpose of bringing together the best hunting men and the best hunting horses from the four quarters of the empire: to compete over a very sporting line of country—albeit, somewhat artificial. The situation was the best possible for such a rendezvous, lying open to Ireland and Scotland by steam navigation, and to Wales and all the home districts by the railways, of which it is a focus. Consequently, each anniversary has gathered together steeds from far and near, and Aintree has exhibited the finest collection of animals for the field, probably, ever mustered on any one spot of Great Britain. That there might be quantity as well as quality, recently the race has been made a handicap, and the trial has been successful. Last season the nominations were very numerous, and in the present the acceptances augured that the field would be a strong one. This expectation, it will be seen, was realised—in the face of most unpropitious weather—and one of the best practical races of the kind yet achieved on the shores of the Mersey was the result.

The reader needs not being reminded what sort of a week this instant March opened with—he has it on the tips of his fingers. The appearance of Tuesday kept many of the regular metropolitan visitors by their fire-sides, and, numerically, the attendance was not the best in the world. Those who went down by the afternoon train on that day found the snow looking formidable in the midland counties, and learnt on their reaching Birmingham that the water-pipes in that place of smoke were frozen up. This looked like anything rather than steeple-chasing: and so did Wednesday morning, for the earth rang like bell metal, and as Wordsworth sings, "it was winter through." The sun, however, was early up, and by noon the cognoscenti at the Talbot, where betting had already begun, assured you "it would come off." The bill of fare was more than usually attractive, there being promised three events, of which we had two.

The town did not look as holyday-like as was its wont, for notwithstanding the atmosphere was as bright and gaudy as the heart could wish—(not bent on a passage of horsemanship across country)—the ensemble was not as fête-like as might have been. As the first race was not announced to start till half-past two, nobody of any pretension stirred till one or thereabouts. The road to the course was as usual thronged with sporting pedestrians, the majority of them from the Emerald Isle, whose sons have a great tendency to steeple-chasing, because of all turf enterprize it is the most "devil-may-care" Precisely at two o'clock, the Earl of Sefton, one of the stewards, came on the ground driving his four chesnuts in a perfectly appointed barouche, attended by Mr. George Payne, the other steward, in a char-a-banc. By this time the stand began to fill, and business to commence. It was hard upon three when the flat race was run—the winner being Lord Chesterfield's smart little filly, Jenny Wren. The victory gave his lordship's Derby nag, Pam, a "leg up" in popular favour. At four the preparations for the great event were put on the tapis.—and in half-an-hour more the public learned from the telegraph that the following field would go. Previous to the publication, however, the steward went to the weighing house, and there took the opinion of each owner of a horse proposed to be started as to whether the race should or should not be postponed, in consequence of the state of the ground. The "noes" had it, and so the cry was "havoc." At thirty-five minutes past four the lot, as below, drew to the post, and, at the word from Lord Sefton, proceeded to their devoir.

The betting, which was very slack, principally had reference to Vanguard, who was backed at 4 to 1; Brenda, 7 to 1; the Page, 7 to 1; and 6 to 1 against Tom Tug. The winner was done at 15 to 1; but only for a very small amount. The start was a very imposing sight—the lot living together to the second fence, where Brenda fell and got rid of her rider. As soon as they fairly settled to their running, The Exquisite made play, leading by twenty lengths all round, and up the course, and over the artificial brook, which he cleared magnificently. Nimrod was the second over, Boxkeeper third, and then three or four others, amongst them Clansman, who slipped up a landing, broke his back, and was subsequently destroyed. They had now commenced the second and last round, and the field was in fact reduced to half-a-dozen—The Exquisite still with an awful lead; Vanguard, Peter Simple, Tom Tug, and Cure, all racing after him their best. About a mile from home, he was once headed for an instant, but he came into the straight run in—apparently winning in a canter. As his rider, however, put him at the last hurdle, he instantly started up, and let Cure-all, Peter Simple, and Tug pass him, without making an effort to keep his place—the former winning as honest a race as ever was run very cleverly. Cure-all is by Physician out of a mare whose pedigree is unknown; he was trained and ridden by his owner—a genuine sample of your north country wide-awake cavalier. Before the race was over, the sun's rays had lost their power, and the ground became as hard as a hearthstone. The wonder is there were not ten fatal accidents instead of one. It is to be lamented that every season almost one or more horses are killed in the Grand National Steeple Chase at Liverpool. Of all contrivances artificial fences are the most dangerous: would it not be worth while even to sacrifice the convenience of a grand stand to the advantages of running over a natural country?

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

The reception of M. Saint Beuve at the Academie passed off in the most satisfactory manner. M. Villemain was present, apparently in perfect health. The speech of M. Saint Beuve was replied to by M. Victor Hugo. Speaking of M. de Villemain, I am reminded of a charming note which he addressed a few days since to a lady of his acquaintance, and which contains intrinsic evidence that his sparkling wit has returned in its original purity, with all the other brilliant qualities of his fine mind. This lady had lent him, some months before, the poetical works of Andre Chenier; in returning them, the other day, he wrote the following note:—

"Madam,—An invalid Academician who reads no longer poetry, and who retains none in his memory but yours, scruples longer to keep a volume which you lent him some months since. He has the honour to have it left at your house—uselessly close to his—and he seizes this occasion to offer you the homage of his respect, and to assure you that he is only dead or out of his mind officially."

Some of our daily papers state that Queen Victoria has determined on visiting the French Court in the month of May next.—They will have it that her Majesty has determined to come to Versailles, to return the visit made by Louis Philippe to her, at Windsor, but the Commerce, which affects to have exclusive information on this subject, says that the Queen will not come further than the Chateau d'Eu, where preparations are already commenced to give her a reception far more magnificent than that of last year.

The fashionable world is still much agitated by the conflict going on between M. Leon Pilet and the Marquis du Halley, relative to an Opera-box, lately transferred from the occupation of the latter to that of the Duke de Nemours. The case was heard on Monday by the Tribunal de Commerce, but in consequence of M. Cremieux, the celebrated advocate, who pleaded for the Marquis du Halley, having mentioned M. Cuvillier Fleury as the occupier of the box, and the agent of the Duke de Nemours, the President stopped the cause, declaring that the names of third parties should not be introduced. M. Cremieux refused to plead on these conditions, as it was essential to show the taking possession of the box, while the Marquis's furniture was in it, as a proof that his occupancy had not terminated. A scandalous scene occurred, which terminated by the Court deciding against the Marquis du Halley, and by condemning him to costs. An appeal, however, was instantly lodged, and it is to be hoped that the Superior Court will quash a judgment which has been given on the most arbitrary and irregular principles. M. Leon Pilet is a most unpopular manager, and his conduct on this occasion is calculated to add to the prejudice entertained against him. In every theatre of the world the possessor of a box is entitled to the continued occupancy at the price demanded by the managers, and it would be intolerable if every season a royal or other personage, in favour with the direction, was entitled to dislodge him. I am sorry to see the name of the Duke of Nemours mixed up in this affair, as I should be sorry any stain on his popularity should rise from so insignificant a cause.

The moral condition of France is, I am sorry to say, every day degenerating. We have had sad examples in the case of Madame Laffarge, and of others, how far the depravity of women's hearts can carry them; men are now following their bad example, and the provincial courts of law are frequently occupied with trials where husbands figure as the poisoners of their wives. The Assize of the Lower Seine now presents the trial of a surgeon, named Soursel, who himself prepared the poison which he administered to his unfortunate partner; and in which the name of a young lady, highly connected, figures as the inciting cause of his butchery. I do not give the particulars of this case out of respect to the feelings of your readers, but I quote it to show how far, when the restraints of religion and morality are removed, the force of example can lead in the path of crime.

One of the most ferocious inmates of the prison of La Force has, it is said, constructed a flying machine, on principles apparently more certain than any that have been yet discovered in this age of invention. The prisoner would gladly make use of his discovery to take leave of his present abode, but the governor, however friendly to science, is determined not to give that chance of his escape. I assure you the reports of this invention are quite serious, and that several scientific men have visited the convict in his cell.

FRANCE AND SWITZERLAND.

The affairs of Switzerland continue to occupy a prominent position in the French journals and in the minds of the Parisian public.

The debate in the Swiss Diet, respecting the Jesuits, has commenced. It was opened by one of the deputies from Berne, in an able but rather violent speech, in which he denounced the Jesuits as the enemies of public liberty, religious and civil, and particularly as the enemies of Protestantism. In the name of his Canton he called for their expulsion from every part of the Confederation. He was followed by one of the deputies from Lucerne, who not only defended the Jesuits, but declared that his Government would not yield to any order of the Diet for the revocation of the decree of Lucerne in their favour. Should the Canton of Lucerne persist in their resistance, therefore, it is not improbable that the Diet will resort to force, and a civil war can hardly be prevented.

The deputies of Uri, Schwytz, Unterwald, Zug, and Friburg, successively spoke and sided with Lucerne, pronouncing the imputations cast on the Jesuits mere calumnies, and using some threatening expressions in the course of their speeches. Much attention was commanded by M. Munzinger, the deputy of the Catholic canton of Soleure, when he inveighed against the Jesuits, and stated that he was instructed to demand that they be driven out of the cantons which had received them, and that they be not suffered to enter the others. Glaris, external Appenzell, and Bale-Country expressed the same opinion as Berne; and the discussion, which had taken up seven hours, was then adjourned to the following day. Ten deputations remained to be heard, eight of whom were reckoned hostile to the Jesuits. Never had the sittings of any Diet been watched with deeper interest.

The Zurich Gazette says that the utmost activity is displayed at Lucerne, which town resembles a fortress, and that every measure has been adopted there to repel an attack. The Valais people were also preparing to defend themselves.

The Journal des Débats publishes the official text of the treaty recently entered into between France and China, and adduces it as a triumphant answer to those who have ventured to affirm that M. de Lagrée's embassy to China was a useless and even mischievous waste of money.

In the Chamber of Deputies, the Council of State Bill was passed by a majority of 197 to 170. The ministerial papers speak of the result as a certain proof that the ministry has a sufficient majority in the Chamber to carry on the administration of affairs.

The committee on the Budget met on Monday to consider the question of the conversion of the Five per Cents. The committee resolved nearly unanimously (there being only one vote in opposition) to address a request to the Ministry, that it should present a bill to the Chamber during the present session for the conversion of the Five per Cents.

SPAIN.

The Madrid papers are full of rumours of an approaching change of ministry, and some hint at the probability of revolution. It was reported that the Queen would repair to Seville to assist at the religious ceremonies of the holy week, and make another excursion to Barcelona in June next. The Gazette contains a Royal decree, ordering the Minister of Finance to place funds at the disposal of the clergy to enable them to celebrate in a becoming manner the solemnities of Easter.

PORTUGAL.

Our Lisbon accounts reach to the 26th ult. They are unimportant as respects political news, but it appears that the Government have under consideration some important plans for raising the wind. One of these is a scheme for converting the bonds of the foreign debt, i. e., the nominal Five per Cents., into a Four per Cent. Stock, to be included under the head of home debt. Negociations for this purpose have been going on for some time in London. Another plan is for reducing the various indirect taxes to two or three, which, however, are to be augmented in proportion, so as that the revenue shall not be diminished by the abolition of the others. A third is for raising another loan of 3000 contos!

The accounts of her Majesty's health continued favourable. The baptism of the young Infanta took place on the 20th ult.

The Bill for the Abolition of the Conservatorial Courts, in its definite form, had been laid before the Chamber of Deputies. A project of law for the abolition of slavery in all the Portuguese possessions, in the case of children born after the date of the promulgation of the proposed law, has been presented to the Chamber of Peers, and transferred to the Special Anti-Slavery Committee.

TURKEY.

We have accounts from Constantinople of the 12th of February. The last news received from Lebanon is very serious. The Druses and Maronites have come to open war. The Maronites, with a force of 2000 men, attacked the Druses, and a great number of lives were lost on both sides, without any decided result either way. It was thought probable that England would be obliged to consent to the proposition made by the Porte, of sending an armed force into the country.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

Papers by the Indian mail of the 1st of February have reached us. The news they contain is of the 18th of December from China; 23rd of January from Calcutta and Delhi; 24th of January from Madras; and 25th, from Agra; and from Bombay to the 1st of February.

The intelligence is more interesting than it has been for some months back. The insurrection in Kolapore and Sawunt Warree continues unsubdued, although 10,000 men are in the field for the purpose of suppressing it. Three British officers have, in the course of the month, been slain by the enemy. The roads are everywhere blocked up, and robbery and plunder universal.

The news from Scinde is satisfactory. The whole of the banks of the Indus are tranquil. Sir Charles Napier started in the middle of January from Sukkur, to proceed into the country near the Hills, and in order to punish some of the predatory tribes, which, although subject to the Khan of Khelat, do not hesitate to plunder the territories belonging to the British. Prior to his departure, Sir Charles Napier issued a manifesto to all the neighbouring tribes, in which he clearly explains the reasons of his going into the districts of the Doomkies, the Jackranees, and the Boogties. The expedition had, a short time after its departure, been successful in routing some parties of the robber tribes, and in recovering a quantity of property and a great number of the camels which had been stolen from the Scindeans. This expedition will tend to demonstrate to all the inhabitants along the Indus the security and the other great benefits derivable from the British rule.

The case of the nine Parsees, who were in July last found guilty at Bombay of the murder of one of their own tribe, has been again brought forward. This case was some time ago sent to London, and her Majesty was pleased to commute the sentence passed on three of the convicts into transportation for life. The Bombay papers mention a petition to the Crown signed by a number of the most influential natives relative to the case of these Parsees. This petition has not been signed, and will not be signed, by the natives.

Another great point of interest in Bombay was the formation at that presidency of a railway company, whose object is to connect that fort and island with the mainland, and ultimately with the city of Poonah and the Deccan.

The Bombay papers are filled with details of the revolution in Lahore, but we do not find any new fact of importance in addition to the information supplied by the last Calcutta mail.

There have been some disturbances of no great moment in Gopal, near Nepaul and Cashmere, which do not apparently very greatly concern us.

The Governor-General continues at Calcutta, assiduously devoting himself to business, and gaining golden opinions of all sorts of people. Throughout the vast proportion of the company's dominions peace, contentment, and prosperity appear to prevail.

Much curiosity had been excited by a comet with two tails, which was during some nights visible in India.

The news from China is not of remarkable interest. The Chinese at Hongkong were quietly engaged in their labours, and altogether submissive to the British regulations.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday.

The Courts of Common Law Process Bills (for England and Ireland) and the Court of Session (Scotland) Bill, for enabling actions to be carried on without personal service or process, were read a second time, on the motion of Lord Campbell. The Constables' (Scotland) Bill was also read a second time.

The Earl of Clarendon put some questions upon the subject of the American Tariff, in answer to which, the Earl of Aberdeen said that Mr. Pakenham, our representative at Washington, had urged the claims made on the matter by certain British subjects with great zeal, but he admitted that he was not in a position to assert that those claims would be recognised.—The house sat only about three-quarters of an hour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday.

The Sugar Duties.—The house was engaged principally in a desultory and unconnected discussion upon the subject of the sugar duties. Several gentlemen urged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to name a later date than the 14th inst. for the new duties to take effect. Sir R. Peel assured them, that if the Government should, upon inquiry, see cause to make any alterations in the details of the resolution, they would not take the house by surprise on it, but would give at least two days' notice before the house went into committee on the bill.

A resolution that £8,000,000 should be granted to her Majesty, was agreed to, but the resolution in regard to the sugar duties was postponed till Friday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday.

Imprisonment for Debt.—A petition having been presented from some tradesmen of Westminster, complaining of the bill of last session for the abolition of imprisonment for small debts, Lord Brougham stated some facts to show the beneficial operation of that measure. At the same time he said he was ready to remedy any defects in it. For instance, he would endeavour to frame a measure to enable creditors to get at the wages or salaries of debtors who might hold situations as clerks, or otherwise.—Lord Campbell said he would heartily concur in any measure for reaching the property of debtors; and if that part of Lord Cottenham's bill which proposed to effect that object had been adopted by the Legislature, these complaints would never have been heard of. He hoped that their lordships would not be induced to retrace the steps they had taken in the way of abolishing imprisonment for debt, and he thought that imprisonment for debt might be taken away with advantage, even on final process, the debtors being obliged to make a full disclosure of their property.—The house sat for about an hour, and then adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday.

Railway Bills.—Railway bills formed the chief subject of discussion to-day. The house met at 12 o'clock, when the Companies Clauses Consolidation Bill was read a third time and passed. The Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill was considered in committee.

In the evening sitting, Lord Granville Somerset brought under consideration the report of the committee appointed to ascertain the best method of constituting committees on railway bills. The report recommended the adoption of twenty-two resolutions, the first four of which were agreed to without observation. The fifth, however, providing that every member selected should sign a declaration that neither himself nor his constituents were possessed of any local or personal interest in the line or lines upon which he was called to adjudicate, led to considerable discussion, but was eventually agreed to. The other resolutions were also agreed to after a long but unimportant debate.

Field-Gardens for the Labouring Poor.—Mr. Cowper moved for leave to bring in a bill, which he said was similar to that introduced by him last session, to promote the letting of field-gardens to the labouring poor. After combating some of the objections made to the allotment system, Mr. Cowper stated that, by his bill, the maximum of land to be acquired would be half an acre, the average a quarter of an acre; an amount not too large for the management of the labourer during his hours of leisure, while it would afford him the stimulus of attractive occupation and healthy amusement, an important object now that brutal sports were abolished, and the excessive toil and hardships of the poor man disabled him from participating in any other. He referred to several districts where garden allotments had produced the best moral effects on labourers by affording amusement and recreation. His bill proposed to extend the benefits of this voluntary system, by providing machinery in conjunction with the parish authorities, under which, with safety to themselves, and advantage to the labourer, owners of land may be enabled to grant allotments, the cultivation of which would not only profitably occupy time otherwise lost or wasted, but the produce would necessarily enable the rural labouring population comfortably to eke out their means of subsistence.—Sir J. Graham objected to some parts of the bill; but leave was given to bring it in, and it was read a first time.

The House adjourned about half-past eleven.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

Sugar from the United States.—In answer to a question from Mr. Thornely upon the subject of the recent importation of sugar from the United States, Sir R. Peel replied that speaking his own impression at the moment, he would say, that under the reciprocity treaty between this country and the United States those sugars would be admitted on payment of the same duties as were paid on sugars from China, Java, and Manilla.

The New Houses of Parliament.—Mr. R. Yorke put some questions relative to the new Houses of Parliament, in answer to which the Earl of Lincoln said the cost of the new building would only exceed the estimate by a small amount. He added that he had that morning seen the architect, who assured him that he saw no reason to withdraw from the statement made by him last year, namely, that the houses would be ready in 1847.

The Property-Tax Bill.—On the question that the house should go into committee on this bill, Mr. B. Osborne made some remarks in opposition to it, and moved as an amendment that the bill be committed that day three months.—The amendment was seconded by Mr. Blewitt.—Mr. Muntz said he considered the income part of the tax as robbing Paul, without making provision to pay Peter. It was obnoxious, vexatious, and inquisitorial.—Mr. F. Baring reviewed the financial state of the country, and gave his opinion that they could not get rid of the income-tax without imposing taxes to the amount of about £2,000,000 per annum. As he was not prepared again to place the revenue in such a state of deficiency, he should vote for the Income-tax, although he should oppose any proposal to make that tax a permanent part of our financial system. He thought the arrangements of the right honourable baronet would have been more satisfactory if he had not run so great a risk with regard to his revenue. Mr. Baring next argued that the lower classes would not receive much benefit from the taxes which were to be reduced, and in conclusion contrasted the financial policy of the Whigs with that of the Tories. He said, he did not complain of his calling upon the house to vote those estimates which the right hon. gentleman thought necessary to the safety and honour of the country, and he would not shrink from supporting the right hon. gentleman in those votes; but at the same time it was not very satisfactory to find, after all that had been said, and having been held up, not by the right hon. gentleman, but at public meetings on the hustings, with "mismanagement," and "jobbing," and "Whig-meddling"—(great laughter)—that the wise and pacific result of the right hon. gentleman's policy was an increase of about half a million in certain votes over what the expenditure was in the last year of "Whig mismanagement."—Mr. Baring was answered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said that the Government knowing that the Income-tax, during the period it had been in force, had been paid with cheerfulness on the one hand, and had been most productive to the revenue on the other, thought it was well worthy of consideration, whether it was not expedient to continue that tax to a larger amount than the immediate exigencies of the public service required, and to give to the people at large relief from those burdens which pressed more heavily upon them, both for the purpose of invigorating the revenue, and affording an incentive to the industry of the country. That was the ground upon which a continuance of the Income tax was proposed: the Chancellor of the Exchequer then answered the financial objections of Mr. Baring; he did not deny that there were other taxes which pressed heavily on the public; but taking into view the limited amount to be applied to the purpose, he thought the right hon. gentleman must admit that it had been judiciously applied.—Mr. Ewart, Mr. D. Barclay, and Mr. Hawes, addressed the house. A division then took place, the result of which was,

For the amendment	23
Against it	96
Majority for going into committee	—73

The house having gone into committee, when the first clause of the bill was proposed, Mr. CURTEIS substituted an amendment that the words "two years" be submitted for the words "three years," as the duration of the tax. On this proposal the committee divided, the numbers being:—

For the amendment	17
Majority	—52

The first clause was then agreed to, continuing the tax for three years longer.—In the course of a discussion which ensued, several objections were made to the tax, but the opposition did not assume any tangible shape, and no amendment was proposed.—Mr. WARLEY asked Sir R. Peel if he would resist all amendments to the bill, to which he answered that he would not be so discourteous as to say that, but he believed that it would be consistent with true policy to continue the present bill. The bill went through committee, all the clauses being agreed to, and Friday was named for bringing up the report.

The Stamp Duties Assimilation (Ireland) Bill was read third time and passed, and the house adjourned soon after nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Some discussion took place upon Lord Campbell's bills to amend the Common Law Process, and the house then went into committee upon them pro forma.

The Company's Clauses Consolidation Bill, and the Company's Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Bill, were read a first time.

The Constables (Scotland) Bill went through Committee, and the house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The house met at twelve o'clock, and after several hours' debate, clauses up to 43 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill were agreed to.

MUSEUMS OF ART.—At the evening sitting, Mr. EWART moved for leave to bring in a bill to enable town councils to establish museums of art in corporate towns. The hon. member adverted to the recommendations made by the Committee which had sat upon the subject, and stated that the bill was intended to encourage the exertions already made. There were peculiar circumstances at the present time which allowed a facility for the diffusion of works of art throughout the country, which had never been enjoyed in times past. By means of their railways they could send casts of improved specimens of works of art to the different manufacturing towns, and it would be the fault of the Government if there was a single manufacturing or large town in the country deficient of a museum of such a character, as might give a sound taste in art to the population of that town, and thus enable them to apply the skill they would obtain in the arts to manufactures.—Mr. WYSE seconded the motion.—Sir W. JAMES, Mr. M. PHILIPS, and other members addressed the house upon the subject; and after a few words from Sir R. PEEL, leave was given to bring in the bill.

Sir William Follett, the Attorney-General, was in his place this evening, and, we are happy to say, appeared to be quite restored to health.

The house adjourned at eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

OTAHEITE.—The Earl of MINTO gave notice that on Monday he would move for copies of any correspondence received within the last twelve months, from the ships Basilisk and Hazard, on the subject of the proceedings at the island of Otaheite.

DISABILITIES OF THE JEWS.—The LORD CHANCELLOR brought in a bill to relieve her Majesty's subjects of the Jewish persuasion from certain disabilities affecting them in respect to the holding of municipal offices. (Cheers). The bill was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

CONSTABULARY IN IRELAND.—The Marquis of NORMANBY said, that having postponed his motion on the subject of Promotion in the Constabulary in Ireland until this day, it was with great unwillingness he had declined to postpone it again. But he did not think that the presence of either of the two Lords, on account of whose absence the postponement had been requested, was necessary to the discussion. (Hear.) A recommendation made to the Inspector-General of Constabulary, upon an understanding between all parties in Parliament, had been lost sight of in recent promotions But if he could have an assurance from the Government that such would not be the case again—and there was no one whose assurance he would more readily take than that of the noble duke opposite—The Duke of WELLINGTON: You won't have it then. (A laugh).—The Marquis of NORMANBY said he was not to be deterred from proceeding with his motion, although the noble duke had stated the course he proposed to take.—The noble marquis then submitted his motion upon the subject, and also for some returns respecting the army in Ireland.—Some discussion ensued upon the motion for these returns.—On a division, the motion was negatived by 32 to 12.—The house adjourned soon after seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

NEW MEMBERS.—Mr. Brinsley Sheridan took the oaths and his seat for Shaftesbury. Mr. Deedes took the oaths and his seat for East Kent.

CORN LAWS.—Mr. WODEHOUSE gave notice that it was his intention to move an amendment to the motion of the honourable member for Stockport, which stood on the orders of the day for Thursday next. The motion was for a select committee to inquire into the operation of protective duties upon the interests of tenant farmers. To that motion it was his intention to move as an amendment the following resolution:—That an inquiry into the operation of protective duties on imports, as regarded the interest of tenant farmers and farm labourers, was objectionable in principle if the purport of it was to show that they had a distinct and separate interest from that of their landlords, or those on whose property they chose to live; that the condition of tenant farmers and farm labourers did indeed deserve the most serious attention of Parliament, and it was the bounden duty of the house so to shape its deliberation, as to make known to the occupiers and tenants of the soil the necessity for their having a continuance of all protective duties; and that the removal of all protective duties was averse to the general interests of all classes of society.

PAROCHIAL SETTLEMENT BILL.—Mr. PUSEY gave notice that in Committee on the Parochial Settlement Bill he would move the omission of the 33rd clause.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.—Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN gave notice of his intention to move, as an amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Stockport, that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the extent of mortgages on landed property in this country, and into the cause of agricultural distress.—Mr. COBDEN reminded the hon. member that he had not yet finally decided on the terms of his motion.—Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN was aware of it, but the hon. member had previously put upon the paper a motion similar to his own amendment, and he wished to bring him back to this motion.

GAME-LAWS.—Mr. BRIGHT gave notice that on Monday he should move the appointment of the Select Committee on the game-laws.

PURCHASE OF CALIFORNIA.—Mr. S. WORTLEY begged to put a question to Sir Robert Peel with regard to a statement that the English Government had offered to purchase California for 25,000,000 of dollars.—Sir ROBERT PEEL stated his belief that the report was utterly without foundation.—Lord PALMERSTON, on behalf of the late Government, also denied any connection with such an offer.

BUENOS AYRES.—Lord PALMERSON gave notice that he would, on Monday, put a question to the Right Hon. Baronet on the subject of the dispute between Monte Video, and the government of Buenos Ayres.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—Mr. CHILDERS wished to know from Sir Robert Peel, whether it was the intention of the Government to grant a Queen's letter this year. Sir R. PEEL replied that the subject, he believed, was now under the consideration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

PROPERTY-TAX.—On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER the report on the Property Tax Bill was postponed to Monday.

WAYS AND MEANS.—On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER that the house resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. WILLIAMS rose to express his regret, that, from a belief that the questions before the house last evening would occupy a longer period than they did, he was too late to bring forward his motion. All that he required was an explanation of the facts connected with the sale of certain lands belonging to the Crown, adjoining the Duke of Newcastle's estate.—The EARL of LINCOLN said that a motion complaining of the conduct of a public servant ought to be brought forward at the earliest period possible. He would not now, however, enter into any further explanation on the subject.

After a long and desultory discussion, the house went into the Committee of Ways and Means, to discuss the Sugar Duties.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER then stated that he should adhere in substance to the course he had already intimated, but he admitted there were many difficulties connected with the subject. Nevertheless, he argued that the principle of a distinctive duty, in regard to sugar, was desirable in itself, and was just, equitable, and expedient. The resolutions were discussed at great length, and several amendments were proposed. Ultimately they were agreed to, the house resumed, and on adjournment took place at one o'clock this (Saturday) morning.

COMMONS.—MISCELLANEOUS BUSINESS.

RAILWAYS.—The London and York Railway Bill has been read a second time. Mr. Gisborne gave notice that he should, on an early day, call the attention of the house to the subject of the powers of the Board of Trade with respect to railways.

OPENING OF LETTERS IN THE POST-OFFICE.—Mr. T. Duncombe gave notice that, immediately after Easter, he would move for leave to bring in a bill to secure the inviolability of letters passing through the Post-office.

Mr. Sheil gave notice that he would, on Tuesday next, move a resolution expressing the regret of the house that letters addressed to foreigners residing in this country had been opened in the Post-office without their knowledge or sanction, and that certain information with regard to the disturbances in the Papal States should have been communicated to a foreign power.

THE INCOME-TAX.—Mr. Spooner gave notice of his intention to propose some amendments on bringing up the report, with a view to settle various doubts which had arisen as to the proper construction of the act. His amendments would go to allow a person carrying on a trade or manufacture entirely within his own family to deduct for the services of his family, to enable parties to deduct local rates and taxes on places or houses necessary for carrying on their business, to make a deduction from the profits of trade of the sums paid for insurance, and to allow professional and other persons necessarily employing a horse in their pursuits to deduct for it, although they might not be able to swear that it was never used in the course of the year for any other purpose.

THE CONDITION OF THE LABOURING POOR.—In answer to a question from Mr. Borthwick, Lord John Russell said that it was his intention to bring the subject of the condition of the labouring population forward, with a view of proposing some legislative measure upon it, shortly after Easter.

CIVIL DISABILITIES OF THE JEWS.—Sir Robert Peel stated that her Majesty's Government hoped, at a very early period of the session, to bring forward a Bill for the removal of the civil disabilities of the Jews, at least so far as municipal and corporate disabilities extended, SUGAR DUTIES.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer fixed Monday next for the discussion of the Sugar Duties.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

SUSPENSION OF A BANKRUPT'S CERTIFICATE.—In the BANKRUPTCY COURT an Tuesday, Mr. Mearns, a bankrupt, appeared for his last examination. He was opposed by Mr. Cooke, for a creditor of the name of Swannel; and supported by Mr. Partridge. The bankrupt was described as a brewer carrying on business in Acre lane, Clapham. It appeared that his debts amounted to £15,000; the amount of property divisible amongst the creditors was very small, and at the time of his entering into business in 1841 he was indebted in the sum of £12,000. The profits of his business during that period were exceeded by his trade and private expenses to the amount of £1000 per annum. In support of the certificate, it was urged that the opposing creditor had not taken sufficient care before he delivered his goods; and besides took such steps as prevented a composition with his other creditors, who were, therefore, the real sufferers. The learned Commissioner said the conduct of the bankrupt had been such that he felt himself bound to say that the certificate must be suspended for three years from the passing of his last examination.

THE LATE MURDER AT BETHNAL GREEN.—At the Central Criminal Court on Thursday, James Tapping was tried for the murder of Emma Whiter, by shooting her with a pistol. The evidence was precisely the same as that given recently in our police report. The jury found the prisoner "Guilty," and Mr. Baron Parke passed sentence of death upon him.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL EXPLOSION OF A STEAM-BOILER AT BLACKWALL.

On Wednesday morning the explosion of a steam-boiler, on the premises of the Messrs. Samuda, at Blackwall, caused a great loss of life and destruction of property. The scene of the disaster is a plot of ground in Orchard-place. Three men have fallen a sacrifice, and eight others have been scalded or dangerously wounded. The explosion occurred about half past nine o'clock, and was heard for miles around. Soon afterwards several men were brought out of the factory, and conveyed to the London Hospital, and the Dreadnought Hospital ship, lying off Greenwich and Poplar. The names of the sufferers are as follow:—

Killed—Thomas Wright, Richard Grimes, and James Chapman, all labourers.

Scalded and wounded—Jonathan Smith, fitter; Joseph Baddows, smith; George Neale, boiler-maker; Thomas Whitcombe, engine-driver; William Ingledew, labourer; Alexander Mahony, labourer; Joseph Vincent, labourer; and Mr. Lowe, the manager of the works, who experienced a very narrow escape when the explosion took place on board the steam-ship Gipsy Queen, in November last, when ten lives were lost.

Subjoined is a correct account of the locality, and the circumstances attendant on the explosion.

At the mouth of the River Lea (there called Bow Creek), and close to the Thames, is a range of factories; the most prominent are the Thames Plate Glass Company's works, and the steam-engine factory of the Samuda brothers. The business is now carried on by the surviving brother, Mr. Joseph Samuda, a gentleman of the Jewish persuasion. The factory, dwelling-houses, and workshops, occupy an area of about an acre and a half on the banks of the Lea. The machinery of the factory was put in motion by a stram engine, or rather two of eight-horse power each, and the steam was supplied by a large tubular boiler, which first began to work about three months since.

This boiler was originally intended for a new steamer, but had been purchased for the low price of thirty guineas, by Messrs. Samuda, for the purpose of supplying steam to the engine on their factory at Blackwall. It was a tubular boiler, in which the fire, instead of passing through a common flue, passed through a number of small flues. The outer casing was formed of strong iron plates, three-eighths of an inch in thickness, and firmly rivetted together. As far as appearance went, the boiler appeared to be a very strong and substantial one. Latterly, however, there appeared to be some difficulty in getting up the steam, and it is believed that on more than one occasion it was worked up to a very high pressure. On Wednesday morning, soon after the men employed in the factory had returned from their breakfasts, and the works were in full operation, the boilers gave way with a loud explosion. Every man in the engine-house was either killed or wounded, and the steam chest and outer casing of the boiler were shattered and distributed in all directions.

The engine-house was in an instant reduced to a heap of ruins, and the principal part of the materials hurled to a considerable distance. The premises of the Thames Plate Glass Company's works, the Crown Tavern, and numerous tenements adjoining were damaged, and the windows and frames blown out. Portions of the boiler were found in the Plaistow-marshes, on the opposite side of the river, about one hundred and fifty yards from the factory. In the same place, the body of one of the sufferers, which had been blown across the creek, was picked up in a mutilated condition. It is believed that he was on the top of the boiler, and in the act of easing the safety valve when the occurrence happened. The bodies of the other persons killed were found close to the spot where the boiler stood, and they appear to have been killed instantaneously. Neale had several ribs broken. Smith also received extensive injuries. Harrison, Baddows, Ramsey, Ingledew, and Vincent were taken to the London Hospital.

The outer casing of the boiler and the steam chest are completely destroyed, and the top row of tubes bent and thrown on one side. The other rows of tubes, with two or three exceptions, have escaped injury. The destruction of the engine-house was complete. It was a building about a hundred feet square, and not more than nine feet high. The engine itself did not sustain much injury.

A quantity of the materials fell into the creek, and pieces of iron nuts, bolts, and screws connected with the boiler were found in the yards at the back of the Crown Tavern, and in the grounds in the rear of the adjoining premises. At a moderate computation there were not less than 5000 panes of glass broken by the concussion. The window frames were shattered in several dwellings, and the furniture displaced. The dwelling-house of Mr. Lowe, the manager of the works, at one corner of the yard, also suffered, and every window was broken. The residence of Mr. John Howard, foreman grinder of the Thames Plate Glass Works, near the western corner of Mr. Saunders's premises, sustained considerable damage. The windows were all broken, and the parapet wall blown down. Mr. Howard's daughter was making her toilet in a back room overlooking Samuda's factory when the explosion took place, and was thrown backwards. The glass in the windows was detroyed, and other mischief done.

Mr Samuda states that he purchased the boiler merely to drive the works of the factory, because he had not time to make a new one, and that it had not been used more than five or six times when it came into his possession. He says he believes the water had got very low in the boiler, and that gas was generated instead of steam, and that an explosion was the consequence. This opinion of Mr. Samuda's was confirmed by more than one practical man who visited the spot during the day.

SUICIDE OF THE LODGE-KEEPER AT CLAREMONT.—On Thursday week, Edward Story, keeper of the lodge at the principal entrance at Claremont, belonging to the King of the Belgians, committed suicide by cutting his throat. After breakfast, apparently quite well, he took hot water into his bed-room for shaving: in a few minutes his wife heard a noise overhead as of some one stamping, and on running up stairs she found her husband on the floor in the agonies of death, having cut his throat with the razor so as almost to separate the head from the body. At the inquest, a verdict of "Temporary insanity" was returned.

FATAL ACCIDENT IN THE BOROUGH.—On Tuesday evening, Mr. Payne held an inquest at Guy's Hospital on the body of Mr. James Gearing, aged 59 years, the well-known coach proprietor of Bromley, Kent. It appeared by the evidence that on Friday afternoon week, the deceased was in the act of crossing the High-street in the Borough, at the moment a heavily-laden waggon was passing. In the confusion the deceased fell, and before he could recover himself the off-wheel of the waggon passed over him. He was conveyed to the hospital, where he died on Sunday morning. From a post mortem examination it appeared that deceased had been suffering from a long standing disease of the lungs, but the immediate cause was the injuries he had sustained. Verdict, "Accidental death."

EVENING MELODIES.—NO. VI.

"(It Happen'd Fifteen Years Ago.)

It happen'd fifteen years ago,
Just fifteen years in May—
And yet at times my tears will flow
In silent gushes, quite as though
It happen'd yesterday.

I would not have that sorrow flee
For years of unmix'd bliss;
A holy thing it is for me;
God knows how hard my heart might be,
If it were not for this.

For oft, when solemn words in vain
Have striv'n to rouse my mind,
When slowly some religious strain
Has died, and swelled, and died again,
And left no tear behind,—

One gentle thought of moments fled
Recalls that distant day;
And brings her accents as she said,
"I'm dying, and I'm not afraid;
But, brother, let us pray!"

Then melts my soul, and flies apace
The sad, yet sacred tear;
And, kneeling down, I pray for grace,
That I may gain that better place,
To live more kindly here.

To help my brethren in their need,
To feel their failings less;
Whene'er I love, to love indeed;
And oh! a daily life to lead
Of more real holiness.

And though they pass too soon away,
Those hours of solemn thought,
And leave me careless, wild, and gay;
Yet still I trust my heart can say,
They come not quite for nought.

By all those pure desires received,
Which else had been denied,
Though long and oft my soul hath grieved
I thank my GOD that Mary lived,
And more that Mary died!

MR. DISRAELI'S SIMILE ABOUT THE WHIGS.

Mr. Disraeli's simile of the clothes was certainly very characteristic, but his anger with Sir R. Peel was not in reality on account of the hon. baronet having run away with the clothes of the Whigs, but because he refused to make of Mr. Disraeli himself an upper Benjamin.—Herald.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE MANUFACTURE OF GLASS.

An account of a new and interesting step in science formed the subject of a communication made by Mr. Claudet before the Society of Arts at their last meeting. It refers to an improved method of manufacturing, with certainty and dispatch, glass for the use of opticians. The great difficulty in this manufacture has been to produce glass of an equal degree of density throughout, and without lines and spots. This difficulty has never been overcome until the present time; but by the process detailed in Mr. Claudet's paper, lenses of any large size may be manufactured quite free from defects.

TRICKS OF PHYSICIANS.

When Sir John Elliott, the physician, was dining with Dr. Armstrong, Sir John was, very early in the repast, called out. Armstrong, on losing the quiet enjoyment of his friend's company, muttered out roughly, "I did not think you would have sent for yourself so soon."

A BUMPER.

When Popery had sway in England, they usually drank the Pope's health in a full glass after dinner—"au bon pere;" whence the word bumper.

STATISTICS OF THE PARISIAN PRESS.

The Journal de la Librairie gives the list of all the journals and periodicals published in Paris. The total amounts to 439. Of these, 428 are French, 6 Polish, 3 English, 1 German, and 1 Spanish. 45 are subject to surety, viz., 44 French journals, and 1 English.

RETRIBUTION.

(From the German of Uhland.) By LEWIS FILMORE

The Serf hath murder'd his Lord, that he Might himself the Knight and the Noble be.

He stabb'd his Lord in the secret wood
And plunged the corse in the rolling flood.

He clad himself in the armour bright
And mounted the steed of that gallant Knight.

He rode to the bridge, but all in vain
He urg'd the Courser with voice and rein.

With the golden spurs he gor'd his side
And—was hurl'd by the steed in the foaming tide.

One cry—one struggle to reach the bank,
And—the Serf in the Noble's armour, sank!

BOOTS AND STOCKINGS.

At a north country inn, the other day, the boots being called, a shrimp of a lad, in rustic attire, presented himself. "Well, are you the boots?" The youth replied, "No! I'm the stockings, sur." "Stockings! What do you mean by stockings?" "Wha, sur," said the boy, with an unaltered countenance, "I'm under the boots, so ha must be the stockings, sur."

PRICE OF TEA IN FORMER TIMES.

The London Gazette of Dec. 16, 1680, contains the following:—"These are to give notice to persons of quality, that a small parcel of most excellent tea is by accident fallen into the hand of a private person to be sold; but that none may be disappointed, the lowest price is 30s. a pound, and not any to be sold under a pound weight, for which they are desired to bring a convenient box. SPANISH NUNS.

It appears from a statistical return drawn up by the Spanish Minister of Finance, that the number of nuns in Spain was 11,772.

POPULATION STATISTICS.

It appears from the official report of the Registrar General, that the number of marriages entered in 1842 was 118,825; of births, 517,739; and of deaths, 349,519, showing an excess of births over deaths of 168,220. In the same year (1842), there occurred 10,881 violent deaths and suicides. The number of illegitimate children registered in 1842 amounted to 34,796, which is an admitted increase. The baptisms and births returned in 1839 amounted to 399,721; illegitimate childre , 20,039. Births registered in 1842, 517,739; illegitimate children, 34,796. The number of boys born is, in all countries, greater than the number of girls.

THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.

Canova, the celebrated sculptor, refused the offices of a priest when dying, because, he said, that the crucifix which he brought was so bunglingly executed.

GOOD TEMPER.

Good temper is the philosophy of the heart—a gem in the treasury within, whose rays are reflected on all outward objects—a perpetual sunshine, imparting warmth, light, and life to all, within the sphere of its influence.

A NEGRO NATURALIST.

Quashee, commencing a work on natural history, wrote as follows:—"Man is de first animal in de creation; he spring up like a sparrow-grass, hop about like a hopper-grass, and dies de same as a jackass."

THE PROGRESS OF RAILWAY LEGISLATION.

A Parliamentary paper has been issued, from which it appears that since the commencement of the present session one hundred and nine petitions for Railway Bills have been presented, thirty-nine bills read a first time, and fifteen bills read a second time. None have proceeded further.

DECAYED CHEESE.

Decayed cheese, whether called ripe or rotten, is good for maggots, but totally unfit for man. It contains no nutriment; has no digestive power, as has been erroneously supposed; and is calculated to rendered the breath and body offensive.—Parry on Diet.

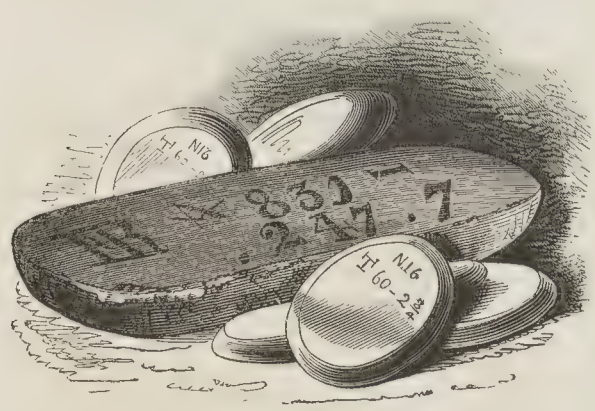
ROME TAKEN BY SHIPS.

In Nelson's Sketch of his Life he says:—"On the arrival of the Russian squadron at Naples (1799), I directed Commodore Troubridge to go with the squadron and blockade closely Civita Vecchia, and to offer the French most favourable conditions, if they would evacuate Rome and Civita Vecchia; which terms the French General Grenier complied with, and they were signed on board the Culloden; when a prophecy made to me on my arrival at Naples was fulfilled—viz., that I should take Rome with my ships."

AN AWKWARD MISTAKE.

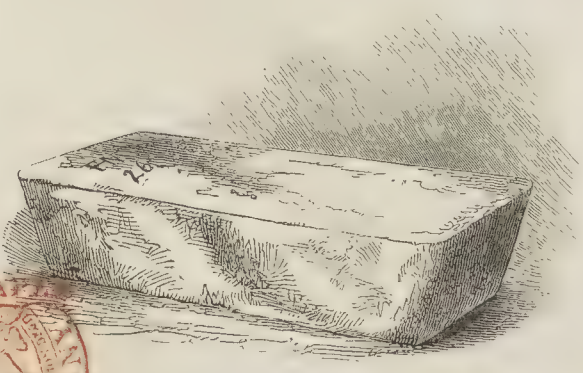
"Mistakes will happen in the best regulated families," and a very curious one occurred not long ago to a celebrated actress when in America, which, as it occurred during a performance of "Macbeth," I venture to introduce here. The lady was acting Lady Macbeth, her first appearance with that company, and having been detained by a rail road accident did not arrive at the theatre in time for rehearsal—an awkward circumstance, as all the performers were strangers to her. At the conclusion of Lady Macbeth's first soliloquy a messenger enters to announce the visit of the King. Prior to his speaking she says, "What is your tidings?" So did our heroine say, little dreaming what answer she would receive, for to her great astonishment, instead of the usual reply, "the King comes here to-night," the messenger, as she imagined him to be, approached sufficiently near to whisper in her ear, holding his Scotch bonnet before his face, to prevent the audience from hearing, "Hush, I am Macbeth, we cut the messenger out—go on, if you please."

THE RESOURCES OF IRELAND.



Valencia Island, county Kerry, supplies materials from her splendid slate quarries to the New Houses of Parliament. This beautiful slate, whose veining is so much admired, is worked into elegant drawing-room tables, mantel-pieces, and various other articles. These recently discovered quarries, in the working of which a capital of £20,000 has been invested (thus affording employment for hundreds), present evidences that the resources of Ireland only require to be developed, to make her one of the greatest and most prosperous nations on the face of the earth.—Limerick Reporter.

BULLION OFFICE.—BANK OF ENGLAND.



BULLION OFFICE.—RECEIVING OFFICE.

The Bullion Office of the Bank of England presents an interesting picture of the earliest mode of banking, which was simply that of making a deposit of precious metals, or coins, for security, or recoinage. Such was the character of the first public bank established in Europe—the celebrated corporation of Venice, founded in 1157; and, nearer our own time such was also the constitution of the Bank of Amsterdam, established 1609. But in none of them was the practice more strictly followed than in the bank of Hamburg, founded in 1619. There for every bar of silver of a certain fineness and weight—called the "Marc of Cologne," equivalent to 3608 troy grains—the bank gave credit on its books for 442 lubs banco money of account; and any person having a credit on the books of the bank might be paid in similar bars, at the rate of 444 lubs banco, the difference being applied to defray the expenses of the establishment. The business of these primitive companies consisted, in fact, of nothing more than simply receiving the property of others into custody, and keeping it hoarded till called for. The practice of lending as well as taking, which is the principle of modern banking, was not then understood; and it followed that the commercial enterprises of those times were few, and the national wealth proportionately small.

In the Bank of England—which is a bank of deposit, of issue, and of discount, the use of a bullion office is exclusively for the purpose of affording the merchants, captains, and traders of London, a safe place of receipt and deposit for "bullion;" and to provide a secure place for the reception of bullion, the property of the bank itself, and also for the safe delivery of it to the Mint and other places. For the conveniences afforded the public, no charge is made, except when the deposits are required to be weighed, when a trifling sum per cent. is demanded. Any person has, therefore, a right to send precious metals or foreign coins, free of expense, to the Bank of England, to be kept in his name, as long as he may require; and for whose safe custody the corporation is responsible.

With these introductory remarks we shall proceed to describe the office, the kinds of deposit most frequently made in its vaults, with such miscellaneous information on the subject as our crowded space may permit. But it will be necessary, first, to define the meaning ordinarily attached to the term bullion, and the sense in which we shall use it. Bullion is most commonly understood to be a generic term for uncoined gold or silver in bars, plate, or other masses; but by the Bank officers the name is used to denote the precious metals both in a coined and an uncoined state, and within those limits we shall apply it.

The word "bullion" first became popular during the proceedings respecting the Bank of England from 1797, when the order of council was issued, that the Bank should discontinue the redemption of its notes by the payment of specie, to 1823, when specie payments were resumed; for, by a previous law, the Bank was authorised to pay its notes in uncoined silver or gold, according to its weight or fineness. The investigations of the bullion committees, and the various speculations on the subject of bullion, related to the supply of gold and silver whether coined or not, as the basis of the circulating medium.

The Bullion Office is situated on the northern side of the Bank, in the basement story, and formed part of the original structure erected by Mr. George Sampson, in 1734. It was afterwards enlarged by Sir Robert Taylor, and eventually altered to its present form by Sir John Soane who, on his appointment as Bank architect, proceeded to re-model and greatly extend the entire structure. The office now consists of three spacious apartments—a public chamber for the transaction of business, a vault for the public deposits, and a vault for the private stock of the Bank. The duties of the office are discharged by W. D. Haggard, Esq., Principal; a Deputy Principal, Clerk, Assistant Clerk, and sundry stout porters. The office is, in most respects, well contrived for the business but its height is so great as to produce many disagreeable echoes. The apparatus and appointments are of the finest description. The public are admitted to a counter, separated from the rest of the apartments; but are, on no account, allowed to enter the bullion vaults.

The silver deposits consist chiefly of—

1. Silver, in oblong "pigs," from South America; and occasionally, in smaller semi-globular masses, from Valparaiso—the former weighing each, on an average, 65lb.
2. Bar Silver, also from South America, but of a finer description than the preceding.

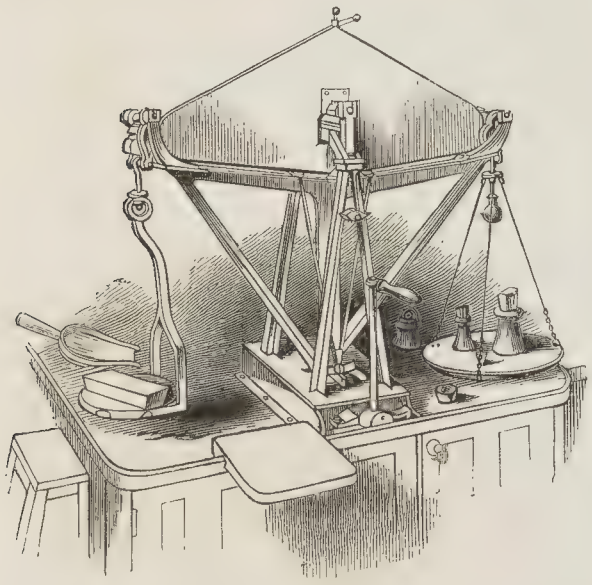
3. Plata Pena, or Rock Silver—a name given to silver when it is not consolidated, or completely in a metallic state, of which the following account of a process of extraction may serve to give some explanation. The ores o silver obtained from argentiferous rocks are, in one of the modes by which they are reduced, first of all finely pulverised, and, after undergoing much wash.

ng, to free them from the earthy particles, and, generally, after also other processes, to disengage the alloy, they are mixed with a quantity of quicksilver sufficient to form a liquid amalgum of this metal with the silver. This being run off, it is put into leather-bags, and being squeezed, part of the mercury oozes through, leaving the rest of it with the silver in a state which may be termed metallic paste. This is afterwards subjected to a kind of distillation at a low red heat; and the chief part of the mercury being thus sublimed, the silver is left in a state of much purity, but in appearance more like pumice-stone than of a perfectly-formed metal. It is this which is called Plata Pena (a cone of silver); and as, from its spongy texture, it is capable of imbibing much moisture, even from the atmosphere, it requires to be well heated before its proper weight can be ascertained; and to be still more heated before it is melted, in order to expel any remaining mercury; as, otherwise, portions of it would be liable to spurt out of the crucible. To show the extent to which the absorption of water, by Plata Pena, takes place, we may mention that in a trial made by Mr. Haggard on a mass, 87 lbs. weight, a loss of 29 lbs. ac crued from thoroughly drying it.

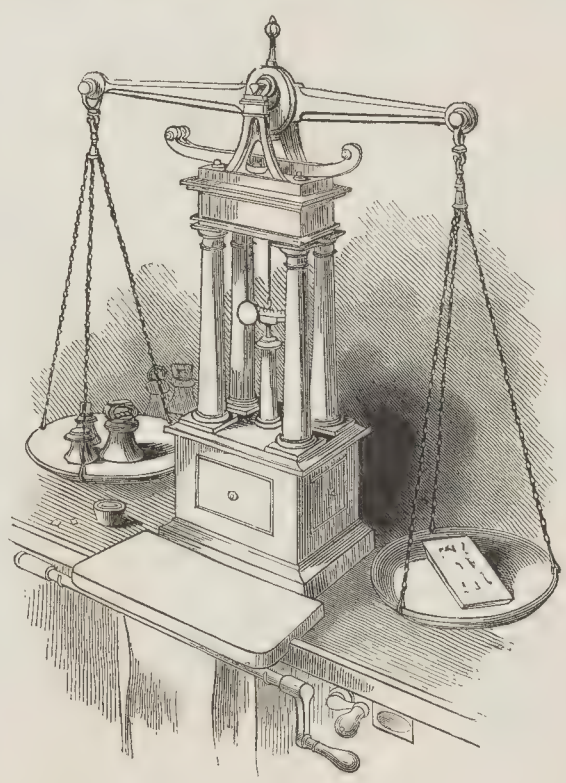


4. Sycee Silver. With this, as in the specie used by his Celestial Majesty in the payment of the Chinese ransom, the public have become, in name, at least, familiar. Sycee is the colloquial pronunciation of the phrase Se-sze, which strictly means "fine silk," but which is also used to mean "pure silver," intimating that it may be drawn out as fine as silk. The proper Chinese term for it is Wan-yin, and the average quality of this silver, is "98 touch, 980 fine," or a little above 13 dwts. better than British standard. It contains gold amounting, on an average, to about 12 or 13 grains in the pound Troy. The ingots or shoes of this silver, are stamped, as shown in the engraving, with the name (top-line) of the assayer, "Ung-un;" the name and reign of the Emperor (right col.) "Taou Kwang, 20th year, 2nd month;" and the words (left col.) "assayed and cast"—the latter term signifying that in quality the silver cast was of the legal fineness.

5. Spanish Dollars. These are brought to the Bank in great quantities, packed, usually, in barrels. They are afterwards sorted into parcels of 1000 each, weighing together 2 1lbs, and placed in strong canvass bags. These bags are then piled in stacks of 200 each in the bullion vaults; the bags being placed in fourteen rows, each one fourteen bags wide, with four at top to make the number. The one we have engraved is known as a pillar dollar of Charles IV., the arms of Castile and Leon on the obverse, having two pillars for supporters. Others, without pillars, are called shield dollars, or "shields."

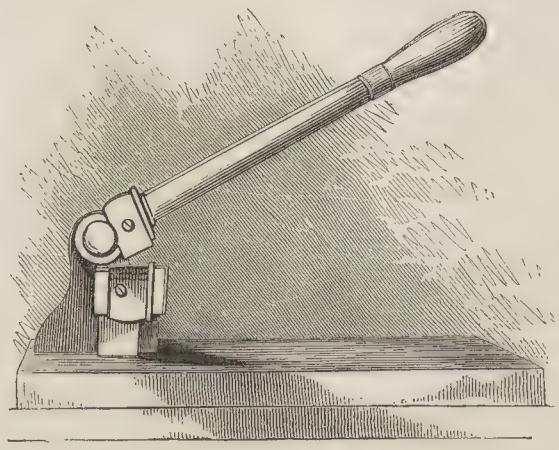
6. Mexican, or Eagle Dollars.

COMPARTMENT IN THE BULLION VAULT.—STACKING BAGS OF DOLLARS.



BALANCE FOR BAR SILVER.

Besides these, Brazilian, Peruvian, Bolivian, and North American dollars are occasionally received or purchased to a large amount. In dealing in them, great care has to be observed to escape loss by forgery. Many of them are drilled and plugged with spurious metal; and others are made of a compact pewter body, cased with silver leaf, struck from the surfaces of genuine coin, which they accordingly resemble in the nicest degree. Dollars bought by the Bank are generally sent to be melted at the beautiful refining establishment of Brown and Wingrove, Wood-street, Cheapside. Sycee silver has always been sent to the Mint. The separate letters and numerals in the legends of the dollars are the Mint and valuation symbols.

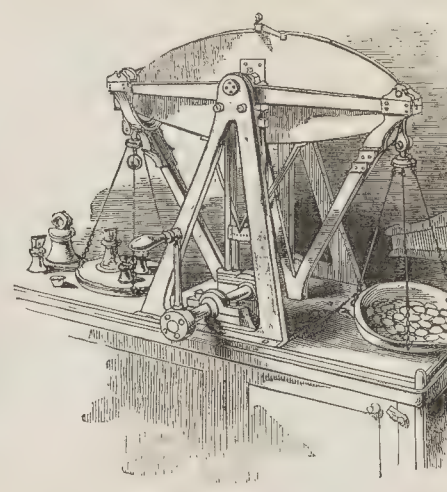


Native silver. This is now procured in several of the northern counties; but the chief supply comes from the lead mines of Northumberland. The lumps in which it is sold, one of which our cut represents, ordinarily weigh 2 cwts. each. The quantity of silver annually found in England would furnish sufficient material for the manufacture of all the plate made in London within the same period.

Gold is almost exclusively obtained by the Bank in the "bar" form; although, of course, no form of the precious deposit would be refused. A bar of gold is a small slab, weighing sixteen pounds, and worth about £800. In the foreground of our large cut a truck is shown, laden with a consignment of gold bars. The other trucks in the same engraving bear oads of dollars.

The testing of bullion is performed by comparing it with certain standards of purity, established by Acts of Parliament for that purpose. There are two for each metal. For gold, the standard is 22 carats fine, and 18 carats fine, in the pound troy; and for silver, 11 ozs. 2 dwts. fine, and 11 ozs. 10 dwts. fine, in the pound troy. For testing these purities different Assay Offices have been appointed in various parts of the United Kingdom, the Corporations, or Goldsmiths' Companies of which, have jurisdiction over the manufactures of these metals in their separate districts. They now, are those of London, Edinburgh, Dublin, York, Exeter, Chester, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Birmingham, Sheffield, and Glasgow. The great importance of the process of assaying the precious metals will be understood when the great acilities which exist for their corruption are considered but more especially when we state that in whatever state gold is found, it is mixed with a greater or less quantity of silver, with perhaps the single exception, as far as is known, of that from the Cadonga Mines, in the province of Minas Geraes, in the Brazils, and this gold is alloyed with about 1-16th part of its weight of palladium. Silver is also usually accompanied with gold, but there are some exceptions, particularly when it is extracted from lead and other of the inferior metals.

BALANCE FOR BAR GOLD.



CHOPPER FOR LIGHT SOVEREIGNS.

In the Bullion Office, where the process of weighing is performed, a number of admirably-constructed balances are brought into operation. The larger ones, which our cuts exhibit, comprise first, a balance, invented by Mr. Bate, for weighing silver in bars, from 50 lbs. to 80 lbs. troy; second, a balance, invented in 1820, by Sir John Barton, of the Royal Mint, for weighing gold coin and gold in bars, the former in quantities varying from a few ounces to 18 lbs. troy; and the latter any weight up to 15 lbs.; third, a balance, invented by Mr. Bate, for weighing dollars to amounts not exceeding 72 lbs. 2 ozs. troy. These instruments are very perfect in their action, admit of easy regulation, and are of durable construction.

The amount of bullion in the possession of the Bank of England, constitutes, along with their securities, the assets which they place against their liabilities, on account of circulation and deposits; and the difference between the several amounts is called the "Rest," or balance in favour of the Bank. The value of the Bank bullion, stated in round numbers, varies at the present time from £15,000,000 upwards.

In connection with our illustrations, we have added a figure of a light sovereign chopper, now in use in the Bullion Office, which does its work most efficaciously, and which, we believe, is about to be used in all the cash offices of the establishments.

Before leaving this interesting subject, at which we have but glanced, we beg to acknowledge the very liberal assistance we have received of W. Cotton, Esq., the Governor of the Bank of England, by whose permission we were enabled to make the sketches for our illustrations.

BALANCE FOR DOLLARS.

Circulation of Base Coin in London.—The circulation of base coin in the metropolis is now practised to a great extent, particularly in shillings and sixpences. The spurious coin are manufactured in a superior style, being double plated, and the sound excellent, and are supposed to be made in Birmingham. The detection can, however, be made by weighing them against real coin.

The Thames Tunnel.—The annual meeting of the proprietors in this undertaking was held at the London Tavern on Tuesday. The chair was taken by Mr. Benjamin Hawes. Mr. Blundell, the secretary, read the report, and the annual statement of accounts. In reply to various questions, the Chairman said that the company was under a bond to Sir I. Brunel, the engineer, for the payment of £10,000, when the Tunnel from high water mark was completed. That obligation, however, was rescinded when the works were full of water, and a fresh bond entered into. A sum of £1500 was offered, and the Lords of the Treasury had sanctioned the grant, as well as others to the assistant engineer, Mr. Page, and to Mr. Charlier, the late secretary. The directors' report was then adopted, and ordered to be printed. A proprietor asked the amount of the tolls received last year? The Chairman said £6040, subject to some outlay that might not occur again. With respect to the water that still found its way into the works, Professor Faraday had analysed it, and had decided that it was not river water. As to the traffic of heavy carriages through the Tunnel, it would bear any weight.

Death of Vice-Admiral Sir Thomas Baker, K.C.B.—Vice-Admiral Sir Thomas Baker, K.C.B., expired on Wednesday week, at his residence, the Shrubbery, Walmer, Kent. Sir Thomas was in receipt of one of the "good service pensions." His commissions were dated, Lieutenant, October 13 1792; Commander, November 24, 1795; Captain, June 13, 1797; Rear-Admiral, July 19, 1821; and Vice-Admiral, Jan. 10, 1837. He was also a Knight of the Sword of Sweden.

Death of Gen. Pritchard.—We have to announce the demise of this venerable and distinguished officer, at an advanced age. His commission as Colonel Commandant of the 1st battalion of the Royal Artillery was dated July 3, 1837.

The Army in Ireland.—The army in Ireland for this month consists of 7 regiments of cavalry, 17 regiments of infantry, 17 depots of infantry, 2 troops Royal Horse Artillery, 9 companies Royal Marines, and detachments of Battalion Artillery, forming an effective force of 21,800 rank and file.

The 1st Dragoon Guards, which has been stationed at Canterbury since its return from Canada in 1843, will be removed to Exeter in the early part of next month. This regiment wants one man to complete its establishment and is the only regiment of cavalry in the service, with the exception of the two regiments of Life and Horse Guards Blue, that has eight troops.

A letter from South Australia, dated Sept. 15, 1844, mentions that some fine mercury had been discovered in the neighbourhood of Adelaide, but it had not been ascertained whether it existed in sufficient quantity to render it profitable to work for a mine.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Quæsitor Veri."—The custom of choosing Valentines on the 14th of February was practised in the houses of the gentry in England as early as 1476. There are several explanations of its origin: Butler, in his "Lives of the Saints," refers it to the substitution of St. Valentine in billets given on his day for the superstitious Roman custom of boys drawing the names of girls in honour of their goddess Februata Juno. Bourne ascribes it to the rural tradition of birds pairing on this day, thus referred to by Shakspeare, in his "Midsummer Night's Dream:"—

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1845.

Another instance has just occurred which shows that the degrading appetite for horrors has an undiminished hold upon the public. A wretched man is accused of the cold blooded murder of a person with whom he was on intimate terms; the deed seems to have been prompted by the mere desire to get possession of a few miserable pounds; the lowest motives were seconded by the vilest means; there is nothing in the whole unhappy transaction that takes it out of the catalogue of those common and vulgar horrors of which our criminal annals are so full. Yet from the accounts we have read of the different examinations before the Coroner and the Magistrate, we perceive that the public—and that not exclusively the lowest and most ignorant portion of it—are, as in some former cases, making of the criminal a sort of hero, crowding every place where he is to appear, thronging the street he is to pass, visiting the spot where the deed was committed in thousands, making a spectacle and sight of the funeral of the victim, and, worse even than all this, courting personal notice and personal contact with the alleged murderer.

This morbid curiosity and diseased sympathy with criminals, is, unhappily, no new phenomenon; but we have rarely seen the feeling exhibited to so disgusting an extent as in the present instance. It happens that the accused man takes snuff, and we read of scores of persons pressing round him in the police court for the distinction of dipping their fingers in his box; we have been told by an eye witness of the shameful scene, that some persons even wrapped up what they had taken in paper to bear away with them—perhaps to their families—as if it were a precious relic! All this is truly shocking; there must be a confusion of the ideas of right and wrong in the minds of vast numbers of people, or such scenes could not occur. There can be no proper sense of what crime is in the abstract: there can scarcely be a notion of what a dreadful thing the crime of murder is in particular. The right-thinking mind would leave punishment to the law, would bury the deed itself in silence, and shrink from all such needless and ostentatious contact with the criminal as pollution.

The worst peculiarity in the exhibition of this feeling, is, that it does not prevail exclusively among those in whom ignorance might palliate it; people who would think themselves injured if the appellation of respectable were denied to them, manifest it as strongly as any other class. One of the most repulsive scenes we ever witnessed was the criminal court of an assize town, during the trial of two men for murder. They were two agricultural labourers, miserably poor, and grossly ignorant—ignorant to a degree that seemed barely credible could be found existing in the midst of a state of society like ours. They scarcely comprehended the nature of the crime they had committed; the meaning of all the legal proceedings of the trial they evidently did not understand at all. There was no doubt in the case—the proof was clear: they were sentenced to death, and soon afterwards executed. The illustration the whole scene afforded of the destitution of body and darkness of soul to be found among thousands of the people of this "envy of surrounding nations" was afflicting, deplorable; it contained little to excite, and much that was mournful. Yet that court was crowded with the "rank and fashion" of the locality! The judicial bench itself was occupied by ladies, dressed as gaily, and with as much care, as if the occasion had been one of festivity, and for the whole of a long day they sat gazing on the criminals, over whom the shadow of death was closing darker and more dark with every elapsing minute, coolly scanning every indication of terror and agony breaking with uncouth expression through the dense cloud of ignorance that had paralysed their faculties for good, yet left them open to the temptation to crime. The rich and the powerful, who had perhaps neglected or forgotten to do anything towards raising the condition of the class from which these men sprung, came now to look as on a spectacle—a change from the mock emotions of the theatre—at the closing scene of their mortal career. It was a sad and repulsive exhibition; rendered more so by the presence of those whose gentler nature ought to have kept them far from such a place at such a time.

It was a morbid curiosity that brought them there; the same feeling that has taken so many thousands to the scene of the recent murder. As far as the public is concerned, we have had a repetition of what has taken place on former occasions, and which led the most able of living journalists to make the following remarks, which are as true at this moment as when they were written:—"The landlord upon whose premises a murder has been committed is now-a-days a made man. The place becomes a show in the neighbourhood, as the scene of a fair. The barn in which Maria Martin was murdered by Corder was sold in toothpicks; the hedge through which the body of Mr. Weare was dragged, was purchased by the inch; Bishop's house bids fair to go off in tobacco-stoppers and snuff-boxes, and the well will be drained at a guinea a quart. Really if people indulge in this vile and horrid taste, they will tempt landlords to get murders committed in their houses, for the great profit accruing from the morbid curiosity."

The years that have elapsed since those occurrences, have seen the same disgraceful exhibitions more than once renewed, but never in so offensive a form as in the recent case.

The Property Tax was discussed on Wednesday evening; there is evidently a strong feeling against that part of it which taxes income, but there are few indications of the opposition being effectual. Mr. Bernal Osborne made an attempt to throw out the bill altogether, but his proposal found no advocate, and gained only 23 votes. Mr. Curteis suggested that it should be continued for two years instead of three, and failed even more signally. There is no combination of purpose or argument; the Whigs do not take up the question with anything like earnestness, and as long as the opposition is confined to these random shots from individual members, Sir R. Peel may do precisely as he chooses; his intimations that he shall impose it in all its rigour for the three years longer, are received with "hear, hear, and a laugh,"—laying the same tax on the uncertain income made by labour, and the certain one derived from property, being doubtless a very jocular and exhilarating proceeding. It may be doubted, if those who have to pay it, see the point of the joke. The debate led to no result; there will be more and fuller discussion, when the bill gets into committee; but we do not anticipate that any amendment of any importance will be carried.

With respect to the part of the Budget that rests on the Sugar Duties, the course of the Government is not quite so smooth; there is much embarrassment in the whole affair. Not only is it declared to be impossible in practice to levy the different rates of duty put on the different qualities of sugar, with anything like certainty, which would be a troublesome obstacle in the way of an arrangement, but the East Indian interest is in arms, asserting that, being equally British, they have a right to equal consideration with the West Indies, as to this article. But there is a greater difficulty still, even than these; the great distinction attempted to be drawn between slave labour sugar and that produced by free labour, is turning out to be totally impracticable to maintain. We have treaties of commerce with slave holding countries, and their produce we must admit, however raised, under "the most favoured nation" clause, any act of Parliament to the contrary notwithstanding. At the present moment there are cargoes of sugar from New Orleans unloading, in the very teeth of the act of last session, which professed to exclude slave produce, and in spite of a prophecy of Mr. Gladstone, that the United States could not send us this article, as they did not grow enough for themselves. The consequence of all this is, that a "modification" of the Sugar Dudies at first proposed, is by no means impossible. These two subjects have been the only important topics of debate for the week.

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

We lament that we have not more food for mirth for our readers, but very certain is it, and as melancholy as certain, that "gaieties" do not abound; but rather that "gravities," and those of no cheerful aspect, bear sway among the events of the moment.

A revolting incident, from which the mind cannot escape—and which has fixed the too ardent contemplation of society upon its awful mystery—has been the Hampstead murder; a crime which appears to us at present far from solved, and which has interested a number of persons of a certain distinction, who have never before rendered themselves particularly remarkable for anxiety or activity in watching the progress of public morality. Justice could pursue her melancholy duty of inquiry and punishment without the aid of that eager and ill-directed curiosity which exhibits itself in rank and birth, only to lend its ill examples to the ignorant and humble. In the meanwhile, it were far better to direct the eye of searching inquiry into the radical evil—if it be discoverable—of the social malady that is growing so morbidly among us, and darkening the character of society with so many spots of blood. It is truly a source of melancholy regret to read of murder after murder with such horrid frequency—surrounded with features of barbarity totally at variance with the civilisation we profess to have attained—and often committed with so little motive, and apparently attended with such slight remorse.

Another scarcely less revolting circumstance has thrust itself upon the notice of the community during the present week. We allude to the disclosure of a series of cruel and sacrilegious irreverences towards the dead—the most brutal violations of the sanctity of the tomb—to the mercenary end of enriching a graveyard proprietor, at the expense of the decencies, the feelings, the affections, and the health of the people. We have long been aware what a crying evil has been constituted by the old burial grounds of London—how the reckless crowding of them, and the continued unearthing of their decayed and decaying tenants, have made them charnel houses of corruption, and spread pestilence around their living neighbourhoods; but we never thought to have been shocked with a narrative of practices so appalling as those which have desecrated the sanctuary at Spafields, and roused the indignant horror and disgust of its wounded and insulted inhabitants. That the proprietor of the ground, the sextons, and all who have participated in the practice, or the profits of the disclosed barbarities, deserve punishment at once retributive and condign, justice will not for a wavering instant doubt.

While these untoward themes have been ruffling the surface of society, the progress of public affairs, foreign and domestic, has been slow indeed. The Overland Mail, however, has brought news of more Indian warfare, and Sir Charles Napier has marched for the mountains beyond his government of Scinde, to protect his people and put down the predatory incursions of the robber tribes. Meanwhile, the effect of the Revolution in the Punjaub—the setting up of the idiot son of a profligate mother, the paramour of his Chief Minister—and the consequent temporary establishment of a sway that cannot last—point still more clearly (too clearly, as we think) the path of British aggrandizement, and foster the insatiate avidity with which we seek excuses for appropriating territory after territory of wealth and strength. No doubt, our British rule blesses the native inhabitants; but it must be a lax conscience that can satisfy itself of the justice of our appropriation of the spoil. We may employ our riches advantageously to a community without a chance of proving the propriety of their theft.

Parliamentary matters—so far as practical legislation is concerned—are spiritless; but recrimination goes on more thrivingly, and, since our last, there has been a refreshing, and manly, and smart, and vigorous rebuke administered by Mr. Disraeli to Sir Robert Peel. The literary member, who, by-the-way, rises with every debate in the estimation of the house, and who was enthusiastically cheered all throughout his speech, read the Premier just such a lesson as Premiers ought occasionally to receive, and that it was efficacious was undubitable, for the "galled jade winced." It pointed in clear terms the distinction between the maintenance of principle and the sacrifice of personal independence in a party man, and asserted the possibility of combining fidelity to a general scheme of operation, with a conscientious difference of opinion upon particular questions, and a manly opposition to particular acts. And Mr. Disraeli did not think himself any the less a Conservative upon general terms because he seconded the proposition of the Radical Member for Finsbury, who, nearly all right-thinking and just and honourable men concurred in believing, had equity and justice on his side. The reply of the Premier to the Young England attack was cool—perhaps in its dictatorial superciliousness, amounting to impertinence, but, as an argument, it was a complete failure, and Mr. Disraeli may consider himself—as society considers him—unanswered still.

We are sick of the jabberings about Income tax and Sugar-duties, now that the question—so far as the certainty of the Ministerial arrangement taking effect is concerned—are for the nonce settled in the public mind; but we are glad to find one or two worthy contemplations of public grievance by the Legislature, and to perceive a desire to legislate for the agricultural poor. Mr. Cowper, the member for Hertford, who has bent upon the subject all the attention of an amiable and philanthropic mind, has proposed an extension of the allotment system, and without pausing here to ask whether his intelligence has hit upon the right panacea (the subject will shortly be so fully treated by us in our Pictures of the Working Classes), we may yet rejoice that all parties joined in the expression of a willingness to legislate, and a desire to ameliorate the condition of the rural population.

A singular act of bad grace was this week committed by Lord Campbell in the House of Lords, but as it was a snarl which told the nature of the dog, it is worth noticing, as one of the straws which indicate public character to the public mind. It appeared that Lord Campbell, being anxious to carry a bill through the house (which broke down last session under the leaden weight of his introduction), persuaded the Lord Chancellor to adopt and introduce it. Lord Lyndhurst did so; and no sooner did, than Lord Campbell turned round upon him and taunted him for having this year advocated what last year he opposed, although the circumstances, and not the principle, formed the ground of the Lord Chancellor's objections before; and although Lord Campbell himself had been the instigator of the generous proceeding at which he sought to sneer. With glorious sarcasm, however, Lord Lyndhurst assured the noble gentleman that there was this difference between the bill of the Lord Chancellor and the bill of Lord Campbell—that the former was English! There was great laughter, for nobody ever did hear "vulgar John" speak English yet.

A great contrast to Lord Campbell—we mean a lawyer, an orator, and a gentleman—has departed from among us, and Lord Wynford's is another of the remarkable deaths of our time. Lord Wynford was an upright judge, and a most distinguished public man, living full of fame, and dying full of years and honours. He had political foibles and attachments, but owned a noble personal independence, and has left the legacy of a great public reputation to the legal world. Mr. Baron Gurney, another good man, is also gone.

Mr. Ward having been disgraced at Oxford—and being decidedly of opinion that religion should be Roman Catholic, and that celibacy should be the duty of its priest, being moreover a professed clergyman himself—is about to enter the holy state of matrimony, and writes an ingenious letter to the Times in defence of his consistency. He has a perfect right to marry, but no right to defend what is so completely indefensible; we do not mean his marriage, but his consistency of course.

The estreating, last week, of the recognisances of Miss Osborne, in London; and this week, those of Miss Richardson, in the country—both ladies accused and committed for trial, for open theft, but let out upon bail)—whereby both parties have evaded the tribunal of justice, by which society might have tested their innocence or guilt, should not escape public notice. Wealth in a free country should not be open to the suspicion of enjoying the licence of so bare-faced an impunity. These occurrences make tenfold strength for the assertion that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Queen's Visit to Ireland.—The Dublin Evening Packet (the Castle organ) states positively that it is the inrention of her Majesty and her illustrious Consort to visit that country next summer, and adds:—"Extensive preparations are already in progress to give our august Sovereign such a reception as will prove the loyalty of her Irish subjects; and we can state on the best authority that the Dublin and Drogheda Railway Company have in progress of building a magnificent state carriage for her Majesty's accommodation. It will be of the most commodious structure, and the materials composing its decorations are of the most solid and costly description."

Shaftesbury Election.—Thomas Brinsley Sheridan, Esq., a Whig, has been returned for Shaftesbury, without opposition, in the room of Lord Howard.

Funeral of the late Mr. Baron Gurney.—The mortal remains of Mr. Baron Gurney were removed yesterday morning from his late residence in Lincoln's-inn-square, for interment in the burial ground of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, adjoining Old Pancras Church. The mournful cavalcade consisted of the hearse drawn by four horses, and five mourning coaches, each drawn by four horses, containing the relations and friends of the deceased judge.

Convert to the Church of Rome.—Mr. Meyrick, Scholar of Corpus Christi College, whose withdrawal from the University of Oxford followed immediately upon the condemnation of Mr. Ward, has joined the Church of Rome.

The Explosion at Blackwall.—A coroner's inquest was held on Thursday at the Royal Mason Tavern, to inquire into the circumstances attendant on the deaths of the three persons from the explosion of the steam-boiler at Blackwall, of which we give the particulars elsewhere. Very little information was, however, elicited as to the cause of the accident, and the inquiry was adjourned till Monday.

FOREIGN.

Death of the Landgrave Frederick of Hesse.—Intelligence has arrived from Germany of the demise of the Landgrave Frederick of Hesse, who expired on the 24th ult., after a short illness, on his estates of Panker, near Lutgenberg, at the age of seventy-four.

France.—The last accounts from Paris do not throw any further light upon the intentions of the Ministry relative to the conversion of the Five per Cents.; but a Cabinet Council was about to held upon the subject. There is nothing new in the Paris papers from Switzerland.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

The Queen held her first levee for the season on Wednesday. At ten minutes before two o'clock her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and attended by the Duchess of Buccleuch, Mistress of the Robes, the Lord and Lady in Waiting, the Lord Chamberlain, and other great officers of the household, left Buckingham Palace in four of the Royal state carriages, and proceeded, escorted by a detachment of the First Regiment of Life Guards, to St. James's Palace. Notwithstanding the severity of the weather, a considerable number of persons had assembled in the Park, who received her Majesty and her illustrious consort with loud and long-continued cheers. Her Majesty looked exceedingly well, and bowed repeatedly to the crowd as the Royal cortège passed along the line of road.

The Duke of Cambridge, the Foreign Ambassadors, Cabinet Ministers, Great Officers of the Household, and other distinguished individuals having the privilege of entrée, arrived at St. James's Palace between one and two o'clock in full state.

The principal company began to arrive shortly before two o'clock. The levee was most numerously attended. The Foreign Diplomatic Corps was first introduced, after which presentations to the Queen took place.

Sir Robert Peel and the Archbishop of Canterbury arrived at St. James's Palace at nearly the same moment as her Majesty.

After the Levee her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Royal suite, returned to Buckingham Palace.

The Court at Buckingham Palace.—The Queen and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service on Sunday morning in the private chapel, Buckingham Palace.

The Order of the Garter.—The garter, vacant by the death of the Marquis of Westminster, has been conferred on the Marquis of Camden. The late Marquis was a knight of that illustrious order. In notifying to the Marquis of Camden the intention of her Majesty to confer upon him the honour of the garter, it was intimated in the most gracious manner, on the part of her Majesty, that the distinction was conferred upon him by her Majesty, not solely on account of his own high character and station, but as a mark of respect for the character of his father, and as a recognition of the noble sacrifice which was made by him of pecuniary emolument.

Return of Sir William Follett.—The Attorney-General and Lady Follett, accompanied by their two eldest daughters, arrived in Park-street on Saturday night from Italy. The learned Attorney-General's health has greatly improved; indeed, we may say restored. He came from Italy by way of Marseilles and Paris.

The Late Lady Flora Hastings.—This lady died in 1839, without a will. A sum of money arising from estates in England to which this lady was entitled, has been realised by a recent sale, by which a sum of £30,000 becomes divisible between the deceased lady and her sisters, which has rendered a representation to her estate necessary. Her mother, the Dowager Marchioness, having survived her, but dying without administering, the administration of Lady Flora's effects was granted on the 4th instant to her sister, Lady Sophia, her share being upwards of £7000.

Serious Illness of the Grand Duchess of Saxe Weimar.—We regret to learn that information has been received from Germany of the dangerous illness of the Grand Duchess of Saxe Weimar, which has caused the most painful alarm to her family. The Grand Duchess is sister of the Emperor of Russia.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Paris papers state that two fresh comets have been discovered, in addition to the one of last year. The first on the 15th ult., at Parma, by Professor Colla, between 11 Eridan and 16 Atlas. The second was noticed at sea by a French Captain, on a voyage from Buenos Ayres, in lat. 24 S., long. 37 W., about 20 degrees above the horizon, to the west of Phœnix. It had a tail about 20 degrees in length in a direction opposite the sun, and was approaching the planet Jupiter at a velocity of 1½ degrees daily. As they neared the equator it sunk below the horizon.

The Cincinnati Gazette says, that a patent has been obtained for a machine to navigate the air. It consists of ten section balloons, a car, and a steam-engine. The engine, of one-and-a-half horse power, it is proposed to place in the upper story of the car appended to the balloons. The steering power is a rudder or oar connected with the bottom of the balloon. [The humbug of an aerial machine gulled a few simple people here about two years ago, and the mania seems now to have extended to the United States, but we guess that Brother Jonathan is hardly to be deceived.]

A vessel left the island of Ichaboe on the 1st of November, and this arrival confirms the account that the stock of guano remaining upon the island was all but exhausted. It was the opinion that the quantity left would hardly suffice to ballast the ships that are waiting for it.

The first import of American sugar took place on Sunday, when 12 hhds. of that article from Louisiana arrived at Liverpool. According to a Liverpool paper, this is only the beginning of a trade which will, in a few years, become a very considerable one, if the new sugar duties of Sir R. Peel should pass in their present form.

On Saturday last the election of Lord Rector of the Marischal College, Aberdeen, for the ensuing year, took place, when Mr. Sheriff Allison, of Lanarkshire, was chosen by a considerable majority of all the Nations over the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, M.P.

Accounts have been received from Algeria to the 25th Feb., when the greatest tranquillity reigned throughout the colony. Abd-el-Kader, who, since the peace of Morocco, had pitched his tents on the left bank of the Melonïa, on the 11th raised them, directing his course towards the east.

Another letter has been received from Dr. Wolff, dated Erzeroum, Jan. 17, in which he gives a lamentable picture of his sufferings and illness during his journey. The Doctor mentions seriatim, the persons murdered at Bokhara, thus:—1. Lieutanant Wyburd, of the Indian navy. 2. Lieutenant-Colonel Stoddart. 3. Captain Conolly. 4. One whom they call Freshaw. 5. Il Cavaliere Naselli. 6. A German. 7. Five Englishmen, outside Tchaar-Joo. 8. A Toorcoman who came to Bokhara to attempt the escape of Colonel Stoddart. 9. Ephraim, a Jew from Meshed, who was sent to Bokhara to make inquiries about Captain Conolly. 10. A Turkish officer.

The Forres Gazette mentions the death of a woman, named Priest, who had attained the extreme age of 102 years, and also that of Flora M'Donald, of Grangehill, a village in the neighbourhood of Forres, who had reached her womanhood, and could distinctly remember the battle of Culloden Muir, which was fought on the 16th of April, 1746; so that she must at least have been upwards of 120 years of age at the time of her death.

POLICE.

Committal for Burglary.—On Wednesday, at Marlborough-street, a shabbily-dressed man, between 30 and 40 years of age, was charged with burglariously breaking the shop-window of Mr. Charles Wright, of No. 11, Lisle-street, Leicester-square, watch and clock maker, and stealing a case containing three gold watches and seven silver watches, of the value of between £50 and £60.—The prosecutor stated that at about a quarter to eight o'clock the preceding evening, as he was sitting in his shop, he heard one of the panes of glass in the window break, and saw a man's hand inside, amongst the watches displayed for sale. He instantly rushed to the shop door, but could not get out, as it had been tied by some twisted string to the scraper. The case of watches produced he had seen safe in his show window but a minute before.—Police constable 163 of the C division stated that as he was on duty in Bear-street, Leicester-square, he saw the prisoner come running in the direction from Lisle-street, followed by a neighbour of the prosecutor, who had seen him thrust his hand through the window, calling "Stop thief." Witness joined in the pursuit, and, as the prisoner was passing a hoarding on the east side of the square, inclosing the site where Julien's hotel formerly stood, he saw him throw something into the excavations there. He continued in pursuit of the prisoner until he was stopped by some gentlemen in Green-street. His right hand was found to be cut very severely.—Police constables 163 and 81 of the C division proved finding the case and watches on the spot where the prisoner was seen to throw something from him.—The prisoner, who is a well-known thief, was fully committed.

A Child Charged with Stabbing.—At Bow-street, on Wednesday, James Hughes, aged 13 years, was charged with cutting and wounding Johanna Cotter, aged 16 years, by which her life is in danger. It appeared from the evidence, that the prisoner was in Church-lane, St. Giles's, on Saturday last with other boys admiring some pigeons, when the prosecutrix, who was going on an errand, stood to look on, and being repeatedly desired by the prisoner to go about her business, she refused, and he struck her in the abdomen with an open penknife. A surgeon's certificate was produced in which it was stated that the child was unable to attend from the dangerous character of the wound, and the prisoner was ordered to be remanded for a week.

OPENING OF HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

This magnificent Institution, without its equal in the world, with its treble attraction of fashion, lyrical drama, and of choregraphy, opens to-night. We are enabled, by attending the last full rehearsal, and by studying the score, to add to our account of the Ballet a foretaste of the new Opera, its dramatis personæ, and the performers that enact. The Opera is by Verdi, a young Italian composer, who has already for several years enjoyed surpassing fame, not only in his own country, but in Germany. The amateurs in other parts of the world who have never enjoyed but fragments of his works, have long been anxious to behold them with all the glorious pomp and circumstance of the Italian stage. This opportunity will be offered to the English public to night, in the opera of "Ernani." This opera has been chosen as affording an opportunity of displaying the twofold genius of the great tenor—Moriani; but Ernani, an exiled Prince, a chief of freebooters, and the doomed victim of an evil star, is far from being the only character in this opera which elicits the genius of the composer, and the dramatic power of the artist.

The following are the cast and plot of this highly-interesting lyrical drama:—

Dramatis Personæ.

Ernani (the Bandit)	Sig. Napoleone Moriani
Don Carlos (King of Spain)	Sig. Botelli
Don Ruy Gomez de Silva (Grandee of Spain)	Sig. Fornasari
Don Ricardo (Esquire to the King) ..	Sig. Giubilei
Jago (Esquire to Don Ruy)	Sig. Dia Fiori
Elvira	Signora Rita Borio
Giovanna	Signora Bellini

Chorus of Mountaineers, Rebels, Banditti, Knights, Ladies, &c.

The plot is taken from the "Romancero Espanol," a collection of Spanish tales which are filled with the spirit of gallantry, chivalry, and romance, that marked the middle era of that remarkable country. The heroine, Donna Sol, a celebrated beauty, is beloved at the same time by Don Carlos, subsequently the renowned Charles V., by Don Gomez de Silva, an old man of noble descent, and by the hero of the piece, Ernani, who conceals under that name, his real title of John of Aragon. Of these, Ernani is preferred, and the strongest interest is excited in the development of the drama, by the romantic obstacles that interfere to prevent his union with Donna Sol. Ernani is placed in the most difficult position, as he, though son and heir to the Duke of Legorbia and Cardona has been forced by the persecutions of his father's murderer, the King of Castile, to abandon his home, to fly to the mountains, and put himself at the head of a numerous banditti, with whom he ravages the country of his oppressor. In one of these excursions, his life has been saved by Donna Sol, who, unaware both of his noble rank and brigand state, gives her heart to the romantic cavalier whom accident thus brings her into contact with. Donna Sol, however, is engaged to marry Don Gomez de Silva, who not only claims her as as a suitor worthy of her hand, but as an uncle who has authority over her inclination. He removes to her castle, where the marriage is to be performed, but Ernani finds means to gain a secret entrance, and to renew there vows of love which he so often exchanged with the object of his heart. Don Carlos, however, who has accidentally seen and become desperately enamoured with Donna Sol, discovers the artifice of Ernani, and he, too, gains admission to the castle. He imitates Ernani's signal, and finds access to the chamber of the unsuspicious maid. There he throws himself on his knees, makes an avowal of his headstrong love; Donna Sol nobly resists; Don Carlos becomes violent, and, in his fury, seeks to carry her off by force; but Ernani arrives in time to save her. A violent contest takes place between the King and Ernani, the noise of which arouses Don Gomez de Silva. And he, rushing to the chamber of his ward and bride, finds the rivals engaged in fierce hostility—Ernani is deeply compromised; as he, the far-famed brigand, is amenable to the laws; but the King contrives to save him from the difficulty, by himself avowing his rank, and pretending that his real motive in entering the castle was to consult secretly with Don Gomez de Silva, as to the steps necessary to be taken to defeat a conspiracy against his throne and person, the clue of which he had just discovered. The King and Ernani retire unmolested, and the preparations for the marriage with Donna Sol go on undisturbed. But on the point of the celebration of the marriage, Ernani again gains admission in the disguise of a pilgrim, and again, owing to the impetuosity of his temper, is discovered. Donna Sol still remains true to her beloved, she flies to Ernani's arms, and proclaims her eternal attachment for him. Don Gomez, furious at this avowal, orders Ernani to be seized, and condemns him to death. Ernani, however, makes Don Gomez acquainted with the criminal intention of Don Carlos. He is pardoned, and both unite in a counter conspiracy against the King, on the strange condition, that Ernani should yield up his life whenever it be demanded by the trumpet-blast of Don Gomez. Don Gomez and Ernani then meet the other persons engaged in the conspiracy against Don Carlos: they are discovered, and ordered for execution. But the monarch, reminded by seeing the statue of one of his great predecessors, that clemency is one of the brightest of royal prerogatives, forgives the conspirators, and on discovering the high birth of Ernani, approves of his marriage with Donna Sol, and himself joins the hands of the impatient lovers. Alas, the jealousy of Don Gomez revives in all its intensity. Confident in the Castilian honour of the devoted Ernani, he recalls the promise made in the chamber of Donna Sol. He sounds the fatal blast demanding his life, and Ernani, though in possession of all that he valued in this world, in a spirit of romantic attachment to his word, draws forth his sword, and, rushing upon it, renders up his life. These are the materials out of which M. Victor Hugo has constructed his celebrated romantic drama, and from which the opera of Signor Verdi has been taken. From the very first bars of this opera, you feel the power the composer possesses of evoking and describing the deepest sensations of the human breast. There is a massive grandeur in the introduction, followed almost immediately by a spirited chorus, which far surpasses the old form of an overture. Throughout this lyrical composition, the author has principally relied for effect on dramatic situations, combined with concerted pieces. This does not preclude snatches of bewitching melody, which, from time to time, relieve the ear from the pressure of the combined power of voices, whilst each principal singer has assigned to him more than one solo, in which to display the range, the depth, and the fascinating sleights of his voice. Moriani, in the part of Ernani, comes forth a totally new singer from what we beheld him last year; his health is restored, his voice no longer labours, and, no longer fettered by the fear of missing his intonations, he revels in the full display of his unparalleled lyrical genius. One of the most delightful effects produced by his voice, is that it is of such a peculiar searching timbre, that without any visible increase of effort, his high bell-like notes soar above the harmonious tumult of the chorus. Such an effect is peculiarly lyrical, the distinction betwixt lyrical music and the instrumental being that the former possesses infinitely more individuality, and that the hero should, as much as possible, remain visible to the eye, like a great general in the picture of a battle. This is a difficulty which Rubini in his "Dolce niente far" never attempted to surmount, and it is one in which all the tenors we have heard since the days of Trammezani have always failed. Madame Rita Borio, in the part of the heroine, makes her first appearance on the Anglo-Italian stage. Unlike her fair predecessors, her appearance has not been heralded by the encomiums of the press. She is a lady with good eyes, good teeth, young, active, of middle stature, somewhat inclined to embonpoint. From the very fact of the silence which has preceded to the last moment her first appearance, we are inclined to think she will meet with a favourable reception from the audience of Her Majesty's Theatre, in matters of pure recreation nothing being so gratifying as an agreeable surprise. Although not possessing a stage figure, she is full of energy, and of dramatic feeling and action. Her voice is remarkably high and acute in its tones, but totally devoid of shrillness, and from the highest note of her range she descends, with remarkable ease, down to the lowest notes of her voice, which, from the effect of the sudden contrast of the two extremes, tell with more effect upon the ear. Her sustained notes she prolongs with wonderful ease, whatever are the different chords struck upon by her colleagues. In parts that do not require energy there is great tenderness and sweetness in her notes, and her embellishments are full of playfulness, and so rapid as not to be detached from the subject-matter—a great desideratum as regards all fiorituri. Signor Botelli is another unsung hero of the Italian stage, at least on this side of the Channel, for both himself and Signora Rita Borio have had their full tribute of ovations abroad in the theatres of more than one capital. Signor Botelli is a remarkably handsome man. He is young, rather above the middle height, with aquiline features, good eyes, and an expressive mouth—in fact it is remarkable that he resembles the pictures of Velasquez of some of the princes of the family of the hero whom he represents in this opera. His voice is that of a baritone, and of a pure bell like tone, although slightly veiled, and it ascends to notes unusually high for such a description of voice. The only defect we could detect was some difficulty, or rather uncertainty, of intonation in passing from the lower to the upper notes of his register. With an external appearance so prepossessing, his remarkably energetic and truly dramatic action exerts the greatest effect, and would, in all probability, cover this minor defect, supposing it is really found to exist, on the night of performance. Our old favourite, still so young a basso, Fornasari, performs the part of Don Ruy Gomez de Silva, "over whose locks time has snowed, without chilling the ardent fire of his heart." Here Fornasari has the opportunity of displaying, not only the magnificent deep notes of his voice, but of showing his power of rendering the struggle of inward emotions, of which he gave us the first pathetic instance in the part of the agonised father of "Linda di Chamounix." At the end of the first act, where Don Carlos, Ernani, and Ruy Gomez successively meet, all three excited by the passions of love and revenge, a struggle for supremacy of dramatic talent naturally arises betwixt Moriani, Fornasari, and Botelli, who, in this respect, have not their superiors, if any equals, but Lablache, on the stage of any country. This contest exerts a thrilling effect where Elvira joins her voice in terror, and the attendants of the King pouring in, with the knights and ladies that form the chorus, a concerted piece is executed, which forms one of the finest finales we have heard for many years. Those who wish to enjoy this opera to the full, should be present from the first: at the very beginning is a cavatina, sung by Moriani—one of the brightest gems of the Opera.

The following is the description of the pas and dramatis personæ of the ballet of "Eoline":—

Eoline, La Dryade—Mdlle. Lucile Grahn.
Rubezhal, the Gnome—Perrot.
Edgar, betrothed to Eoline—Toussaint.
The Duke, brother to Eoline—Gosselin.
Two Woodcutters—Venafra and Gouriet.

In the course of the ballet the following dances:—
The Pas Silicienne—By the Coryphées of the Corps de Ballet.
The Pas de la Fiancé—By Mdlle. Lucile Grahn and M. Toussaint.
The Pas de Cinq, composed by M. Gosselin—By Mdlle. Louise Weiss, Demelise, Casson, Mouceiet, and Ferdinand.
Mazourka d'Extase—Mdlle. Lucile Grahn and M. Perrot.
Grand Pas de Dryades—Mdlle. Lucile Grahn and the whole Corps de Ballet.

The music is by Pugin, the choregraphic arrangements by Perrot, the scenery by Marshall and others. The plot is from a German legend, entitled "Libussa of Musœus," which has been recently admirably translated into English, by Mr. John Oxenford; and the music, possessing, like that of "Giselle," the most charming contrasts of liveliness and of pensive melancholy, is admirably adapted to the wild fantastic character of the legend. It turns upon the existence of an ærial being, half mortal, half spirit, the fruit of an union between a Silesian prince and a Dryad—the existence of the lovely girl, who has lost both her parents, being attached to that of an oak tree, which rears its lofty head in her paternal domain. The charms of Eoline bring to her castle many a claimant for her hand; but a young nobleman (Count Edgar) is the favoured suitor, and all is prepared for their nuptials; but Rubezahl, the Prince of the Gnomes, loves the fair Dryad, and prepares a dread vengeance for the daring mortal who baffles his love. The two different natures are united in Eoline, the impalpable being of the genii of the woods, and the mortal nature produces strange contrasts in her bearing; and if, while in the presence of Edgar the tender dignified spirit of the woman alone displays itself, when he is absent, and the moon sheds abroad her silver light, the fantastic form of the Dryad flits through the wood, and floats on the lake, giving rise to strange reports and tales of the spirit-haunted castle. Thus, while enjoying the presence of her beloved, and receiving the congratulations of her friends and relations, a stranger figure intrudes upon the happy meeting. He fills the minds of all with awe; but, approaching Eoline, and fascinating her by his strange basilisk gaze, he invites her to dance; a strange and wild mazurka succeeds; and Eoline, fascinated and overcome, finally falls in a swoon at the feet of the stranger, who in an instant disappears from the sight, but in another moment his demon form again appears, and he exults in the consternation of his wretched rival. Eoline recovers from her terror. In another scene you see her endeavour to forget, in the presence of Edgar, the strange being whose remembrance troubled her repose; but when Edgar leaves her, the Gnome again appears; Eoline is a second time about to succumb to his mysterious influence, but suddenly the moon again sheds her light through the window of the room. Her mysterious light produces the metamorphose of Eoline; her spirit, unchained from earthly bonds, escapes the embrace of the Gnome, and she disappears. Other no less interesting scenes succeed, but we have filled our allotted space, and we have hastily sketched sufficient to convey a general notion of Perrot's clever adaptation of the interesting legend to the graceful purposes of choregraphy.

MORIANI.

This celebrated artist was born at Florence, in 1809. His family destined him for the profession of the law, and he was sent at an early age to the University of Pisa, to pursue his preparatory studies. Moriani did not relish the career chosen by his friends, and we do not hear that he made any great progress in the Italian Coke upon Littleton; nor do we, at the same time, learn that he altogether abandoned black letter to indulge in those harmonious combinations which, in his native country, form the common property of prince and peasant. The master passion, however, broke forth at last, and on hearing the celebrated singer of those days—Bianchi—Melody claimed him as her own, and he gave up the pursuit of the law to embrace that profession in which he has now distanced all competitors. Moriani placed himself under the care of the Maestro Ruga, who, surprised by the beauty and richness of his voice, and the originality of his genius, took the utmost care of his pupil, and laid the foundation of that deep scientific knowledge, without the possession of which a great singer cannot exist. Our hero gave himself up heart and soul to this new passion, and his progress was as rapid as the development of his natural powers was extraordinary.

Moriani's first appearance in public was at Milan, in the concert room of the Scala; and there, perhaps, on one of the most critical audiences in the world, he made a profound impression, and many an amateur then predicted his future extraordinary career. He was soon after regularly engaged at the Opera of Pavia, and ventured a first appearance in Pacini's opera, "Gli Arabi nelle Galie." His fame soon spread through every part of Italy, and we hear of his appearance at Padua, Cremona, Venice, and Genoa, and at the two crowning operas of San Carlos and La Scala. From thence his name became renowned all over Europe, and he achieved successive triumphs at Vienna, Dresden, Berlin, &c. In fact, Moriani's new style created quite a revolution in the musical world. Instead of the violent contortions in which the great artists hitherto indulged for the purpose of giving effect to impassioned passages, he adopted a calm and temperate manner, and delivered such scenes with a true pathetic tenderness, inspired by nature. He applied to singing the advice of the great master of tragic art to the players, and in the very whirlwind of lyrical passion begat a temperance that gave it calmness. Even the Germans, predisposed against the Italian methode as they are, were enthusiastic in Moriani's favour; and we find in their early critiques on him the preference given above Rubini, whose style until then was deemed perfection.

The great Impressario Lanari, in whose hands so many Italian theatres were placed, secured the services of our hero, and full houses were his reward wherever he presented him. The manager reaped a golden harvest, while the artist gained a celebrity that has since raised him to the highest pinnacle of fame. The composers of the day were too glad to profit by the brilliant qualities of his voice and acting, and the following operas were composed for him:—At Turin, "Eran due or sou tre," by Luigi Ricci; at Parma, "Il Cid," by Savi; at Genoa, the "Danao," by Persiani; at Naples, "Emma di Resburgo," by Madame Uccelli, and the "Rinnegata," by Persiani; at Venice, "Rosmunda di Ravenna," by Lillo; the "Illustri Rivali," by Mercadante; Maria di Rudens," by Donnizetti; the "Sposa di Messina," by Vaccaj; and the "Duca d'Alba," by Pacini. At Trieste, "Enrico II.," by Niccolai; at Milan, "Giovanna di Napoli," by Coccia; and "Ildegonda," by Solera; at Bologna, "Antonio Foscarini," by Coen-Mery; at Reggio, "La Dirce," by Peri; at Vienna, "Linda di Chamounix," by Donizetti; at Florence, "Rolla," by Frederick Ricci.

We also learn that our artist has sung at the Courts of Austria, Prussia, Saxony, Holland, Parma, and Tuscany, and that he was not only received most graciously by their respective sovereigns, but that he was favoured with several costly presents, and was honoured specially by the Emperor of Austria and the Grand Duke of Tuscany with the appointment of Cantante di Camera.

The learned musical societies of Europe have shown their appreciation of this great master's talents, by constituting him a member at the following places:—Professors' College at Florence, the Ancient Academy of St. Cecilia at Rome, the Conservatorio at Bologna, the National College of Music at Perth, the Philharmonic Society at Florence, the Apollinea at Venice, the Filocerei at Verona, the Musical Society of Ferrara, the Academy at Turin, and the Philharmonic Society at Rome.

Moriani's fame had reached, long since, Her Majesty's Theatre, but his numerous engagements prevented our spirited manager's exertions to secure him until last year. We all recollect the triumphant début that he made in Edgardo, in the "Lucia di Lammermoor." He was then declared to be the first tenor in the world, and even in those scenes where the recollection of

SIGNOR MORIANI.

Rubini had left so powerful an impression, he was admitted to have surpassed that distinguished artist. Rubini's performance was the triumph of science, but Moriani's was the combination of nature with the exquisite resources of the most delicate art. A critic of that day speaking of his first performance, said, "The beautiful duet of 'Sulla Tromba,' afforded a fit opportunity of displaying his wonderful powers." From the deepest and most searching tones he feathers his voice up to the most exquisitely searching notes, dying away in a whisper. In the scene where he asks, "Is this your signature?" the agitation of his feelings was expressed in a whisper, but it was melodious beyond idea, and reached every part of the house. Then followed the withering curse in which indignation, contempt, and despair appeared combined and concentrated. The most extraordinary part of the whole performance occurs when he stabs himself. This baffles description—his voice appears broken with each gush of his life's blood—then the "ruling passion of his heart overcomes the writhing of his pain," &c. The same critic observes that, "Moriani's acting and singing must be identified—there is no separating one excellence from the other, so blended are their effects."

Moriani has just returned from Madrid, where he again triumphed over the recollections left by any preceding artist. He made his first appearance in the opera of "Lucrezia Borgia," and at once became the idol of the people. The theatre was crowded to overflowing every night that he appeared; and offers so tempting were held out by the Ayuntamiento and Impressario of Madrid, that, if he were not full of honour and determined to fulfil his engagements with Her Majesty's Theatre, he could not have resisted them. But Moriani is a man of truth; and, to the delight of every lover of the lyrical and dramatic art, we have him again amongst us. We can add that Moriani's voice has improved in power and energy; that his taste is, if possible, more refined; that his confidence in his own resources is increased; and that the specimens he has given of his wonderful powers in the rehearsals of "Ernani" have realised all that the warmest hopes of his anxious admirers could desire.

SIGNOR PERROT.

MADEMOISELLE LUCILE GRAHN.

It was in July, 1838, in the absence of Taglioni and Fanny Elssler, that the director of the Grand Opera, at Paris, permitted the début of a young Swedish dancer of whom report spoke favourably. Permitted, we say, for such is the jealousy of the other artists, and such the intrigues that beset the direction, it is almost impossible to procure a début for any person whose success might interfere with the established fame of the divinities of the dance.

Lucile Grahn appeared, and all judges instantly determined that she was only fit successor to Taglioni whose retreat from the stage was more than once threatened. Her youth and beauty were set off by the simplicity and elegance of her costume; she wore a plain white dress with short sleeves, and for ornament merely a ceinture and armlet of gold; her head-dress was a plain garland of roses, and her beautiful auburn hair flowed in graceful curls on her well-formed shoulders. In this simple costume she was said to resemble one of the wild nymphs, spoken of in German legends, who enchant all beholders, and who, once seen, can never be forgotten. Her style of dancing was in accordance with the elegance of her person; it was full of grace, buoyant and elastic, and avoiding all the forced exertions of other artists, who seem to think the ballet is a school of gymnastics and not of grace. After having repeated the same pas de deux with Mabille, the new debutanté withdrew, without having appeared in any regular character. It was said that she had hurt her knee; but probably intrigue had more to do with her retirement.

Lucile Grahn quitted Paris, and soon after, a report of her death was spread, to the deep regret of her numerous worshippers, but, happily, this news was not true, and we next heard of her being at St. Petersburgh, sweeping all competition before her, and playing all Taglioni's characters in the most delightful style. Her fame once established, her re-appearance at the Academie Royale was loudly called for by the subscribers, and the director, though threatened and attacked at every side, announced her entrance as the Sylphide, on the 16th of July, 1839. To attempt the Sylphide, after the failure of so many dancers who in vain tried to seize the sceptre abandoned by Taglioni, was reckoned the height of presumption, and all but the fervent admirers of Mdlle. Grahn anticipated a failure. But what was their astonishment to see Lucile coming on aerial as Taglioni herself, personating the charming character with a delicacy and lightness scarcely inferior to the sublime creation of that mistress of the art. When about to undertake some of those difficult pas in which Taglioni distanced all rivals, particularly one in the second act, a breathless silence prevailed—all eyes were bent on the stage—all thoughts in the difficulty of the undertaking, but great was the triumph and tumultuous was the applause when the difficulties were conquered, and the charming Sylphide was restored to the public, as worthy of being loved and adored, as ever was the original. The aged Vestris who was standing at the side scene, took her in his arms as she came off, exclaiming "you are an Angel," and kissing her forehead. It was on this occasion that the silence of the Claque, gave indisputable evidence of the party that was formed against the new Sylphide. Not one round was heard from that professional body, but the audience, indignant, nobly took up her cause, and the most enthusiastic applause followed every step. In short a more triumphant appearance was never made in the Rue Lepelletier.

The success of Mdlle. Grahn created nearly a revolution at the Academie. Fanny Elssler, who fancied that she herself had appropriated the Sylphide was in despair; in her fury she tore her engagement in a hundred pieces, and sent them in an envelope to the manager; and it was highly amusing to see him collecting the torn pieces, and endeavouring to make out the contents of the writing, and the meaning of the capricious lady. The newspapers were enchanted; and we find, on reference to all the papers of the day, that they were unanimous in denoting her as the nearest approach to perfection, and the only worthy successor of the divine Taglioni. They distinguished her not for the elegance and lightness of her style, but for the modesty and chasteness of her movements, those grand characteristics of Taglioni, and we are glad to say that Mdlle. Grahn has, up to the present hour, persevered in that same pure and classic style.

Lucile Grahn is of gentle blood, and that may account for the natural good taste that distinguishes her. She is the grand-daughter of the Count Stampe Minister of Christian, King of Denmark, who, pursued by the combined vengeance of the Queen and her physician, Count Struensee, was disgraced after having vainly tried to rescue his royal master from the moral and physical debasement in which he was held by the Queen and her creature. The family of the Count were reduced after his disgrace, and thus his granddaughter was compelled to seek the stage as a profession. She appeared at the Theatre Royal of Copenhagen at the early age of thirteen, in the part of Marguerite in Goethe's well-known "Faust." Her début was most successful, but her person not being then developed, stage artifices were resorted to, to give her height, and it was with astonishment that the public saw on the following Sunday, at the cathedral, the little fragile personage who had delighted them as Marguerite a few evenings previously.

Mdlle. Grahn is now twenty-one years of age, in the bloom of youth and beauty; her shape is parfection, combining lightness and delicacy with that full developement necessary to produce effect. Her head is truly classical in form, her eyes are blue, full of softness and intelligence, and her auburn hair completes the picture of the wood nymph.

Next week, we shall give a brief account of Perrot, whose portrait here given, will be at once recognised by its fidelity.

OFFICES OF THE BOARD OF TRADE, WHITEHALL.

OFFICES OF THE BOARD OF TRADE, WHITEHALL.

In consequence of the great increase of the business of the Board of Trade, and more especially since the establishment of the Railway Board, under the Act passed in the last Session of Parliament, it has been resolved to provide increased accommodations, by completing the design of the late Sir John Soane, only in part erected under his superintendence in 1823-24. For this purpose, the works have already been commenced in the rear of the ancient building next Whitehall, with modern alterations, which will shortly be removed, and its place occupied by the wing requisite to perfect Sir John Soane's design: when complete, the entire pile will present the splendid Roman Corinthian façade shown in our illustration. We are aware that its architectural propriety has been much questioned; but Mr. Britton states that the portion already built has been considerably varied from the architect's design. "Instead of detached columns in front, three-quarter columns are used; and, instead of the order of the little Temple of Tivoli being the prototype, that of the three columns in the Campo Vaccino, at Rome, is followed. Thus, a disproportionate and imperfect character prevails."

The above offices occupy the site of the Cockpit, which we learn from Dodsley, prevailed in his day (1761). "The Cockpit," he says, "opposite to the Privy Garden, is esteemed a part of the ancient Palace of Whitehall, and retains its ancient name, though converted to very different uses from that of a Cockpit."

FIRE AT EAST GREENWICH.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT EAST GREENWICH.

About eight o'clock, on Sunday evening, the extensive premises belonging to Messrs. Charles, Henry, and George Enderby, patent rope, twine, and canvass manufacturers, at East Greenwich, were discovered to be on fire. The flames were first observed from without, in the rope-walk at the rear of the factory, which was a strong brick building of about 140 feet long by 40 feet deep. It was not till day-break on Monday morning that the firemen could extinguish the flames, when a scene of the utmost desolation presented itself. Of the main factory, which faced the Thames, and was the most prominent object on that bank of the river between Greenwich Hospital and Woolwich, nothing remained but its lofty walls, which in the course of the day were blown down with tremendous force by the wind. The machinery t contained was most extensive, and its immense value can be better judged from the fact that its completion has occupied a space of ten years. The whole of it was destroyed. It is proved that flames were first seen raging in the store-room in the rope-manufactory, which was detached from the main building, where there had not been a light for several weeks.

There was a considerable quantity of manufactured goods deposited there, which were seen perfectly safe a few hours before the outbreak. The supposition is, therefore, that the fire either arose rom spontaneous combustion, or was wilfully caused by some incendiary. The factory, or waterside premises, containing joiners' workshops, spinning, card, and loom rooms, is totally destroyed. The hemp and spinning-rooms over the engine and boiler-house are burned out, and the iron roof has fallen in. The engine room beneath is considerably damaged. The weaving workshops, fronting the factory, are greatly damaged; the roof has been partly demolished by the falling of the opposite walls. They contained twelve weaving looms, worked by machinery, which are all damaged. The dwelling-house of Mr. Enderby, on the north side of the factory, is much damaged by fire, and most of the furniture and its contents destroyed; as are also the stores at the back, and part of the rope manufactory. The rope gallery, adjoining the manufactory, is a quarter of a mile in length; about 100 feet is gone, and but for the firemen cutting off the communication, the whole would have been levelled to the ground. Unhappily, upwards of 250 workmen are thrown out of employment by this calamitous event.

The exertions made by the military, parochial, and other authorities, as well as by the neighbours and workpeople, during the conflagration, were very efficient in saving much valuable property. The loss to the worthy proprietors, we are happy to add, is well covered by insurances.

HOPES.

BY FREDERICA BREMER.

TRANSLATED BY LEWIS FILMORE.

THE path of life is rough and stony and hard to tread; but though my mind was never one of the best formed for struggle, nor my frame endowed with the strength that is so needed for toil, one way I have always had of journeying along the difficult road without, at least, utter weariness. I HOPED! hoped from day to day; at Morning of the Eve, and in Twilight for the Dawn; I HOPED in Autumn of the Spring, and in Spring of Autumn; in the evil of this year I HOPED for the good of the next: and thus in mere HOPES had passed nearly thirty years of my earthly pilgrimage, only to find myself destitute of all save what that faculty of Hoping could furnish me! Figuratively speaking, I might say that at the journey's end I was wholly barefoot! It may be conceived, then, that I felt freer and more at my ease in the open air than in the gay saloon; there I felt within me a restless desire to depart and go my way; far more afflicting was it to me that to the Hut of Misery I could carry nothing but kindly words for its consolation!

Myself I consoled—as have thousands before me—with the hopeful thought that Fortune stands upon a rolling wheel, and with the philosophical observation "with time comes change."

I was living as the poor curate of a parish priest, with slender stipend and still more slender fare, mentally and morally growing mouldy in the society of the ill-tempered housekeeper of a fuddling pastor, a silly youth, his son and the daughter of the house, who, with high shoulders and awkward feet, spent her time from morning till night in calls and visits;—I was living thus, I repeat, with little peace and no satisfaction, when one of my acquaintance apprized me by letter that an uncle of mine, whom I had never seen, a merchant in Stockholm, was at the point of death, and that, in an access of family affection, he had inquired after his "thriftless fool of a nephew."

Upon a peculiarly hard trotting and exceedingly stiff-necked cart-horse, with a small bundle of effects, and a large stock of Hopes, that nephew departed on the reception of the news, and, jolting over hill and dale, arrived at last in the city.

At the inn where I alighted I ordered a slight—only a very slight—breakfast; it was a mere nothing of a meal indeed—a slice of bread and butter, and a couple of eggs.

The host and a thickset man were walking up and down the room conversing.

"Nay," said the thickset man, "I must repeat it, our friend, the wholesale dealer—the merchant P., I mean—who died the day before yesterday, was a right good fellow."

"Ha! ha!" thought I, "a right good fellow! then to a certainty he was rich! Here, friend (to the waiter), couldn't you bring a slice of beef, or something more solid than this? Or a bowl of soup is not to be despised—let me have that—and be quick with it!"

"Yes!" said mine host, "it is evident, a good fellow and a jolly he must have been. Only think—thirty thousand thalers banko! Not a man in the whole city could have dreamed of it: Thirty thousand!"

"Thirty thousand!" I repeated, with a joyful heart, "Thirty thousand! Here! waiter! quick! bring me thirty tho——No! fetch me a banko——No! pshaw! bring me a bottle of wine, I say!" And every pulse within me was beating at the rate of—thirty thousand thalers!

"Yes!" continued the thickset man, "such a smash has not been seen in Stockholm for many a day. You may take my word for the fact that there are nine hundred thalers down among his debts to the butcher alone for steaks and cutlets, and five thousand more for champagne! A good fellow lived and died our merchant, P. His creditors were standing round his house this morning, with their mouths open—a sight to behold! All the goods in the house are scarcely worth twopence; the entire assets are nothing but a case of empty bottles and an old cloak!"

"O——h!" said I, "this rather alters the case. Waiter! here! take away the soup, and the meat, and the wine; and observe that I have not touched one of them; how should I indeed? Since I woke this morning I have done nothing but eat (it was a frightful falsehood); and I have just thought there is no occasion to spend money on a meal so useless."

"But you ordered them!" said the astonished waiter.

"My friend," I replied, scratching my head, a very common expedient in cases of puzzling difficulty, "my friend, it was a mistake for which I am sorry I am unable to atone; it is no fault of mine that a rich heir for whom I ordered the breakfast has, in the twinkling of an eye, become poor—yes poorer than many a poor devil besides, inasmuch as more than half his future HOPES have vanished at the same time. But, though his altered circumstances as you may easily conceive, prevent him paying for the good breakfast, they will not hinder him from settling for the bad one—there is for the two eggs I have eaten, and something for yourself besides. Some business to which I must attend, compels me to depart.

By means of this logic and a groschen, I got rid, though with a sorrowing heart and yearning stomach, of the costly breakfast, and left the house. With my small bundle in my hand, I wandered up and down the streets of the City, looking for a suitable lodging, thinking as I searched, where I should get the money to pay for it when discovered.

In consequence of the terrible collision that had just occurred between HOPE and reality, I felt a slight nervous headache; but during my walk I encountered a gentleman whom I had known at the University of Upsala; he was stepping out of a splendid carriage, and his breast was covered with stars and orders. But his complexion was pale and sallow, his brow was deeply wrinkled and wore a confirmed expression of ill-temper and discontent. As I recognised the young count, walking as if bent by the weight of years and oppressed with a weariness and disgust of life, I erected my head with pride, drew in a deep breath of the free air, which luckily (or unluckily) at this particular spot was redolent of fried sausages, and went my way rejoicing in my poverty and an honest heart.

In a remote street I at last found a small room, that better suited my present dreary prospects, than the bright and brilliant hopes I had nourished but two hours before.

I had obtained permission to pass the Winter in Stockholm, and had thought to spend it very differently than at present seemed probable. But what was to be done? To let spirits and courage sink was the very worst thing I could do; to fold my hands on my breast and sit looking idly up to Heaven, was not much better; the sun breaks forth when one least expects it, thought I, as I watched the heavy clouds of Autumn gather and descend over the crowded city. I resolved to use every exertion to obtain a subsistence with a somewhat more comfortable prospect for the future, than the pitiful household of Pastor G——, opened to me, and, in the meantime, by copying manuscripts, the sad resource of a destitute condition, to earn my daily bread.

Thus I passed my days in the fruitless task of trying to find ears that were not deaf; in the heart-sickening labour of writing out clearly the empty productions of empty heads, with ever decreasing means and sinking Hopes, till the evening, whose date I afterwards marked in my calendar with a white stone.

My landlord had just left me with the friendly warning, that I must pay my first quarter's rent the next morning, unless I preferred (the politeness I thought was perfectly French), to make a second voyage of discovery, bundle in hand, about the streets of the Capital.

A bitterly cold November evening had reached its eighth hour, when, on my return from a visit to a sick man, for whom, with some lack of prudence perhaps, I had quite emptied my purse, I was received with this agreeable greeting.

I snuffed my dim candle with my fingers, and looked round my ill-lighted little chamber; poor as it was, unless I had the secret of the Alchemists and forthwith turned goldmaker, I could no longer have the use of it.

"Yet Diogenes was worse lodged," I sighed with a feeling of resignation, as I moved my rickety table from the window, through which the wind and rain both entered, seemingly without any dispute as to precedence; as I did so, my eye fell on a large, brightly blazing fire in the kitchen of the house opposite, gleaming with a cheerfulness that, in comparison with my humble apartment, in which the chimney was the very darkest corner, appeared perfectly tantalising. "Cooks and turnspits have a happy lot among the toiling children of mortality" I thought, as I gazed with an inward pleasure on the flickering play of the flames, and the stout, well fed woman, who, amid pans and pots, stood in the centre of the stream of light, wielding the tongs, majestically, as though she were the Queen of that glowing realm.

A story higher in the same house, I had a view through a window, hung with no envious curtain, into a brilliantly lighted room, in which a numerous family was assembled round a tea-table, covered with cups, and plates, and cake-baskets.

My frame was benumbed with cold and wet. Of the aching void within, I will here say nothing; but—Ah! Heaven! (I thought) if the elegant girl, who is now reaching a cup of the social nectar and the plate of sweet biscuits to that fat gentleman on the sofa, who can scarcely move for satiety—if she would but stretch her hand something farther this way, and could—I would give it a thousand kisses. Vain wish! Ah! the fat gentleman takes the cup—he dips and dips his biscuit in it so deliberately—it is a sight to weep at. Now he is caressing the beautiful creature—I wonder whether he is her papa or an uncle—or perhaps—ah! the unworthy mortal!—but no, he is her elder by at least forty years! No! that must he his wife—that elderly lady sitting beside him on the sofa—she is asking the young lady for a muffin—the old dame appears wonderfully dignified——but to whom is my fair one crossing now? I cannot see the person—one ear and part of a shoulder is all that comes beyond the window-frame. That the honourable individual should turn his back to me I cannot quite blame him for, but that he should keep that beautiful girl standing a quarter of an hour inviting him to help himself, that does enrage me—it must be a woman—no man could be so unpolite to so angelic a creature! But—or—now he starts and seizes the cup—and now—alas! it is a man's hand that plunges into the biscuit tray!—the barbarian!—and how he clutches them, the awkward wretch!—it is easy to see that he is her brother! But perhaps he was hungry, poor lad! Now two lovely children enter the circle—they are very like the elder sister. I should be surprised if the gentleman with the one ear there has left anything for them. That dear girl again! how she caresses and kisses the little ones, and gives them all the cakes that have escaped the long fingers of that ogre of a brother! And now, the sweet creature, she has no more left for herself than I have—the smell of them excepted!

But what a stir in the room all at once! The old gentleman has actually got up from the sofa; the person with one ear rushes forward, stumbles (the dromedary) against the young lady, who falls against the edge of the tea-table, so that the elderly matron, in rising, is thrust back again on the sofa. The children dance and clap their hands—the door flies open—a young officer enters—the beautiful girl throws herself into his arms——Ah! so! Aha! Yes! I understand it all!——

I shut my window with a crash that made it rattle again, and sat down, soaked with rain and shivering with cold, upon a stool.

What business had I at the window? This is all one gets by curiosity.

This family had arrived from the country about eight days previously, and taken possession of the comfortable dwelling on the opposite side of the street; but it had never occurred to me to inquire either who they were or to what place they belonged. What business had I to pry, in this unpermitted fashion, into the life of their domestic circle? What interest could it have for me? I was ill-tempered, displeased with myself—perhaps somewhat heart-sore—but no matter; true to my resolution never to abandon myself to the influence of gloomy reflections when they could avail nothing, I took up my pen, and with fingers numbed with cold, began, in order to chase away my vexation, to write a sketch of—Domestic Happiness!—a happiness I had never enjoyed. As for the rest, I philosophised, while I blew my frozen fingers, thus:—

"Am I, then, the first who has sought in the domain of fancy that warmth which the hard cold world of actuality has denied him? Six thalers for a cord of pine wood! a sum thou canst not earn this side of December! I will write, and in fancy at least be warm!"

"Happy, thrice happy, is the family in whose little close-drawn circle no heart suffers alone, or is alone rejoiced! in which beams no glance, no smile, that is not reflected back, and in which all are daily telling each other—not in words alone, but by actions—thy sorrow, thy peace, thy happiness—are they not mine also?"

* * * * * * *

"Beautiful, beautiful, is the still and peaceful dwelling beneath whose shelter the weary pilgrim of the road of life findeth his repose; that draws together round its cheerful hearth the grey-haired and staff-supported grandsire; the father, strong in the fulness of life; his gentle partner, and their happy children, who laugh and frolic around them in their earthly paradise, and who, after a day, brought to a close amid the sports of innocence, with the thankful words of the evening prayer yet playing round their smiling lips, sink to rest on their parent's bosom, while the soft voice of their mother, in the tones of the cradle-song, tell them how around their couch

The circling angels stand, and keep Watch o'er the bed where thou dost sleep!"

I here ceased writing for a moment, for I felt something like tear-drops filling my eyes, so that I could not see altogether clearly.

"And how many," I thought, as my reflections, even against my will, took a melancholy direction—"how many a one, to his sorrow, is doomed never to possess that greatest of earthly blessings—domestic happiness!"

For a moment I contemplated myself in the only mirror my chamber possessed—that of TRUTH—and with a heavy heart began to write again. "Unhappy may that forsaken one indeed be called, who, in those hours of life that are loaded with pain and affliction (and they come on us so often), is pressed to no fond, devoted heart; whose sighs none repeat—whose silent sorrows no one soothes with an "I understand thee! I sorrow with thee!"

"He is desponding, and no one cheers him; he weeps, and none see his tears—none will see them; he goes forth, and no one follows him; he comes, and there is none to meet him; he sleeps, and no one watches over him—he is ALONE! Oh! is he not wretched? Why does he not die? Alas, who would lament him? And how cold is that grave on which there falls not from the eye of love, one gentle tear!"

"He is alone in the winter's night of the world; for him the earth hath no flowers, and the stars of Heaven for him burn faint and dimly. Why wanders he up and down?—the lonely one, wherefore tarrieth he here? Why doth he not fly, the shadow that he is, to the world of shades? Alas! yet and still, and ever doth he HOPE! he is a man bereft of all, who beggeth for happiness as for an alms, and waiteth even at the eleventh hour, trusting that some merciful hand will be yet reached forth, and give it him."

"Fain, fain would he pluck one blossom of the earth, to wear it at his heart, that he may not, so utterly alone, go down into the silence of the grave."

It was my own condition I had described; it was for myself I mourned!

Deprived, while yet a child, of my parents—without sister, relation, or friends—I stood in the world so entirely forsaken, that without an inward reliance on Heaven, and a disposition by nature a happy one, I might have wished often enough to have escaped from this unkindly world. But till now I had almost always HOPED in the Future, and this more from an instinctive feeling that it was the best thing to do, than from philosophy, or a too lively confidence of a better state of present circumstances, seeing that this was often so completely opposed to possibility. But now, unhappily, it had for some time been otherwise with me; I had felt, and more strongly than ever on this evening, an inexpressible desire for the affection of some one—to have some one near me I could call my own—who would be as a friend to me; in short, I wished that in this cheerless hour I had by my side a gentle wife—in my estimation, the highest happiness earth can bestow. Oh! she would console, she would cheer me; her tenderness would, in the poorest hut, make of me a king!

But that the glow of love within me would not have protected the faithful being I pictured at my side from the cold, was proved to me most indisputably at that moment, by an involuntary shiver that ran through all my limbs. With feelings more oppressed than ever, I rose, and walked a few turns up and down in my room—that is to say, three steps forward, and three back. The sense of my sad condition followed me to and fro, like my shadow on the wall, and for the first time in my life I felt an utter despondency, and threw a dark glance forward into my dreary-looking future. I had no patron—could not, therefore, for a long period, even expect preferment; consequently, could not calculate on a subsistence—still less on a wife!

"But what in the world," I again said to myself, "is the use of complaining? And yet, endeavouring to repel the anxious thoughts that had taken possession of me, I once more sighed, "If but one Christian soul would come in to me this evening! whoever it might be—friend or foe—it were better than this utter solitude. Yes, even if a dweller of the land of spirits were to open my door, I would bid him welcome!"

Heavens! What was that?

Three knocks at the door! I could scarcely believe my ears; and yet—three more! I went, opened the door, and found—no one; only the wind, blowing up and down the staircase. I hastily shut the door again, thrust my hands into my pockets, and walked a while to and fro, humming a tune somewhat loudly. A few moments afterwards, I thought I heard a sigh! I held my breath and listened; again I distinctly heard some one sighing, and once so deeply and painfully, that I called out, with some anxiety, "Who's there?" No answer.

I stood a moment thus, thinking what on earth it could be, when a frightful noise arose as if a bevy of howling cats were galloping down the garret stairs; it suddenly stopped at my door, and there being no longer a doubt but it must be something, I took the candle, seized a stick, and issued forth. The moment I opened the door the light was blown out; a tall figure in white stood in front of me, and I felt myself grasped by two strong arms. I shouted for help, and struggled so stoutly to release myself, that I and my opponent fell to the ground, I the uppermost. I rose in an instant, and turned to hasten away to get a light, when I stumbled over something (heaven knows what it was, but it seemed to me as if some one had caught and held me by the ancle); I fell again, struck my head in falling against the edge of the table, and lost all consciousness, while a sound much resembling a shout of laughter, yet rang in my ears!

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE SPA FIELDS BURIAL GROUND.

Last week, under the police head, we gave a revolting account of the treatment of the dead in Spa-fields burial ground. The disclosures made upon the subject have produced considerable sensation, and it was thought right to call the attention of the Home Secretary to the practices adopted there.

A communication was made by Sir James Graham to the police commissioners on Saturday, and Captain Hay, the assistant commissioner, on that day inspected the burial ground, accompanied by Mr. Watt, the chairman, Mr. Clarke, the secretary, and several other respectable householders. The stench arising from decomposed human bodies was declared by Captain Hay to be insufferable, and the committee were directed to forward such information as they could collect for the guidance of Sir James Graham. A meeting of the committee took place on Sunday, and examinations were taken and forwarded to the Home Office. The manner in which this extraordinary and revolting work of demolition was first discovered is this:—Reuben Room, a grave-digger at the burial ground, had a child interred some time since, and upon his discharge he insisted on removing the body, asserting that he well knew after he left that the coffin would be burnt, the body and limbs severed, and deposited elsewhere. Police constables Henry Webb, G 106, and Martin, 144, were called in to prevent Room opening the grave, upon which he took the two officers to an outhouse, where they saw the lids of several coffins consuming over a fierce fire, and pieces of "human flesh" (to use the officers' own words) were attached to the coffins the size of their hands. The written examinations sent to Sir James Graham are seven in number. The statements are revolting in the extreme, and almost exceed belief. We subjoin two of these seven depositions:—

Reuben Room examined: Was in the employ of Mr. F. Greene as grave-digger in 1837, and continued in his employ for about six years. Our mode of working the ground was not commencing at one end and working to the other, but digging wherever it was ordered, totally regardless whether the ground was full or not. For instance, to dig a grave seven feet deep, at a particular spot, I have often disturbed and mutilated seven or eight bodies—that is, I have severed heads, arms, legs, or whatever came in my way, with a crowbar, pickaxe, chopper, and saw. Some of the bodies were quite fresh, and some decomposed! I have had as much as one hundredweight and a half of human flesh on what we term the "beef board," at the foot of the grave at one time. I have often put a rope round the neck of the corpse to drag it out of the coffin, fastening one end of the rope to a tombstone, so as to keep the corpse upright to get at the coffin from underneath, to make room for the flesh of other bodies. The coffins were taken away and burnt, with pieces of decomposed flesh adhering thereto. I have taken up half a ton of wood out of one grave, because I had to take out two tiers of coffins, some of which were quite fresh, and we used to cut them up for struts, used for shoring up the graves. We had as many as 50 and 60 sides of coffins always in use to keep the ground from falling in when digging. We have buried as many as 45 bodies in one day, besides still-borns. I and Tom Smith kept an account one year. We buried 2017 bodies, besides still-borns, which are generally enclosed in deal coffins. We have taken them up when they have been in the ground only two days, and used them to light fires with. I have been up to my knees in human flesh, by jumping on the bodies so as to cram them into the least possible space at the bottom of the graves in which fresh bodies were afterwards placed. We covered over the flesh at the bottom by a small layer of mould.

William Penny, inspector of the G division: In December, 1843, a petition was presented to the magistrates at Clerkenwell Police Court, signed by about 150 inhabitants. The magistrate gave me the petition and desired me to see to it. I did so; and went immediately to a one story erection in the burial-ground, called a "bone-house," where I found a large fire on the floor and in the grate. The fire consisted of coffin-boards of full-grown people and children broken up; some were quite sound, with pieces of black cloth and handles and plates and pieces of shrouds were flying about. The smell was indescribable. I have visited the ground many times since, and have found it in the same state.

RUMOURED RETURN OF MR. GLADSTONE TO THE CABINET.—A rumour has been in circulation to the effect that Mr. Gladstone has now decided to support the increased grant to Maynooth, and that he is likely to have a still higher office under the Government than the one he recently held.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held on Monday, at the Foreign-Office. All the Cabinet Ministers were present except Lord Wharncliffe and Lord Stanley, who were prevented from attending by indisposition. The Council sat two hours.

BREAD MONOPOLY.—On Tuesday evening upwards of 150 master bakers held a meeting at the Green Dragon, Fleet-street, for the purpose of inducing millers or flour factors not to supply any baker with flour who sells his bread under a stipulated trade price, and pledging themselves individually and collectively not to support or deal with any miller so transgressing. A committee was appointed to see their resolutions carried into effect.

THE WEATHER.—The weather still continues to be most winterly. The thermometer was at eight o'clock on Tuesday evening down to 24 degrees, and during the night the mercury fell as low as 17 degrees, being 15 degrees of frost. On Wednesday there was a fall of snow, which continued with but little intermission until between eleven and twelve o'clock, when the sun burst forth with considerable power; but at no portion of the day was the thermometer higher than 30 degrees. On Thursday the weather was fine, but still excessively cold. At seven o'clock in the morning the thermometer was 18 degrees below freezing point.

COUNTRY NEWS.

TWO LADIES BURNED TO DEATH.—The provincial papers record the deaths of two ladies from fire under lamentable circumstances. One of these accidents took place at Liverpool, and the other near Hertford. In the former case there had been a dinner party one day last week at Mr. Aspinall's, in Rodney street, Liverpool, to celebrate the birthday of Miss Bell, a lovely girl, who had then attained her fifteenth year. The dinner passed over agreeably. The gentlemen were left to enjoy their wine, and the ladies withdrew to the drawing-room. Miss Bell was all life and animation. Her spirits, naturally of a gay turn, seemed more than ordinarily buoyant. In a moment all was changed; for, while Miss Bell was in the act of passing close to the fire-place, her dress came in contact with the fire, and instantly she was enveloped in flames. She screamed, ran round the room in a state of delirium, while the other ladies screamed and fled in terror up-stairs and down. The screams speedily brought the gentlemen to the drawing-room. The Rev. Rector Campbell was the first to enter, and, seeing Miss Bell in flames, rushing from one end of the apartment to the other in a state of frenzy, he caught her in his arms, and endeavoured to extinguish the flames. He scorched his hands in the attempt, which, however, was an unsuccessful one, for she broke from his grasp, and was about to plunge down the staircase, where Mr. Aspinall, who had, with great presence of mind, taken off his great coat, flung it round her, rolled her in it on the carpet, and immediately quenched the flames. She was then conveyed to her room, where she was attended by the first medical and surgical practitioners of the town; but she was so severely burned in various parts of the body, that, after lying in great agony for many hours, she expired.——The other sufferer was a lady, in her 84th year, and the accident took place at the mansion of her brother, Sir R. Chester, near Hertford. The deceased, on Tuesday week, about three o'clock, had gone into the kitchen, where she directed one of the servants to go up-stairs. While left alone the saucepan on the fire boiled over, and the deceased endeavoured to remove it, when her shawl caught fire, and she was immediately enveloped in flames. Her cries for assistance were heard by the servants, who endeavoured by every means to extinguish the flames, but could not do so until the unfortunate lady had been most dangerously burned about the arms, face, chest, and body. The deceased continued in the greatest agony till twelve o'clock at night, when she expired, having been perfectly sensible to the last.

BURGLARY IN WORCESTERSHIRE.—Early on Sunday morning last a daring burglary was committed in the parish of Hartlebury, Worcestershire. About three o'clock that morning the back premises of the house occupied by the Misses Williams, of Perry House, in the above parish, were broken open and the house entered. About £70 in bank notes (chiefly of the Kidderminster Bank), a little gold and silver, and two gold rings, were stolen. The thieves (there were four of them) surrounded the bed of the Misses Williams, and demanded their money to be given up instantly, at the same time threatening that if they refused they would burn their house down. One of the Misses Williams asked to be allowed to put on her garments, but they said, "No, your money is not far off!" Three of them then conducted her to an adjoining room, while one remained to watch over the other sister, who continued in her bed. At this time the servant girl called out, when Miss Anne Williams replied, "Stay where you are, Hannah, there are robbers in the house." At this one of the men lifted up his hand in a threatening attitude, and desired her to make no more noise. Miss Williams begged to have a £10 note returned, saying that it was every sixpence they had in the house. This they were not disposed to do, and insolently demanded more, saying that some people in Worcester had informed them that they were worth thousands. At this period the servant fortunately called out "Murder!" from her window, which the thieves did not understand; but hearing a noise, Miss Williams said, "There is some one about," when the thieves ran down stairs, taking care to lock them all in. There was a boy in the house, but he did not awake until after the robbers had decamped.

EXTRAORDINARY OCCURRENCE AT TOOTING.—An individual, supposed to be of the feminine sex, was buried at Tooting last week. She was 83 years of age, and for the last half century had passed for a very pious woman, constantly receiving the sacrament, and was equally punctual in her devotions. She was for thirty years in the service of a lady at Tooting as cook, having been engaged when she was 27, and leaving her service at the age of 57, to marry Mr. Welch, the parish clerk. The old couple appeared to live in harmony for six years, when Welch died. From that time she has been mainly supported by the charitable contributions of the neighbouring gentry, and of late years she has been lodging in the same room with an aged female. No suspicion of the sex of this person had ever been entertained; but upon laying out the corpse, the astounding fact was discovered that the pious Ann Welch was, in fact, a man.

INCENDIARY FIRE AT TEDDINGTON.—On Tuesday night, a fire, supposed to be the act of an incendiary, took place on the premises of Mr. Ganner, a farmer residing in Kingston-lane, Teddington. The rick and straw-yard, with the surrounding buildings, were destroyed. A wheat rick, containing the produce of 50 acres, a second nearly as large, a stack of rye, one of barley, and two ricks of hay, were totally destroyed. The damage done to the premises, and amount of property destroyed, it is said will be little short of £3000. This is the second calamity that has occurred to Mr. Ganner; two years since he had the entire contents of his farm at Hampton-common destroyed by fire under circumstances similar to the present.

BURGLARY AND ROBBERY IN SURREY.—On Saturday night last the house of Mrs. Elizabeth Wicking, called Hobb's Farm, near Tunbridge, Surrey, was broken into by three men with their faces blackened, who stole various articles of plate, besides a sum of money amounting to twenty-five pounds. In the same bureau from which the plate and sovereigns were taken, there was a sum of money amounting to upwards of two hundred pounds in another drawer adjoining, and which fortunately was overlooked by the villains in their hurry to leave.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

A CHILD POISONED BY ITS FATHER.—At the Assizes at Reading, on Tuesday, Thomas Jennings took his trial for the murder of his child, Eleazer Jennings, at Thatcham, Berks, by administering arsenic to her under the circumstances which have already been reported in our paper. A long statement which the prisoner had made, and which had been taken down in writing, was put in and read. In this he endeavoured to throw the crime upon a girl, who he said had seen him putting away a bottle containing the arsenic, but there did not appear to be the slightest grounds for believing his statement, and the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty" against him, but accompanied their verdict with a recommendation to mercy, to the surprise of everybody in court. The judge (Mr. Baron Platt) putting on the black cap, proceeded in the most impressive manner to pass sentence of death upon the prisoner, to whom he held out not the slightest hope of mercy in this world, but solemnly adjured him to make the best use of the short time that remained, by attending to the instructions he would receive in the gaol. His lordship dwelt upon the diabolical nature of the crime, which was aggravated by the attempt he had made to throw suspicion upon an innocent child, and concluded by passing sentence in the usual form. The prisoner, who had frequently shed tears during the trial, now exclaimed that he was innocent, and that his life had been falsely sworn away.

THE SALT-HILL MURDER.—The trial of John Tawell, charged with the wilful murder of Sarah Hart, at Salt-hill, on New Year's Day, will take place next week at Aylesbury, probably on Wednesday. Mr. Gurney and Mr. O'Malley have been retained for the prisoner. Mr. Sergeant Byles and Mr. Prendergast have been retained on the part of the Crown. The prisoner continues to be supplied with a dinner from the White Hart Inn at Aylesbury, the prison regulations permitting an accused person, before trial, thus to obtain his meals. He is only restricted as to quantity with reference to wine and beer. His appetite continues very good, and his usual spirits, until within the last day or two, have not forsaken him. He has been taking hydrocyanic acid, medicinally, nearly ever since he has been incarcerated, the prisoner stating that he is labouring under a complaint which renders that medicine necessary for his health.

THE CANONRY OF ST. PAUL'S.—The Rev. J. E. Tyler, B.D., Rector of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, is to have the canonry vacant by the death of the late Rev. Sydney Smith. The stipend, by the recent Act, is reduced to £1000 a-year.

THE BISHOP OF ELY.—The inflammatory attack on the chest under which the Bishop of Ely has recently laboured, has abated, but his lordship remains in a very weak state.

THE MURDER AT HAMPSTEAD.

VERDICT OF WILFUL MURDER BY THE CORONER'S JURY AGAINST THOMAS HENRY HOCKER.

On Monday morning the coroner's inquest upon the murdered man, James Delarue, was resumed at the Yorkshire Grey, Hampstead. The proceedings of course excited considerable curiosity. Amongst the persons present were Lord Alfred Paget, Lord William Lennox, M.P., and Mr. Prothero, M.P.

The prisoners James Hocker and Henry Thomas Hocker having been brought into the room, the proceedings commenced by the examination of Joseph Shackell, inspector of the Detective Force, who said: I heard that a murder had been committed on the 21st of February, and having gone to the spot, discovered that a robbery had also been committed. On Sunday I went to 55, Whittlebury-street, Euston square, and examined the premises, having heard that he had had a watch. In a drawer, among a number of obscene books and prints, I found a roll of papers, one of which was a bill of a watch, giving a description of the same, which had been bought of Mr. Finer, of High Holborn, for £7 7s. On Wednesday morning I was shown the identical watch described in this bill. Inspector Partridge showed me the watch at the police court at Marylebone. After the examination had been gone through before Mr. Rawlinson, I proceeded to 11, Victoria-terrace, Portland-town, to a small back room, which I understood was the lodging of the prisoners, Thomas Hocker and James Hocker. (Here the prisoner Thomas Hocker, at the request of the coroner, stood up.) I did not know the person of either of them. The room was in a very miserable condition. I found a quantity of letters and papers, and two obscene prints. Isaw Mr. Partridge find, in a cupboard, the right wristband and sleeve of a shirt all over blood. I also saw Mr. Haynes find a button, which appeared to be off a coat—a silk button. The room was then locked, and I proceeded immediately to the father's residence, 17, Charles-street, front room first floor. I told him who and what I was. I then asked him if he knew the position in which his son Thomas was. He replied, "Alas! I do." I asked him to give me the clothes which his son had brought there. I did not say which son, but before that he had told me that his son James had just left. This was about three o'clock in the afternoon. I asked for the clothes, at the same time. Picking up a macintosh, I said, "Is this your son Thomas's macintosh?" He said, "Yes." Seeing that it was stained with blood, and muddy both back and front, I asked when he had worn it last? He said he had gone out at seven o'clock on Friday night with it on.

Mr. Wakley: Where did you find it?—Inspector Shackell: In the room.

Mr. Wakley: There was no attempt to conceal it?—Inspector Shackell: Not at all. I then asked for the linen which he had pulled off, and the mother gave me this shirt, which she stated he had taken off on the Saturday morning.

On examining the shirt I found the wristband torn off, and on comparing the sleeve with the wristband which we had before seen, we found them to correspond exactly. I asked her, also, to produce the stockings, which she did; they were all stained with blood. On comparing these with the drawers which Inspector Partridge has, I found them correspond with the other stains of blood. There was no concealment at all. The conduct of the father and mother was fair and straightforward in the whole transaction. He then said that his son had told him that he had borrowed £20 from a Mrs. Edwards, of 6, Bath-place, New-road, but that he feared it was not true. He added, "I have got a sovereign of it, and if it is not true I will give it up." I then asked him if he took a stick out with him on Friday. He said he did; it was a black ebony one. I then went to Mrs. Edwards's, and found that the story of his having borrowed money of her was not true. I then received two letters from Mrs. Edwards, which I produce. The stick was produced; it was not a very thick one, but the head was split.

Mr. Wakley: Did you observe that the head was split?—Inspector Shackell: I did. I asked the father if he knew how it was done. He said he did not. The letters I received from Mrs. Edwards were addressed to her by the prisoner, and in the same hand-writing as that, signed "Caroline," found upon the deceased. On searching the prisoner's place, I found an answer from Mrs. Edwards to one of these letters. There was no allusion to "Caroline," in either of these letters, but to a young person named Philps, who is under the protection of Mrs. Edwards, with whom the prisoner professed to keep company.

Inspector Partridge was then examined, and after giving some evidence already mentioned as to his going to call up Watson's wife, at 17, Charles-street, Portland town, he proceeded as follows: I then went to the prisoner's lodging at 11, Victoria-terrace, and found a number of letters, which do not, however, relate to this inquiry. I then took the prisoner, Thomas Henry Hocker, to Hampstead station-house. James accompanied us a part of the way; he wanted to go to Hampstead. I said he could go if he liked: but he could hold no communication with him if he did, and that he had better come next morning. He then left, saying he should come next morning. Thomas Hocker walked by the side of me, the other a little behind. There was no conversation between them. I had not hold of Thomas Hocker, nor had he handcuffs on. Sergeants Scotney and Bickerson were in the rear. The same afternoon (Wednesday), I took Inspectors Shackell and Haynes with me to Victoria-terrace, and we searched the room, in which there are two cupboards. In the right-hand cupboard I found this shirt wristband, with a portion of the sleeve attached. It was on a shelf, and could not be seen unless minutely looked after. I have compared it with the torn sleeve, and find that it corresponds perfectly. In another cupboard I found the shoemaker's pincers (which I now produce); there are no marks of blood upon them. They were lying on a shelf, but not concealed. There were marks of rust upon them as there are now. From Victoria-terrace we went to 17, Charles street. We searched the room, and, among other things, found a pair of trousers; there were some spots of blood on the bottom and on the knee part, also some dirt. They were on a sofa bed, but were not in any way concealed. I was informed by the father that they belonged to his son, Thomas Hocker.

Mr. Wakley: Did you ask when they were last worn by him?—Witness: I did. He said on the Friday evening. [The trousers were handed round for inspection by the jury. The marks of blood were visible.] I also produce a waistcoat on which there are some small spots of blood. [It was a good deal torn.] At the father's house I found some note paper, a small bottle of blue ink, and some wafers bearing the initial "F," similar to that with which the "Caroline" letter was sealed.

The prisoner, Thomas Hocker, here said, "It will be found that the ink is not blue.

Witness continued: The mother remarked to me, when I took these things, 'That is the ink which Thomas, poor fellow, used always to write with."

Inspector Partridge now produced the watch.

Mr. Wakley examined it, and the written description of the same, and then asked whether the servant of the house at which deceased lodged had identified it?

Inspector Shackell said she stated that she believed it was the deceased's watch.

Inspector Partridge: The watch was given me by Sergeant Scotney, to whom it was handed by Thomas Hocker.

Inspector Haynes, of the detective force, 8, Little Peter-street, Westminster: I attended the examination of the prisoner Thomas Hocker, before the magistrate at the police-court on Wednesday last, and afterwards accompanied Shackell and Partridge to the lodgings of the prisoner, 11, Victoria-terrace, and assisted in searching the room. On the side-board I found a button, which I now produce. I did not mark it, but it has not been out of my sight since. It is a silk button. I afterwards went with the two inspectors to the father's lodgings, and from what took place there, I went to the New Prison, Clerkenwell. Mr. Kilsby, the governor, at my request, sent for the prisoner, and I desired him to pull off his body coat, which I now produce. I also made him pull off his trousers and drawers. The trousers were of gambroon. On the trousers and coat were spots of blood.

Mr. Wakley: Had he this coat on when he was examined at the police-court?—Yes, sir.

Mr. Wakley; And was it not examined?—It appears not. But he had a coat, such as he has on now, over it. The drawers are also spotted with blood, and it appears that an attempt has been made to wash it out. On the inside of the right hand cuff of the coat there is also a mark of blood, and the pockets appear as if a bloody hand had been thrust in.

The clothes, marked with blood, were exhibited to the jury, and caused a strong feeling of excitement in the room. The prisoner looked on calmly and unmoved, and appeared as if he felt less than any one else in the room.

Mr. Wakley: Is that a mark of fresh blood inside the wrist?—Witness: It appears as if it had been washed. Two buttons had been found, one on the spot, the other in the house. Both had evidently belonged to the coat which had been taken from the prisoner's back in the prison.

Inspector Gray, 1, East-street, Hampstead: About ten minutes past eight on the night of the 21st February last, Fletcher, 24, stated that he had found a person who hod committed suicide in the fields. He said he had left a constable with the body. I immediately procured some men, and with the assistance of the sergeant they conveyed the body to the Yorkshire Grey (this house). The pockets of the deceased man were examined by the constable Baldock, as he lay on the stretcher, in my presence. A button was handed to me which, it was stated, had been found in the field about two yards from where the body lay. It was given to me by constable Thomas. I have compared it with the coat taken from the back of the prisoner, and find that it is of the same kind of buttons as those thereon. The note was found in the right hand pocket. I found some writing at the deceased's lodging which corresponds with that of the note found on the deceased, and the letters found at the prisoner's lodgings.

Constable James Thomas, 53 S, stationed at Hampstead: On the 22d of February I went to search the field (Haverstock-field), to see if I could discover the weapon with which the murder had been committed. I found the button produced. It was within a yard of the blood which lay on the ground. I marked it first, and then gave it to Inspector Gray. I did not find anything else.

[Some of the papers found at the lodgings of the deceased were here handed in. They appeared to be "copies" used to teach writing, one of which was "Knowledge is advantageous."]

Mrs. Jane Edwards called: I am a married woman. My husband is out of business. I live at 13, Bath-place, New-road. I know the prisoner Thomas Henry Hocker. I have not lent him any money within this last fortnight. He has never applied to borrow any. The superscriptions of the three letters produced are in his hand-writing. On the Monday night after the murder I saw the prisoner Thomas Hocker, with a watch in his possession. I never saw him with a watch before. He also had a ring which was represented as a brilliant, which resembled that now produced. But I could not swear to either of them. I never saw a ring on his finger before. I saw him take out the watch to look at the time. There was a gold (or imitation of gold) chain to it. He wore it in his waistcoat pocket.

Sarah Jane Philps was the next witness. She stated that she lived with the last witness in Bath-place. She had no profession or occupation. Last saw Thomas Hocker on Monday evening, about eleven o'clock, and went with him from 6, Bath-place, to 15, Portland place, the residence of Sir Oswald Moseley, where he left her, and she slept at Sir Oswald Moseley's. The last time she had previously seen him was on the Thursday before. Thomas Hocker showed her a watch on that evening, and told her he had bought it: he did say where he had bought it, but she did not remember. It had a chain; could not say whether it was of gold or silver, but it was the colour of gold.

By Mr. Wakley: Did he show you the watch?—Yes, and I should know it if I saw the inside.

Mr. Wakley: Let it be shown to her with several others.

Four watches were then placed before her, and the witness selected one, and said she wished that to be opened. This was done, and she immediately stated that that was the watch shown to her by Thomas Hocker.

[The prisoner Thomas Hocker, who had previously been quite unmoved, covered his face and shed tears during the evidence of this witness.]

Mrs. Edwards here exclaimed, "I am deceived!" and was ordered to retire from the room.

Witness proceeded: I have also seen the prisoner Thomas Hocker with a ring. I also saw the prisoner on last Friday week, at about half-past nine, at Sir Oswald Moseley's. He (the prisoner) saw me in the housekeeper's room of Sir Oswald Moseley's on that night, in the presence of Mrs. Maria Edwards, the sister-in-law of the last witness. He came by appointment. I did not expect him at any particular hour, but thought he might come. He remained until about eleven o'clock or past. He then left the house alone. During the time he was there he showed me a watch and ring—the watch which I have now identified, and the ring now produced. He said the ring was too large for his finger. He did not produce any purse or money. He said he had bought the watch that day. He did not say when he became possessed of the ring. He wore a black coat and trousers and a macintosh. I did not observe that he had any new clothes on that occasion. I should know the macintosh if I saw it. I did not observe that he had any blood upon his person. There was some blood on his shirt front, and he said his "governor" had cut his nose in play. By his governor I understood that he meant his employer in the City. He did not exhibit any cut on his nose, and said it had merely been made to bleed. The macintosh was here produced, and, on looking at the lining, she said, "This is the macintosh," and sobbed aloud. I noticed dirt on his trousers, but no blood. He said he had just come from Grafton-street. I don't think he had any stick with him. He did not show me any stick or weapon. He had never mentioned the name of Delarue or Cooper to me. [One of the letters was here handed to the witness.] The letter produced is like his writing. He did not state to me that he had been with any companion that day; he only spoke of his governor, with whom he said he had been the greater part of the day. He mentioned the name of his brother James. He merely spoke of his brother and a young lady he was acquainted with. He did not say anything about leaving London. He made an appointment to meet me on the following Monday or Tuesday, but did not say anything respecting Sunday. He said he was going to Dulwich on the Tuesday. He had never called me Caroline, and did not say that the young lady with whom James was acquainted was named Caroline. He had not stated that he would come to Portland-place on the Friday night, but I expected him. He had never called so late as ten minutes after nine that I remember. I have known him about ten or eleven weeks.

William Watson: I am a baker living at Windmill-place, Turnham-green. I know Thomas Henry Hocker, who, I believe, is a teacher at a school. His parents live at 17, Charles-street, Portland-town, where my family live. I am myself conducting a business at Turnham-green. On Saturday evening I was asked up into their room. I saw the father and mother and Thomas and James Hocker there. I took a cup of coffee, and while drinking it I overheard to the murder. The father said what a shocking thing it was, and they must have been cold-blooded villains to have done it. Thomas Hocker then said, "Oh, don't let us talk about that—let us talk about something else." He shortly afterwards sung a song, and then we had some rum. I said I was glad to see them all so comfortable; upon which Thomas said, "We don't always do it thus." He (Thomas Hocker) afterwards showed me the torn wrist of his shirt—this was after my mentioning the murder—upon which I said he must have been in some rough usage. His father said he seemed to have been in something queer, and he replied, "Oh it was only in romping with some girls." James afterwards went out, and came in again, and then said, "Oh dear, there is nothing being talked about but the murder of a gentleman at Hampstead, who was found with a love-letter in his pocket." I afterwards gave information to the police, having a strong conviction on my mind that Thomas Hocker was the person who had murdered Delarue, for I knew that they were intimate acquaintances. Sergeant Scotney sent for me at the Prince of Wales, public-house, Turnham-green, in consequence of having heard what had been said on the subject. I gave Scotney both the addresses—11, Victoria-terrace, and 17, Charles-street. I have not since seen Thomas Hocker until I entered this room.

By the Coroner: I have nothing to state with respect to any other persons supposed to be concerned in the murder. I have seen Delarue twice, but not at my house. I have seen a good deal of Thomas and James Hocker. I have no suspicion of James Hocker. I believe him to be as innocent as a child unborn. None of the family ever asked me not to give any information to the police.

Thomas Hocker, the father of the prisoners, was next brought in. His evidence was as follows: I am a ladies' shoemaker. I never saw Delarue, but have heard his name mentioned by my son Thomas, perhaps, fifty times. I had a misgiving of the person who had caused the murder when my son told me that he had taken a watch out of pledge. He told me so on Saturday evening, while we were walking from our house to Marylebone-lane. I saw the watch again on Sunday, when he said he had taken it out of pledge. I was present when my son came to get a pair of boots on the morning when he was taken into custody. (The trousers and waistcoat were shown to the witness.) To the best of my belief these are my son's. This ring I found on Friday last, and gave to the officers. I found it amongst the cuttings of the leather for burning. I was taking a handful to burn, when I found the ring amongst them. The cuttings were rolled together on the floor beneath one of the windows. I had never seen the ring before. I never had heard of the ring before. Thomas left his home at half-past six or a quarter to seven o'clock on the Friday week. He had dined and taken tea at home, with his mother, myself, and brother. We took tea about four, and after that he was occupied in reading and conversation with us. I do not recollect that he took anything with him. It must have been fully half-past six when he left. James was working until twenty minutes after eight that night, then he changed his clothes and washed himself before he left the house. That would take him twenty minutes longer. The brothers hardly ever went together. Thomas was in the habit of using a very large stick, which he said he had lost three weeks ago. He had brought it from Sheffield some two years before that time. My son had no watch or ring before last week. He had not worn a ring before I found that among the cuttings. He represented to me for some time back that some kind friend was going to lend him some money, and he told me that he had received a note from Mrs. Edwards, stating that she would lend him some money on Sunday night, but he said he should go on Friday night, and he hoped he should get it. I said she must be a great friend to lend a stranger ten pounds. I never knew Mrs. Edwards before this affair. Before he went out he said that if he were successful in getting the money he would return home earlier. I saw him again on Saturday morning at ten o'clock. That was his usual hour of coming to breakfast. He seemed, as usual, cheerful; and after he came into the room he pulled money out of his pocket. I understood he had got twelve guineas, and I congratulated him, and said, "I hope you'll be careful with it." On that night, going to Marylebone-lane, he said he had got a watch out of pledge. I said, "Better keep your money in your pockets, or it will slip through your fingers.'

The Coroner: Who can state as to the hour James left the house?—Witness: Two persons, who are here. I recollect the time Watson was there, and he told us of the murder, and dwelt on it some time. My son Thomas said, "Don't talk more about that. It's a gloomy subject." He showed his shirt sleeve to Watson and us, but I saw no blood. Thomas was very intimate with Delarue, but I never saw him in my life. (The letters so often mentioned were exhibited to witness.) I know writing greatly like this (then bursting into tears)—I believe it to be my son Thomas's writing. I never saw letters addressed to "James Cooper, Esq., Hampstead-road." Mrs. Watson was at home nearly the whole of Friday evening. I have heard my son call Delarue Cooper, and afterwards he has told me that his name was Delarue, and not Cooper. I expressed my suspicion that any respectable man should deny his name, or use another; and he accounted for it by saying he was somewhat eccentric. I believe my son was acquainted with him for three years.

The Coroner: You say he never visited you himself?—Witness (emphatically): He never did.

The Coroner to the prisoner: Is there any question you wish me to ask your father?—The prisoner: Everything my father has said is quite true. I have nothing to add.

Mary Ffrench, 31, Princes-street, Portman-market: My husband is driver of an omnibus. I do not know Thomas Henry Hocker; I only know his brother James. He was in my shop (a cigar shop) about nine o'clock. He said then that he had come from his work. He said on Sunday evening, when he came again, that, from the letters found on the murdered man, it must be Delarue; but he would not tell his brother that evening, for fear he should disturb him, "as poor Tom's feelings would be so hurt." He said further, he knew it was him, by the identical D on his linen, and by his going by the name of Cooper. The next night, after Thomas was taken into custody, he slept at my house. He did not tell me to deny to the police that he had slept there.

Daniel Delarue identified the watch and ring as his late brother's property. He was not aware why he should be called Cooper or Curteis.

The brother, James Hocker, was then discharged from custody, and examined as a witness. He said: The prisoner is my brother, and I sleep at 11, Victoria-terrace, but have my meals at 17, Charles-street. I took tea at home on Friday evening, and my brother then handed me a slate, on which was written, "Jem, I received a note from Mrs. Edwards this morning, stating that ten sovereigns will be at my disposal this evening," and he then added that he would be at home in tolerable time. He left not later than seven. It was quite dark. I did not see that he took any stick with him. He came home between two and three o'clock, and the noise he made on coming into the room awoke me. He said, "Well, Jem, I've been successful; I've got the money that I so long expected." He then took off his coat and waistcoat, and showed me the right sleeve of his shirt, and said, "I've been skylarking, Jem; as you see, I've had the sleeve of my shirt torn off." I said, "How comes that about?" He said, "I've been to Sarah Cocks," a young girl I had heard him speak of before. I forgot to say that he showed me some money, and said, "Here are twelve sovereigns—that's two more than I expected." I rose in the morning and went off, and he came over to Charles-street, and began to dispose of his money by giving father some and mother some. He was in their debt, as he had been out of work. That day passed over without any allusion to Mr. Delarue. At night Mr. Watson was invited up. We were all in high spirits at the idea of having so kind a friend, who had enabled us to liquidate a few debts. Mr. Watson's statement is perfectly correct, with this trifling difference, that I said also, "that murder was a gloomy subject, and out of place then." I saw, when going to bed, the watch that has been identified as the property of Delarue. He said, "You see it's going." He some time ago pledged a watch for £3, and I thought it was it. I read in the newspapers on Sunday of the murder, and then thought it was Delarue. I could not sleep that night, for I was so excited, and my brother said to me, "What's the matter?" but I did not tell him then. At four in the morning I told him, and he said, "Who is it?" I told him I thought it was Delarue, and he turned very pale, and said I must get up, but you must get me a pair of old boots. I went over to Charles-street, and when I returned I could see that he had been crying, as I was myself. We then went over to Charles street, and my mother said the body has been owned by his brother. Thomas then said, there would be no utility in his going to see the body, as he could add no clue to the murderers. The letters were shown to the witness, and he said that it might be the handwriting of his brother, but it was not his usual style of writing. I have heard him speak of "Caroline," and say the poor devil, meaning Delarue, was embarrassed. I know of no one going with him on Friday night to Mrs. Edwards's. I do not know the Cocks or where they live. My brother often met Delarue at the corner of Henry street, Portland-town, usually of a morning. About seven months ago he gave my brother £5. I heard from my brother that Delarue had been robbed of a gold watch, chain, and ten sovereigns.

The prisoner had nothing to ask of witness.

James Hocker's examination continued: My brother and Delarue's usual place of meeting was on the side of Primrose Hill, just opposite Henry-street. He first became acquainted with the deceased by meeting him there.

George Leveridge, in the service of Mr. Windgloss, newsvendor, High-street, Portland-town: On Friday night, at or about half-past seven, he was at the bar of the Swiss Cottage, and saw the prisoner come in, seemingly much agitated, and ask for the parlour. He (Leveridge) then left the house.

The Coroner then briefly summed up, and the jury, without retiring, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against Thomas Henry Hocker."

When the evidence before the Coroner was concluded, Thomas Henry Hocker withdrew to a private room, with Willoughby and Jackson, the warders of the prison, and Sergeant Grey, G 12. He appeared there totally unconcerned about the crime with which he stands charged. His father and brother, James Hocker, were allowed to see him. In the course of the interview, his father (who was deeply affected) remarked to him that the evidence was very strong against him, and trusted that he would be able to prove his innocence; but urged him to prepare for the worst. He replied, that he was fully prepared for the result, whatever it might be. His father then alluded to the disgrace that had been brought upon the family. He remarked, that he was sorry on his father's account, and that he was indifferent what became of himself. His father shed tears, and every person present was affected but the prisoner. Hocker subsequently stated, that if twenty policemen had seen him commit the act, of which he was alleged to be guilty, he would not move a muscle of his countenance, and said that he should conduct his own defence, for that he had not money to pay counsel, and none was allowed by Government. In the course of this conversation Hocker familiarly handed about his snuff-box, and partook of some half-and-half. At the termination of the inquiry, Hocker was conveyed to the New Prison at Clerkenwell. On his way to town, he entered into conversation about the different localities in the neighbourhood of Hampstead, and in reference to his absence from chapel at the New Prison that day, remarked that he supposed the chaplain would be able to do without him. The omnibus reached the New Prison about a quarter before six o'clock, when Hocker was immediately delivered into the custody of Mr. Kilsby, the governor. After the prisoner left the admission-room, the head clerk observed to Sergeant Redmayne of the G division, "God bless me, Redmayne, I do not know what murders will come to now; here is a man brought in on a verdict of wilful murder, and he has come in smiling."

THE ADJOURNED EXAMINATION OF HOCKER AT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

The prisoner Thomas Henry Hocker was again examined at Marlborough-street Police-office on Tuesday, but, with a few exceptions which we notice, the evidence was a repetition of that given before the Coroner. Sarah Ann Philps stated that she had known Hocker for about ten weeks. The witness then stated that she had met the prisoner on the night of the murder, and he showed her a watch and ring. The watch he stated he had bought, but he did not account for the possession of the ring. The watch was that now produced, but the guard was not the same. The letter signed "Caroline" is like his handwriting. The remainder of her evidence was exactly similar to that given before the Coroner. William Watson recapitulated his evidence of the conversation which had taken place in the elder Hocker's house on the Saturday evening, in the presence of the brothers. During the whole period of this witness's examination the prisoner was busily engaged taking notes of the proceedings. At that part of his evidence where he stated that the prisoner said, in reference to the "happy meeting" that evening, "We don't do it always in this style," the prisoner smiled, and again when the witness referred to the torn sleeve which the prisoner had shown him that night.

James Hocker did not add anything material to the facts already detailed by him. One slight difference was in the words used by witness to his brother at the time of his being taken into custody. When the duplicates were being given to the policeman, witness observed one for a watch among them, and said, "Why, Tom, I thought you had taken the watch from pledge." He replied, "No: the fact is, Jem, Delarue gave me the watch at ten o'clock on Friday morning." His brother, when he could get an engagement, taught writing and music in private families.

The waiter from the Swiss Cottage Tavern was examined. He said: A man came into the parlour and asked for a glass of rum-and-water; he paid me out of a shilling, and I noticed that he wore a sort of dark cloak. I have looked at the prisoner, and he is not the man.

Prisoner (with a very peculiar smile): I am the man.

Mr. Rawlinson (astonished): Why this is the witness you called for.—Prisoner: I have no witness. I want the thing to be correct. I am the man.

Mr. Rawlinson: Very well. The case is remanded till Tuesday next.

The prisoner was uncommonly cheerful, smiled frequently, and gave snuff out of his box to those around him who were inclined to try a pinch, and, strange though it be, his box was often in requisition.

The following is a copy of the letter so frequently referred to, and signed "Caroline:"—

"My dearest James— * * * * I find myself in a situation which makes it necessary for me to leave home shortly. I would rather die than doubt either your word or your honour; yet do not, oh! do not be ashamed to own me. If you cannot at present give me the title of wife, conceal me from the cruel finger of scorn. Heaven has been my witness that I have loved you but too dearly. Let me be happy in the conviction that you will one day restore me to your arms for ever. Ease my suspense by meeting me to-morrow at the place where, alas! you have always made me happy; yet not so, if it will put one smile of hope and comfort on my countenance, You can render me for ever light-hearted and happy, or for ever heart-broken and conscience-stricken. Oh, that a bended knee might procure me the former lot.—Ever yours,

"By Miss F. "Caroline.

"James Cooper, Hampstead-road."

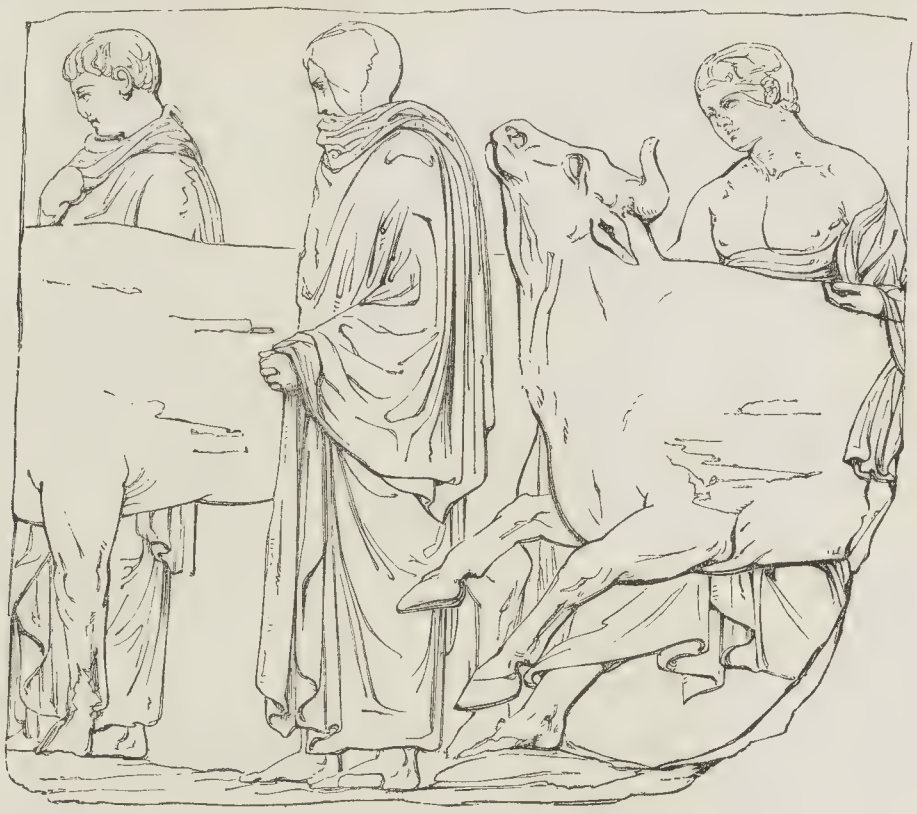
THE FUNERAL OF THE MURDERED MAN.

Last Sunday, the scene of the murder in the Haverstock-field, was visited by immense numbers of persons. According to one account, indeed, "the whole of Hampstead and its environs, presented a scene of the greatest animation and excitement, thousands of persons pouring in from various points of the metropolis in order to gratify their morbid taste for the horrible."

The funeral of the deceased Mr. Delarue took place as early as ten o'clock in the morning, to prevent confusion. The procession started for the old church in the following order:—Mr. Inspector Grey, and six constables of the S division; Mr. Neal and two mutes, with their staves; the body of Mr. James Delarue, borne by four young men and a policeman on either side; Mr. Daniel Delarue, the brother of the deceased, followed next, as chief mourner, and was supported by the deceased's late landlord, Mr. Kitchener. The other mourners were four in number, consisting of Mr. James Kitchener, the brother of the last-mentioned person, and Mr. William Telfer, Mr. Frederick Telfer, and Mr. John Telfer, personal friends of the deceased. Throughout the line of road the procession had to pass, the most decorous conduct was observed by the populace.

On the arrival of the body at the entrance to the new burial ground attached to the old church the procession was met by the Rev. W. Ainger, vicar of Hampstead, and one of his curates, the Rev. Mr. Faulkner, and it was preceded by those gentlemen to the third ground, where a new grave, 10 feet deep, had been dug for the reception of the body. The service was read by the Rev. Mr. Ainger, whilst the Rev. Mr. Faulkner repeated the responses. The coffin of the deceased bore on it a plate with the following inscription.—"Mr. James Delarue, died February 21, 1845, aged 33 years."

FRIEZE OF THE PARTHENON, (1).



ADDITIONS TO THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

Our Engravings represent portions of the frieze of the Parthenon, being casts from blocks lately found in Athens, and which have just been added to our great national Museum.

1. Consists of male figures bearing vases.
2. Attendants leaving the victims for sacrifice.

The figures in these groups move from right to left, whereas in groups of a similar character, before in the Museum, the direction is from left to right; these, therefore, belong to the north side of the temple, all the sculptures of the frieze of which had disappeared before Lord Elgin was n Athens, though they were known to have existed formerly, from drawings made by Currey, and afterwards by Stuart, who represent portions belonging to the series.

The discovery of these sculptures is not the only, though the most, interesting result of the recent excavations. A fourth marble step has been found to belong to the Parthenon, though three has been the number always hitherto assigned it; also a course of stone extending to 4½ feet from its base, horizontally, and 12½ feet vertically, having several mouldings formed on the side at regular intervals: much conjecture is likely to arise as to whether any part of this base was exposed to view, as it seems scarcely probable that if such were not the case, even the ancient Greeks would bestow upon it so much labour.

WARDOUR CASTLE, WILTS.

This picturesque relic of feudal times is situated between Shaftesbury and Salisbury, about 16 miles from the latter city. It was a baronial residence before the reign of Edward III., and passed successively through different families, till it came into the possession of Sir John Arundel, in the reign of Elizabeth. It is famous in history, from having been most gallantly defended in the year 1643, by the Lady Blanche Arundel against the Parliamentary forces; but, at length, the intrepid lady surrendered on honourable conditions.

The castellated ruin forms a striking object in the grounds of the modern "Wardour Castle," a magnificent edifice, erected between 1776 and 1784, from the designs of Paine. It is built of free-stone, in the Corinthian order, and is seated on a gentle eminence, whence it rises to view in a picturesque manner, from a thick grove.

The neighbouring church of Titsbury, a spacious Anglo-Norman structure, contains several interesting monuments of the Arundel family.

PEACE TEA-PARTY AT MANCHESTER.

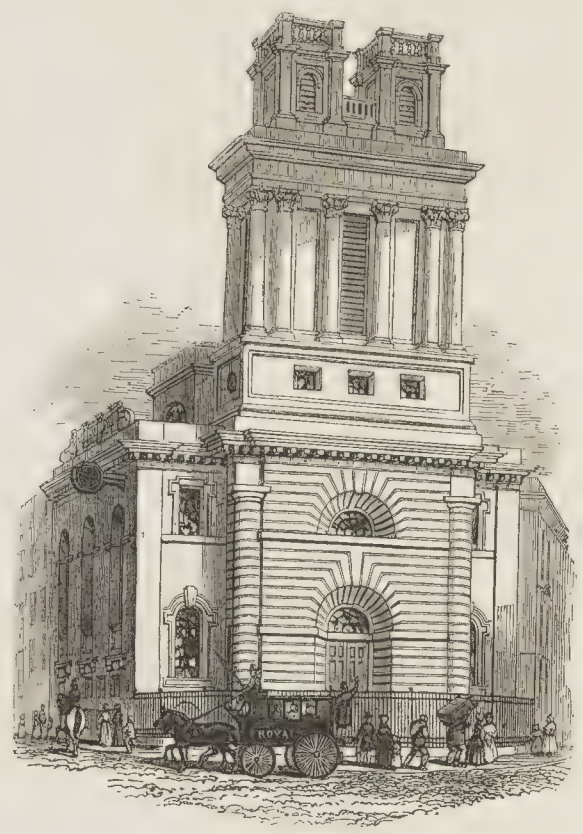
A tea-party, in connection with the Manchester and Salford Peace Society, —of which society Joseph Brotherton, Esq., M.P., is President,—took place in the large and elegant room of the Town Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, Feb. 26. More than four hundred persons, including a large proportion of ladies, sat down to tea. On the tables were placed numerous copies of the Peace Almanac, one for each visiter; and from the walls were suspended several charts, &c., illustrating the effects of war, and the blessings of peace and peace-makers. The meeting did not commence with any vocal supplication; but a solemn pause was substituted, in accordance with the plan adopted at the Anti-Slavery Convention in London, and at other large meetings. A number of sentiments were prepared relative to the society—its principle—the aspect of the times—the call on our gratitude—its claims upon ministers of the Prince of Peace—an appeal to Woman to lend her gentle but powerful influence in this benevolent work—and, lastly, a call on the Press, the Pulpit, and the Platform; also a brief sketch of the London "Society for the Promotion of Permanent and Universal Peace," of which the Manchester and Salford is an auxiliary.

After tea the chair was taken at seven o'clock by the Rev. Robert Vaughan, D.D., formerly of Kensington, now principal of the newly-established Lancashire Independent College, and so well known in the religious and literary world. He spoke of his long connection with Peace Societies, and of his endeavours to embrace the entire principle—the absolute unlawfulness of all war; but though not quite able to see this, he should never hesitate to promote their general object, to the extent of his ability, either publicly or privately. He took a rapid glance at the supposed effects of civilization in lessening warfare. At one time he had indulged hopes; but he came at last to the conclusion that war had been almost as prevalent amongst civilized moderns as among their barbarous predecessors, carried on with more "pomp and circumstance," and a little more of courtesy and refinement, and what is called honour. But what was modern war when its gorgeous vest was thrown aside? He then alluded to those who were the authors and abettors of war, and closed the list with "even woman too;" yes, even woman's gentle nature had been fascinated by the finery of war, and she had been thus induced to lend her influence to the murderous work, notwithstanding the widowhood, the orphanage, the wrong, the misery, which this Juggernaut of war had spread over nations and continents.



The Rev. J. W. Massie next addressed the meeting, and avowed his entire concurrence in the full principle of the Society. He referred to his efforts in the cause while in India; and, in a very eloquent address, alluded, amongst other topics, to the great value, as an auxiliary to peace, of the unrestricted freedom of commerce; and spoke of the half-blindness of those who advocated either the one or the other, and not both. He dwelt at some length on the costs of war. The meeting was subsequently addressed by Mr. Dunn, Secretary to the British and Foreign School Society, who stated that the principles of peace were specially and pointedly taught in all their schools; and that every teacher who left the training establishment was presented with a copy of the Prize Essay on Peace. Rev. Dr. Beard, Rev. W. M'Kerrow, and several others expressed their conviction of the unlawfulness of all war; related several anecdotes illustrative of the all-subduing force of kindness, and others evincing the folly as well as wickedness of war; contrasted the true patriot with the man who "stands still to be shot at, at so much a day," be it more or less; showed that, from the officer to the private, a soldier merely follows a trade; that it requires more true courage to forbear than to fight; and that the man of peace is not only the real patriot, but the real hero. The meeting, which was very satisfactory, separated a little before ten o'clock.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. LII.

ST. MARY'S WOOLNOTH, LOMBARD-STREET.

The recent extensive improvements in forming the main northern approach to London-bridge have exposed to view the exterior of one of the most striking and original, although not the most beautiful, churches in the metropolis—St. Mary's Woolnoth, at the western extremity of Lombard-street, or rather occupying a plot of ground between that and King William-street.

The architect of this church was Hawksmoor, a pupil of Wren, who also built Christchurch, Spitalfields; St. George's, Bloomsbury, &c. When a Christian church was first built here is unknown; but it was probably at a very early time. In the beginning of the 15th century the church was rebuilt; and again rebuilt by Hawksmoor in 1727, or according to Maitland, in 1719,

ST. MARY'S WOOLNOTH, LOMBARD-STREET.

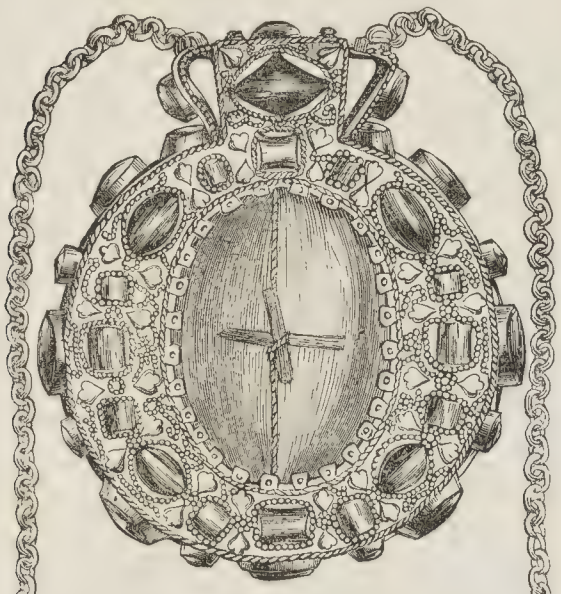
Our engraving shows the west front: it is certainly not a faultless composition. Mr. Godwin thinks, that had the entrance doorway occupied the whole basement story of the tower, to the exclusion of the semi-circular window now above it, the effect would have been improved. The elongated tower, which from the arrangement of the small turrets at the top has the appearance of two towers united, seems to be without a prototype in England. The Rev. Mr. Dallaway has termed this front a "miniature imitation of that of St. Sulpice at Paris;" but without stopping to question the resemblance, which we do not perceive, we would suggest that did this resemblance exist, he should rather have found imitation in the church of St. Sulpice, inasmuch as the façade of that edifice was built by Servandoni a considerable time after the completion of St. Mary's Woolnoth.

The front facing Lombard-street presents three niche-headed blank recesses on a high plinth, ornamented with rustics; each of these recesses containing two Ionic columns on pedestals, supporting a circular entablature, on a level with the springing of the arched heads; and the recesses, plinth, and basement, have blank panels.

The interior is rich and beautiful, and well-proportioned. It is nearly square, and on the model of a Roman atrium. Twelve well-proportioned Corinthian columns, placed three in each angle, at a distance from the outer walls, equal to about one-sixth of the whole width of the church, support an entablature and a clere-story above it, which latter presents a large semi-circular window on each of the four sides. The ceiling of the square area enclosed by the clere-story walls, as well as the soffit of the aisles formed by the columns, is profusely ornamented with panels and carved mouldings. A ponderous but elegantly-ornamented gallery is introduced on three sides of the church with so much skill, that it does not mar the general effect. It contains an organ built by "Father Smith, in 1681." The altar-piece and pulpit are of richly-carved oak.

St. Mary's Woolnoth, it is thought by some, had its distinctive title from the circumstance that it was neath, or nigh, to the wool-staple. Mr. Gwilt ("Public Buildings of London") suggests that it may have been called Wool-nought, to distinguish it from the other church of St. Mary, where the wool-beam actually was.

A Child Poisoned by its Father.—The village of Bradninch, about nine miles from Exeter, has been the scene of a murder, which produced much excitement in the neighbourhood. A short time ago a husbandman residing there lost his wife in child-bed. The infant was taken into the country by a relative, who took charge of it. On the day of his wife's funeral this person came to Bradninch to attend it, and during the performance of the funeral ceremony, left the child in the care of its father, who had been indisposed, and was receiving sick pay from a club of which he is a member, being confined to his bed. He had previously provided himself with a bottle of spirits of hartshorn, unknown to his nurse. He took the poor innocent and unsuspecting child into bed with him, whilst the funeral of his wife was going on, and administered the spirit of hartshorn to it, afterwards concealing the bottle in a crevice of the floor. The female relative who had interested herself in the case of the infant child, on returning to the house from the funeral, found it foaming at the mouth, and exceedingly ill. She was greatly alarmed, and took it to the minister of the parish to be baptised. The gentleman immediately caused the infant to receive medical attention, but it died in excruciating agony and pain shortly afterwards. The inquest, which had been adjourned, was resumed yesterday week, when the father was committed for trial on a charge of wilful murder.



The Dumfries papers, after alluding to the increase of poaching in Scotland, state that the incredible quantity of near 12 tons of game left Kirkcudbright in one day! and that game to the amount of £400 is weekly exported by the steamers from the two counties of Kirkcudbright and Wigton.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

Preparations are already making at the various theatres for the Easter pieces, the majority of which will be burlesques. That at the Lyceum is to be called "Whittington and his Cat," founded on the old nursery tale, and written by Messrs. Albert Smith and Taylor. Mrs. Keeley will play Whittington; and a new actress from the provinces, Miss Villars, will perform Alice Fitzwarren, the merchant's daughter. At the Adelphi, Mr. àBeckett is, we hear, at work—if we may call that work which is play to him—upon an extravaganza founded upon the adventures of "St. George and the Dragon." And at the Olympic, Mr. Stoqueler, the author of "Polkamania," is adapting the deeds of the "Seven Champions of Christendom" for the Easter piece. Mr. Planché has a novelty in preparation for the Haymarket. To this gentleman may be attributed the credit of originating this species of entertainment. We hear of nothing as yet in preparation at the Princess'.

Miss Clara Seyton gave a new entertainment at Crosby-hall on Tuesday evening, entitled "Illustrations of the Drama and the Opera;" consisting chiefly of recitations from the most eminent dramatic writers, ancient and modern, interspersed with various songs by Schubert, Weber, Mozart, Pacini, and T. Cooke. The programme concluded with a medley scena, called "A Musical Scamper over Europe," written for Miss Seyton by Mr. Albert Smith, which was received with much applause by a large audience.

THE TALISMAN OF CHARLEMAGNE.

This curious object of vertu is described in the Parisian journals, as "la plus belle Relique de l'Europe;" and it has, certainly, excited considerable interest in the archæological and religious circles of the continent.

It is the talisman, or charm, which was constantly worn by Charlemagne, and which was found suspended from the neck of the Emperor, on the opening of his sepulchre in 1166: it was presented to Napoleon by the clergy of Aix-la-Chapelle, on 23 Thermidor an XII.

The talisman is of fine gold, of round form, as our illustration shows, set with gems, and in the centre are two rough sapphires, and a portion of the Holy Cross; besides other relics brought from the Holy Land.

The history of this precious object, is, that it was presented to Charlemagne by Haroun-al-Raschid, in the year 797, with several relics of kindred value: the latter are shown at Aix-la-Chapelle to the present day; but the Talisman was buried with Charlemagne, by whom it had been worn till his death in 814. It was presented to Napoleon, as we have stated, and it is now the property of Prince Louis Napoleon, now a prisoner in the château of Ham.

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'.

Miss Cushman appeared at this house last week in "As You Like It," but at too late a period for notice in our number. This clever actress did not lose one iota of popularity by her transition from tragedy to comedy in the part of Rosalind. That earnestness which entered into all the varied emotions and passions of Bianca, with the rage of Emilia, and the stern purpose of Lady Macbeth, was exchanged for an equal devotion to the cause of the amiable and playful Rosalind. Whatever character Miss Cushman undertakes, she enters into it thoroughly, speaking from it directly, and hence the appearance of nature in all she does. The maintained hilarity and care of her Rosalind were perfectly delightful.

The legitimate drama appears entirely to have taken the place of opera at this house. "Macbeth," and the "Stranger" were announced for Monday and Tuesday; and "King Lear" for Thursday, Mr. Forrest playing Macbeth and Lear, and Mr. Wallack the Stranger.

HAYMARKET.

Our cut represents an amusing scene in Mr. R. B. Peake's comedy, "The Sheriff of the County," now performing at the Haymarket Theatre. Mrs. Hollylodge (Mrs. Glover) mistakes Nonpariel (Mr. Webster) the Lord Mayor's footman, in plain clothes, for one of the officers from the barracks, and introduces her daughter to him. She is undeceived by her brother, the Attorney (Mr. Strickland). The contretems is one of the best "situations" of the piece.

ST. JAMES'S—FRENCH PLAYS.

The illustration characterises the first phase of M. Lemaitre's inimitable Cæsar de Bazan: it shows the hero rushing from the tavern, recklessly exclaiming, "Je vieus de jouer avec des Manans, qui m'ont volé comme des grandes seigneurs!"

On Monday evening M. Lemaitre made his appearance in the old melodrama, "Trente Ans, ou la Vie d'un Joueur," one of his earliest parts, and which our readers may remember being adapted at the Adelphi some years back for Yates and O. Smith. Beyond the fact of the character of George de Germani being one of the first that brought the talents of M. Lemaitre into notice, it has little to recommend it. The crude and horrible details of the hero's career lack the ingenuity which now-a-days in some measure palliates the disagreeable features of pieces of a similar cast. Moreover, up to the fourth act, there is very little room for the display of M. Lemaitre's talent; and when it does obtain scope, the intense truthfulness of the artist only renders the impersonation more revolting.

In the fifth act, where the corrupt associate of George takes a knife from the table where he has been eating, and goes out with the intention of murdering the gambler's son, who is in the next room, exclamations of horror burst from every part of the house. Although not ultra-squeamish about the subjects selected for such dramas, we prefer their being allied to some slight degree of dramatic ability: and the presence of a little humour, as in the case of Robert Macaire, goes a great way to relieve the otherwise repulsive nature of the representation. The piece has not since been repeated; albeit the applause at the fall of the curtain was loud and continuous.

LEMAITRE, AS DON CÆSAR DE BAZAN.

M. Lemaitre was announced to appear on Friday, in his great character in "L'Auberge des Adrets," of which we shall give a notice next week.

LITERATURE.

The Antiquarian and Architectural Year-Book for 1845. T. C. Newby.

This is the commencement of a design which has only to be well executed to become extremely popular. The Editor's object is to gather into one view all discoveries and proceedings of the year, both in Primeval and Mediæval Antiquities; to chronicle the erection of new Ecclesiastical Structures, and the restoration of buildings of the same character; and to supply information on important works on Antiquities, Architecture, &c., published during the year. The present volume is rich in details of Roman Remains discovered during the past year; and of all antiquarian upturnings in this country, relics of the above class are, to our thinking, the most important, for the light which they throw upon the details of the Roman civilisation of Britain—a period of our history yet unworthily elucidated. The papers on Sepulchral Remains, in this Year-Book, are, likewise, very attractive; as are also among the Mediæval Antiquities, the descriptions of Encaustic Tiles, and of Stained Glass.

The Notes on New and Restored Churches are very satisfactorily compiled, and will be found useful to the architect and the antiquary. The Bibliography is scarcely entitled to the space it occupies; and such matters might be well left to the reviewers. Of the execution of the work generally, we must speak in high terms: it bears the marks of careful revision throughout; and the Editor assures us that, in all possible cases, accounts of antiquarian discovery have been derived from the discoverers themselves; and printed documents have, in numberless instances, only been admitted to these pages after careful revision by the hands of their original writers. Indeed, the Editor's grateful acknowledgment in his preface to several eminent antiquaries, attests the value of the volume itself. Still, we hope to see the work, in future, restricted to the special discoveries of the past year, to the exclusion of papers of general moment: the article entitled "Notes on Spires and Towers," is, in our opinion, open to this objection With this slight drawback in the plan, rather than the execution, we commend the "Antiquarian and Architectural Year-Book" to every lover of archæological research,—a class of readers we are happy to find largely increasing.

Modern Cookery. By Eliza Acton. Longman and Co.

Amidst the vast multiplicity of books, which have been generated by steam power and other influences, the increase and improvement of works on Cookery is not the least remarkable. Time was when Mrs. Glasse and her fry of writing cooks were staple authorities upon the subject that comes home, or rather should come home, to every man's—mouth. At length, the quaint old phraseology of the instruction grew tiresome; the outline dishes in course of time grew obsolete; and the supererogatory advice of "first catch your hare" was met with sneers. Matters had reached this pass, when up sprang Mrs. Rundell, with her "Domestic Cookery," by "A Lady;" next came Dr. Kitchiner, with his olla podrida of good sense, fun, and sly satire (for his volume is the Punch of cookery-books); then Meg Dods, Mrs. Dalgairns, and Conrad Cooke (a practical cook, who engraved his own plates), and a host of others. This increase was, however, only proportionate to the advancing interest of the subject. With the cessation of the war with France vanished the olden notions of the French cuisine, the jibes about frogs, and a host of other John Bullisms. Our enlarged intercourse with the Continent soon led to our adoption of French cookery; we sensibly engrafted it upon our own system; and consequently English, or rather Anglo-French, is decided by a Frenchman (M. Ude) to be the finest cookery in the world. This has been the paramount influence in improving the business of the English kitchen; though the Germans should not be left out of the account, for they have contributed some ponderous volumes upon the subject.

Meanwhile, cookery has become a fashionable female accomplishment: the recherché character of club dinners has improved the carte at home and the club-house kitchen has proved one of the sights of London.

Eliza Acton's volume, we predict, will be antagonistic to Mrs. Rundell's future success, notwithstanding her sales of hundreds of thousands o copies. Eliza is more methodical than the "Lady" of Ludgate-hill, who has been twitted with giving us a receipt for essence of ham, and omitting to instruct us how to stew a steak—a never-to-be-forgotten reproof on her quasi completeness. Eliza's instructions on this head, by the way, are excellent.

"The Modern Cookery" professes to have reduced all its branches to "A System of Easy Practice," in a series of receipts, "which have been strictly tested, and are given with the most minute exactness." The book, we take to be as nearly original as it well can be: it contains, certainly not less than 1500 receipts, to test which, must have cost Eliza some years' experience. The book opens with a few pages of common-sense truths, addressed "to the young housekeepers of England;" in which occurs the following excellent note:—"It can scarcely be expected that good cooks should abound amongst us, if we consider how very few receive any training to fit them for the business. Every craft has its apprentices; but servants are generally left to scramble together as they can, from any source which accident may open to them, a knowledge of their respective duties. We have often thought that schools in which these duties should be taught them thoroughly, would be of far greater benefit to them than is the half-knowledge of comparatively un-useful matters, so frequently bestowed on them by charitable educationists." We agree with this suggestion, and really think that schools of cookery and housewifery would contribute very materially to the public health and enjoyment. A century since, there were schools for teaching such matters; and seeing that the cook is one of the most ancient English trades, as is testified by the Civic Company of Cooks, the neglect of such really "useful knowledge," can only be attributed to the false refinement of the age. Cookery is, however, taught in the large club and tavern kitchens of the metropolis; and, in the former, especially, "the young idea" learns how "To form a science and a nomenclature,

From out the commonest demands of Nature."

Still, all this is beside the question mooted by Eliza Acton, whose suggestion applies to the cookery of private life, or, in common parlance, the "Domestic." The novel features of her volume are, certainly, not only calculated to facilitate the labours of the kitchen, but to be of service likewise to those by whom they are directed. This is an important matter, for young housewives not unfrequently require as much tuition as their servants. The principal of these new features are the affixing to each receipt, of a summary of its different ingredients, with the exact proportion of each, and the precise time required to dress the whole. "This shows at a glance what articles have to be prepared beforehand, and the hour at which they must be ready; while it affords great facility as well for an estimate of the expense attending them." This has been attempted in other cookery-books, but never carried out so completely as in the volume before us. The directions for boning poultry, game, &c, are also entirely new; and the work is liberally illustrated with wood cuts of culinary implements—new and otherwise—and representations of dishes, comparatively little known. It should, however, be added, that the first and best attention has been bestowed on those articles of food of which the consumption is the most general, and on what are usually termed plain English dishes, judiciously mingled with such foreign ones as are commonly to be met with at all modern refined tables. Thus, we find receipts for omlets, soufflets, béchamel, maitre d'hôtel, and other French sauces, palace and lord mayor's soups, the whitebait secret, the fricandeau and salmi, the vol-au-vent and Genoises à la Reine (her Majesty's pastry), Ruth Pinch's beef-steak pudding (à la Dickens), her Majesty and Prince Albert's puddings, palace bon-bons, and Everton toffie; the receipts for dressing vegetables, and the variety of puddings, both somewhat neglected in our kitchens, are original and excellent, as are the sweet dishes. The pickling and confectionary are sufficiently copious; and the creature comforts are not forgotten—as Oxford bishop, Regent's punch, mint julep, gloria coffee, Tappington Everard cherry-brandy, Rotterdam peaches in brandy, &c. We have devoted somewhat more than usual space to our notice of this work, since we are of opinion that it is considerably the best book of its class yet produced.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Every age has its martyrs; the popular subject for sacrifice at the present moment is the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Sir James Graham's efforts to search out sedition have been stamped with public disapprobation. The misdeeds of certain unconscientious sporting speculators now threaten to seek his ruin. It have transpired that letters forwarded by post from Tattersall's have been opened before they reached the hands for which they were intended. If post-office espionage has actually been employed upon the contents of correspondence connected with racing, it follows that our state policy at these presents is divided between treason and the turf. Seriously, to what a pitch has the spirit of betting arrived, when, as it is notorious, felonies have been in a regular course of commission latterly for the purpose of gaining information as to which is the horse a great stable means to win with.

Last spring, those who were fortunate enough to avoid Bramble and chance the Red Deer, made comfortable investments. This year, the oracle is at work—therefore, "caveto be thy counsellor." During the current week, beside sport in the north, there was a good deal of gossip—a leading topic with the grumblers being the uncertain state in which the qualification or disqualification of Ironmaster, for the Derby, is permitted to remain. In the meanwhile, those who introduce him into the market, uniformly make their conditions "all on" whether they back or lay against him. This is attributed to their being behind the curtain, and having a notion how the question will be settled: it is a pity any handle has been given to such a scandal. The opinions of those who may be esteemed safe authorities, are, that the Cobweb colt, despite the flashes of favour bestowed upon him, is good for nothing; and it certainly looks like some such case. Why did they clip him, but because he could not take work enough to keep his coat fine? what do the fluctuations in the odds indicate, but that he is an infirm horse, with a party strong enough to get him up when any decent excuse is given for backing him. He has been a "card," however, for the book makers, who promise to get round this year in gallant style; and they are a dashing body, by our Lady. There are little libraries of £10,000 books set up; to say nothing of those of £5000, £4000, and £3000, "as plenty as cheating"—how pat the proverb is!

The Chester Cup is the great creature of the ring, taking the lead from the Derby and keeping it. The field which has already been backed for it is quite unprecedented, and every day offers its bargains to the industrious. Cataract, good a favourite as he is, will, there is cause to believe, be a much better: unless he sees 4 to 1 before the race, those who have drawn his line are greatly out in their logic. Semiseria is going towards her proper place, and others will come anon. There are animals left in that have never yet been inquired after, whose owners would hardly have accepted with them for the privilege of paying £15 instead of £5. It would be unfair to deprive the curious in canvassing a racing field, of the pleasure of picking out their own prizes, for we could point to more than one that would be sporting investments at fifties to one . . . . One turns to these theories not alone for their intrinsic worth, but because of the dearth of all else in sporting. The worst season for scent, and everything else in the modern annals of fox-hunting, is at an end, or ought to be, for the vixens are almost everywhere leaving, and there are not so many foxes in these battue days, that masters of hounds can afford to destroy them wholesale. The coursing at Liverpool and elsewhere, was sadly curtailed of its due proportions, and beyond these, there is nothing left the lover of woodcraft—unless he affect the catgut, and as the song goes "angles immensely for trout" With the mercury at set frost, perhaps we shall be spared writing what we think the christian man deserves to be put to for pastime, who takes to rod and river for amusement.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—Several hundred pounds laid out on Cataract, Semiseria, and Yheomun ac Knuc, failed to disturb their positions in any material degree; nevertheless, the general feeling was decidedly favourable, and they are obviously destined to see a better day. Except on these exclusives, nothing was done to call for observation.——The Derby. Large sums were laid out on Idas, Cobweb colt, Mentor, Clear-the-way, and Fitz Allen, with as much—rather as little—influence as the Cup investments. In fact, the day's business, if not absolutely dull, was piano. When the weather opens, the backers, we take it, will "come out."

The Oxford and Cambridge Grand Eight-Oared Match.—The grand eight-oared match between the gentlemen of the above Universities, will take place on the 15th of March (next Saturday). The course was, at first, intended to be between Putney and Westminster, or the former place and Hammersmith; but we now understand that the contest will be decided between Putney and Mortlake. The match appears to excite much interest, and the Oxford gentlemen, from their success at the Henley and the Royal Thames Regattas, last year, are the favourites. The result will be given in the late edition of our journal of next week.

IRELAND.

The Late Mr. Otway Cave.—The widow of the late Hon. R. Otway Cave found amongst her deceased husband's private records, an imperfect memorandum of his desire to convey £20,000 to Sir De Lacy Evans, as a testimony of personal regard. With an affectionate respect for her late partner, this high-minded lady promptly acted upon the minute, and transmitted the whole of the above sum to the gallant officer.—Limerick Chronicle.—[A sort of contradiction to this account has appeared in the London papers, but it is admitted that the statement is substantially correct.]

Loss of Life on Athlone Lake.—The following letter, dated Athlone March 22, describes another calamitous accident, with the loss of eight lives:—"Yesterday an accident occurred on Lough Rea, near Athlone, by which eight persons lost their lives. A new quarry was lately opened at Coorsin Point, opposite Hare Island, for the purpose of supplying stone for the docks about to be erected at Athlone, and after the workmen had closed their labour for the day some had to cross the ferry to their homes. Nine men and two women got into a boat for that purpose, and were not more than a few yards from the shore when the boat upset, and eight of the men were drowned. There were numbers of persons on shore, but they could give no assistance to those in the water, which was very deep at the point where the calamity occurred. One of the women owed her escape to a bag of bran, which was fastened on her back and kept her afloat. Lord Castlemaine happened to be one of the spectators of this calamity, and did all in his power to procure aid for the sufferers."

Accident on the Royal Canal.—The passage-boat, which was about leaving Longford for Dublin on Monday, had her second cabin filled with emigrants, the friends of whom collected in great numbers to bid them farewell. Before leaving the harbour the boat was moved out from the quay, to prevent any one who were not passengers from getting on board, and having been moved towards the opposite side, the crowd on the bank ran round to get to speak to their friends. On perceiving this the passengers simultaneously rushed to the windows, and the weight being thus brought all one side caused the boat to lurch, the water rushed in at the windows, and, in the confusion to escape, five persons were suffocated. The catastrophe was purely accidental, and was owing solely to the anxiety of those on board rushing to one side of the boat, whereby she was over balanced.

Fire in Westminster.—On Monday night between eleven and twelve a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Quin, general dealer, No. 88, Great Peter-street, Westminster; and although the engines were soon on the spot, the building was gutted, and some of the adjoining property had a narrow escape. The origin of the fire is unknown.

A Child Choked with a Lemon Drop.—An inquest was held on Tuesday night, at Birmingham, on the body of a child, five months old, named William Humphries, whose death was occasioned by the following singular accident:—George Humphries, deposed as follows:—The deceased was my son. On Sunday morning last I took him over in my arms to my wife's mother, Mrs. Hill; she took the child from me, and then held a lemon drop between her thumb and finger, to his mouth; he sucked it some time, until it had got quite thin, and it somehow slipped into his throat. The child then began to strain and gasp for breath, and went quite blue in the face. The drop, however, came away in two or three minutes, but the child was dead. A verdict of "Accidental death from suffocation by a lemon drop," was recorded.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange (Friday).—Our arrivals of wheat continue good from the northern counties; hence the show of samples here this morning was on the increase. The finest qualities of both red and white commanded a steady sale, at full prices; but all other kinds were a slow inquiry. Foreign wheat, free of duty, was in fair request, and previous rates were well supported; but common lock was a mere drug. The supply of barley was quite equal to the demand, and it was only the finest quality that could be disposed of; all other kinds were very dull. The malt trade was heavy, and, where sales were pressed, lower rates were taken for all descriptions. Oats were extremely dull, and rather cheaper. Beans, peas, and flour, as on Monday.

Arrivals.—English wheat, 7310; barley, 4020; oats, 6830 quarters. Irish: wheat, —; barley, —; oats, 1440 quarters. Foreign: wheat, —; barley, —; oats, — quarters. Flour, 7620 sacks; malt, 9260 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 48s; ditto, white, 46s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 30s to 36s; grinding barley, 27s to 30s; distilling, 26s to 30s; malting ditto, 33s to 35s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 58s to 63s; brown ditto, 56s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 59s to 60s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 23s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s to 22s; ditto, white, 21s to 23s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 38s to 40s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 35s to 36s; white, 33s to 35s; boilers, 36s to 38s, per quarter. Town made flour, 42s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, —s to —s; Dantzig, red, 38s to 43s; white, 50s to 54s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s to 24s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 16s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to—, per barrel

Seed Market.—Although the season is now advancing, very little is doing in either red or white clover seed, yet prices are supported. Canary seed dull, and 1s to 2s per cwt cheaper. There is less doing in cakes and linseed, and some holders evince a disposition to accept of lower terms.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic, crushing' 40s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa —s to —s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s, per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 18s, per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 8s to 14s; white ditto, 10s to 13s. Tares, 6s to 7s 6d, per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £24 to £26, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 5s. per 1000: Rapeseed cakes £6 15s to £7, per ton. Canary, 44s to 48s, per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 0d; barley, 32s 3d; oats, 21s 7d; rye, 32s 6d; beans, 34s 9d; peas, 35s 7d.

Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 45s 4d; barley, 33s 0d; oats, 21s 6d; rye, 31s 1d; beans, 35s 2d; peas, 35s 6d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 5s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 7s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—The stock of tea in London is now 25,562,000 lbs against 25,208,000 lbs at the same time in 1844. Since these returns were made up, about 5,000,000 lbs have been received from China Privately a good business is doing in fine congous, at full prices, but green teas have a downward tendency. At auction, on Tuesday, 1297 packages of Assam—in the quality of which a great improvement over previous importations was noticed—were nearly all disposed of, at fair prices. On Wednesday about 9000 packages of congou and other kinds were offered. Although the biddings were by no means animated—pouchongs and hysons having declined 1d per lb—5800 packages were actually disposed of.

Sugar.—As nearly the whole of the grocers are purchasing merely for immediate consumption, owing to the proposed changes in the duties, the market, for all kinds of West India sugar, is very heavy, and the late advance is with difficulty supported. The same causes have influenced the sale for all other qualities of raw, as well as refined sugars, yet very little alteration can be noticed in prices.

Coffee.—Although there is more business doing in Ceylon coffee, the highest price of good ordinary does not exceed 46s per cwt. All other kinds of coffee dull, but not cheaper.

Rice.—Bengal is in fair request, at full prices; low to middling white producing 10s 6d to 11s 6d per cwt.

Fruit.—This market has a very inactive appearance, yet prices of most descriptions of fruit may be considered about stationary.

Cotton.—Since the sales, about 5,000 bales have been disposed of, at previous rates.

Oils.—This market is not quite so active as previously advised, yet prices are supported.

Provisions.—The cold weather has had considerable effect upon the demand for most kinds of provisions. Dutch butter has been in request, at 104s to 110s for fine Friesland, and 88s to 106s for the middling and inferior kinds. In some cases, fine parcels of Irish butter have commanded a trifle more money. Cork have sold at 90s to 96s; Clonmel 90s to 98s; Carlow 90s to 98s: and Sligo 88s to 93s, per cwt. The best kinds of bacon are 1s per cwt dearer; but other qualities cannot be sold except at a decline of from 2s to 3s per cwt. Prime sizeable Waterford 40s to 43s, heavy 38s to 40s; sizeable Limerick 39s to 40s, and heavy 38s to 39s per cwt. Lard, hams, and all other kinds of provisions, rule about stationary.

Tallow.—Holders of Tallow being more inclined to realise, have submitted to a further reduction in the quotations. Sales of P. Y. C. have been made at 39s to 39s 3d for fair, and 39s 6d for really fine. Town Tallow is very abundant, and may be had at 38s to 39s 6d net cash.

Hops (Friday).—As might be expected, the supply of all kinds of hops offering here is very scanty, yet the general demand is in a sluggish state, at barely, but at nothing quotable beneath, last week's prices. Sussex Pockets, £7 0s to £8 0s; Wealds, £7 10s to £8 8s; Mid Kent, £8 0s to £10 15s; East Kent, £8 5s to £10 0s; Choice ditto, £10 5s to £12 12s; Mid Kent bags, £7 15s to £8 15s; East Kent ditto, £11 0s to £12 8s.

Coals (Friday).—Adairs', 15s 6d; Bradilyll's Hetton, 20s 3d; Hetton, 20s: South Killoc, 19s; Adelaide, 19s; South Durham, 18s 3d; Wylam, 15s 9d; Lambton, 19s 9d; and Stewarts', 20s per ton.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; useful ditto, £4 12s to £5; fine upland ditto, £5 3s to £5 8s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6; oat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s; wheat straw, £1 18s to £2; per load.

Wool.—Both Foreign and Colonial qualities are in sluggish request, at late rates, but English parcels are the turn dearer.

Potatoes.—There is rather an extensive supply of potatoes offering at the water-side. Selected parcels are in request, at 65s to 80s; but other kinds are dull, at 45s to 60s; per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—For the time of year the supply of beasts on sale here to-day was rather numerous, but of very middling quality; yet the beef trade was in a depressed state, and Monday's quotations were with difficulty supported. No foreign stock was offering, but we had 100 Scots by sea from Scotland. The numbers of sheep were extremely small, owing to which the mutton trade was active, at full prices. Calves were in short supply and steady demand, at previous figures. In pigs a steady business was doing. Milch cows sold slowly, at from £14 to £19 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 4d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 2d; prime large oxen, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 8d to 3s 10d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 8d to 3s 0d; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 6d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large coarse calves, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 6d; neat small porkers, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; suckling calves, 18s 0d to 30s 0d; and quarter old store pigs, 16s 0d to 20s 0d each. Beasts, 617; cows, 172; sheep, 2380; calves, 109; pigs, 314.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—Prime beef and mutton sold firmly, other kinds of meat slowly, at our quotations:—Per 8lbs. by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; prime large ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 2d; prime small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 10d to 3s 10d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 10d to 5s 0d; small pork, 4s 0d to 4s 4d. Robert Herbert.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English market has betrayed some animation this week, although speculation in all the British Securities appears, for the present, to be abandoned. The Chancery broker on Tuesday made an extensive purchase, which, coupled with some others, on behalf of private individuals, gave an impetus to quotations. Reduced Three per Cents. closed on Wednesday, preparatory to the April dividend. The Exchequer market has maintained a tolerable degree of firmness, the last quotations being 63 to 65. Consols slightly receded towards the close of the week, ultimately closing at 99⅞ for money, and 100¼ for account. Bank Stock is firm, at 213½; India, 282; India Bonds, 70s.

The dulness of the Foreign House was a little relieved on Wednesday by some extensive purchases in Spanish and Portuguese. The news from Lisbon continuing favourable, a number of bargains was done in the Converted Stock, which advanced to, and closed at 65 to 66. Mexican, which had risen a shade on Monday, receded to its old quotation on Wednesday, and at the close of the week quoted 36⅜. Brazilian is 85. Peruvian, 31. Spanish Actives advanced on Thursday to 29, and close at that price. The Three per Cents are 40¾. Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents last quote 63⅜. Four per Cent. Certificates, 99½.

The Railway Market has been tolerably firm during the week; speculation having been principally confined to the French lines. Some extraordinary advances have occurred in these undertakings, for which no reasonable cause can be assigned. Boulogne and Amiens advanced on Monday to 12, and Orleans and Bordeaux to 10; Great Northern of France also improved to 6⅜; and these quotations have been firmly maintained. The reports of the Board of Trade, that have been published by direction of the House of Commons, have not affected favourably any of the approved lines. It is generally felt that the decision of the board from its constitution can only be guided by ex parte statements, and that many of the approved lines will be open to rejection, from the slovenly manner in which the plans, &c., have been presented to Parliament. The discovery of such circumstances can only be made by the rigid examination of a committee, to whom the opposing parties, such as prompters and guides, by directing attention to the obstacles and impracticabilities of the line, both as regards its promotion or ultimate success in all its details. This is especially applicable to two lines, upon which the report has just been published, and will doubtless occur in many instances. The gradual decline of the proposed lines since the opening of Parliament affords a tolerable proof that this view has already suggested itself to the wary portion of the speculators. The final quotations of the week are, Birmingham and Gloucester, 134; Bristol and Exeter, 83½; Caledonian, 7⅞; Cambridge and Lincoln, 3⅞; Churnet Valley, 6⅝; Direct Northern, 2⅜; Eastern Counties, 17⅜; Great North of England, 188; Great Western, 177; Edinburgh and Glasgow quarters, 5⅜; Lineford, Farnham, and Portsmouth, 5; Lancaster and Carlisle, 34; Birmingham Stock, 233; Blackwall, 7⅜; Croydon, 18; Greenwich, 11; Sheffield and Manchester, 103; South Western, 80; London and York, 7; Manchester and Leeds, 147; Newark and Sheffield, 1⅜; Newcastle and Berwick, 14⅜; North Kent, 3; Rugby, Worcester, and Tring, 3¼; Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 4½; Trent Valley, 22; Boulogne and Amiens, 11¼; Bordeaux and Toulouse, 2⅞; Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Cette, 2⅝; Great North of France, 6½; Orleans and Vierzon, 16½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 9⅜; Rouen and Havre, 31½; Paris and Rouen 44⅜; Paris and Orleans, 49⅝; Tours and Nantes, 2½.

Saturday Morning.—The English Funds were quiet yesterday. Consols closed at 99⅞ to par. Portuguese Stock advanced to 68 for Money, and Spanish Actives to 29⅜ to ½. The Share Market was buoyant: South Eastern declined to 41½, and Croydon improved to 18¾.

THE HISTORY OF
MARGARET CATCHPOLE, A SUFFOLK GIRL.

"Truth is stranger than fiction. We have here a veritable history, with incidents more startling and extraordinary than are to be found in any romance with which we are acquainted; and a poor Suffolk girl exhibiting qualities, mental and physical, and an enduring, faithful, and disinterested attachment, which, if described as the attributes of the heroine of a novel, would have been deemed overcharged and exaggerated; whilst the happy catastrophe would have been considered as an overstrained and improbable event. The details with which this strange eventful history is filled up are full of interest; and the accounts of the smuggling exploits of Will Lund and his confederates are marked by features of vivid excitement. The work is edited by the Rev. R. Cobbold, of Wortham, Suffolk."—Norfolk Chronicle

DRESS COIFFURES.—As it has become necessary, in accordance with the prevailing mode, to dispose the Hair in effective masses, or in conspicuous nœuds, a certain body of hair is essential to afford the coiffeur the means of producing the arrangement. Thinness or weakness of the Hair is, in these cases, a complete obstacle, and it is only to be effectually remedied by the application of OLDRIDGE'S BALM of COLUMBIA, which prevents the Hair from turning grey, and the first application causes it to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off and a few bottles restore it again. Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine. Oldridge's Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand.

THE Readers of this Paper are most respectfully referred to the representation of removing King's-cross, in the ILLUSTRATED NEWS of Feb. 15th, 1845, in page 108, where may be seen, in the background, Mr CABBURN'S DISPENSARY, for the CURE of RHEUMATISM, GOUT, WEAKNESS of the LIMBS, SPINAL AFFECTIONS, &c., at which place one of the most effectual remedies ever offered to the Public may be had in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., 22s., and of all principal Vendors in the Kingdom. It is positively under the sanction and recommendation of the nobility and faculty, as may be seen in Bradshaw's Railway Guide.—Ask for CABBURN'S Oil for the Cure of Rheumatism; likewise a sovereign remedy for Chilblains.

CHARLES VYSE, 30, Ludgate-street, Manufacturer of LEGHORNS and STRAWS to the Royal Family, has much pleasure in informing Ladies residing in the Country that he is enabled, by the widely-spread system of railway communication, to execute orders for the above useful and fashionable articles as effectively and expeditiously as if they were residing in the environs of the Great Metropolis. Gentlemen, also wishing to purchase for their friends in the Country, may do so with perfect confidence, as the Establishment has a FIXED PRICE. A Post-office Order required on delivery of goods, which, if not suitable, shall be exchanged until they meet with entire approbation.—30, Ludgate-street.—N.B. Milliners and Straw Hatters supplied with Pattern Bonnets.

CHARLES VYSE, Importer of FANCY STRAW BONNETS and FRENCH MILLINERY to the Royal Family, informs the Nobility, Gentry, and Public, he has received from the first Magazin of Paris, the fashions for the month of March. Gentlemen wishing to select for Ladies, are respectfully informed the Establishment has a FIXED PRICE; and any purchase not approved is immediately exchanged.—30, Ludgate-street.—N B. Milliners and Straw Hatters supplied with PATTERN BONNETS.

VAUXHALL COMPOSITE CANDLES, 8½d. per lb.—PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES, 10½d. per lb. These are the London cash prices, but the Country ones vary with the distance from town. Both sorts burn exactly as well as the finest wax, and are cheaper, allowing for the light, than Tallow Moulds. Sold wholesale to the trade by Edward Price and Co., Belmont, Vauxhall; Palmer and Co., Sutton-street, Clerkenwell; and William Marchant, 253, Regent Circus, Oxford-street. Until these Candles become generally sold throughout the country, EDWARD PRICE and Co. will supply any private families unable to obtain them in their own neighbourhood, with a quantity not less than £5 worth, direct from the factory. On a line being addressed to Belmont, Vauxhall, enclosing a Post-office Order for £5 (payable to Edward Price and Co., not to Edward Price or Mr. Price), they will forward a box of the Vauxhall Composite, or of the others, or a mixed box as may be directed, to that exact amount.

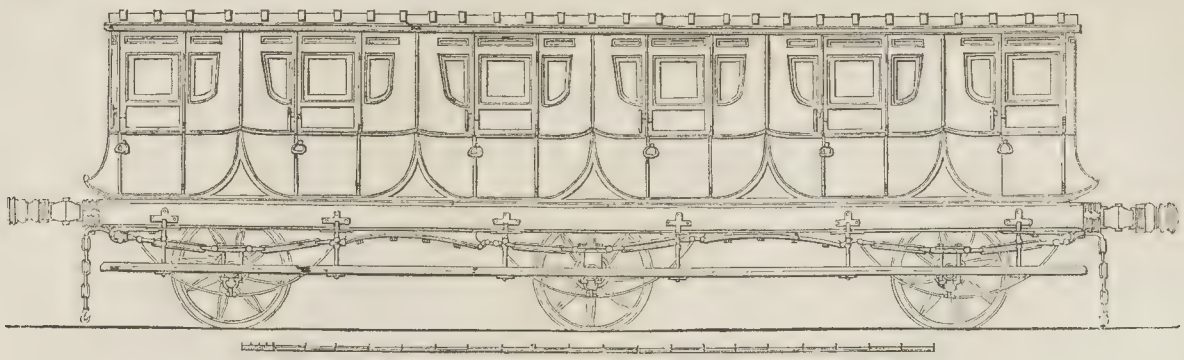
SIR ROBERT PEEL has not made any alteration in the duty on Tea, and as the Income-tax will be continued, it behoves the economist, when purchasing articles of daily consumption, to look to quality as well as price. We hold the doctrine that "nothing is cheap that is not good." The Black Tea at Four and Sixpence per pound is both cheap and good, as are all articles sold by DAKIN and COMPANY, Tea-merchants, at NUMBER ONE, St. Paul's Churchyard.

SEVERE COLDS.—But very few persons at this season are without Colds, and they being the precursors of many serious maladies, all should adopt the most speedy remedy. Nothing is more soothing to the irritated organs than pure Gruel, and EDWARDS' PREPARED GROATS will be found superior to any ever produced for making this diet to the utmost perfection, and as a daily Food for Children and Invalids it is invaluable. Sold by all respectable Grocers, Oilmen, &c., in packets and canisters, 6d. and 1s. each, and wholesale and for exportation, by EDWARDS BROTHERS, 99, Blackfriars-road, London.



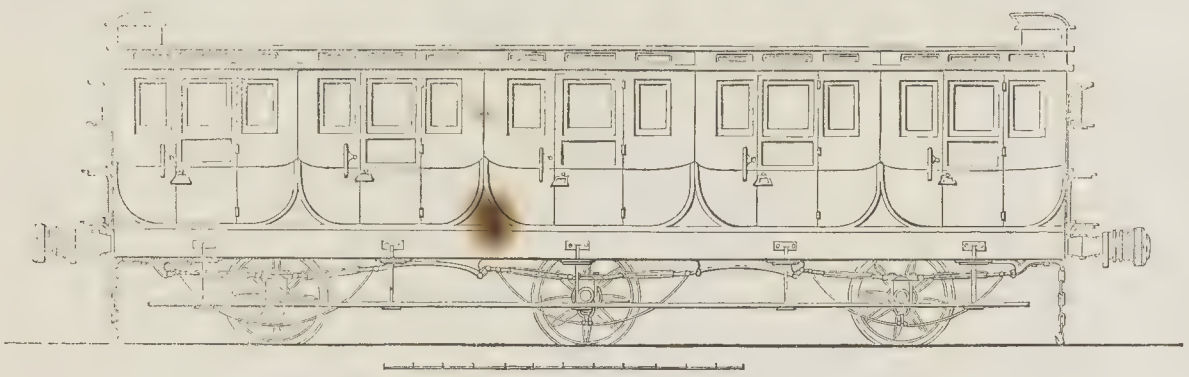
FOR THE HAIR.—DAWSON'S AUXILIAR, a fragrant vegetable Specific, preserves Hair in youthful beauty, and restores it when bald or grey, at any age, by peculiarly replacing the deficiency of natural nutriment, which causes the decline. The most unsightly Hair is speedily made luxuriantly beautiful. 3s. 6d., 7s., 10s. 6d., and 21s. per bottle. DAWSON'S DEPILATORY eradicates, in a few minutes, superfluous hairs from any part of the skin, without the least unpleasantness, leaving the skin perfectly fair and soft. 3s. 6d and 6s. per packet. Sold by the Proprietor, next the new Church, Clapton Gate; Barclay, 95, Farringdon-street; Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Prout, 229, Strand; Butler, 4, St. Paul's; and other Chemists, Perfumers, &c. CAUTION.—Particularly ask for Dawson's, and observe the signature, "R. Dawson," on the envelopes.

BLOOD to the HEAD—IMPURITY of BLOOD—DERANGEMENT of HEALTH.—An EXTRAORDINARY CURE by HOLLOWAY'S PILLS!—Mr. Willis, a retired publican, living in Penton-street, Pentonville, suffered continually from a dangerous determination of blood to the head, with benumbed feelings in his limbs—health much impaired. The blood in a very bad state, often heavy and drowsy, with swimmings in the head. The stomach generally out of order, with little appetite. Every means had failed to restore him to health, but at last, he, like thousands of others, had been completely invigorated and restored to the highest state of health by Holloway's Pills.—Sold (also Holloway's Ointment) at Professor Holloway's Establishment, 244, Strand (where advice may be had gratis), and by all Medicine Venders.

MOURNING—Court, Family, and Complimentary.—The Proprietors of the London General Mourning Warehouse, Nos. 247 and 249, Regent-street, beg respectfully to remind families requiring mourning attire, that every article of the very best description, requisite for a complete outfit of Mourning, may be procured from this Establishment at a moment's notice. Widows' and Family Mourning is always kept made up, and a note particularizing the mourning required, will insure immediate attention either in town or country. Ladies requiring Silks or Velvets for Dresses, Mantles, Cloaks, &c., are particularly invited to a trial of the new Corbeau Silks and Velvets introduced at this house. They will be found not only more durable, but the colour very superior, unaffected by the strongest acid, or even sea-water. Black and Grey, and Fancy Mourning Silks, Cashmeres, Plaids, and Merinoes, of every description. The Show Rooms are replete with every novelty for Mourning in millinery, flowers, Tulle and Nett Sleeves, Collars, Berthes, Head-dresses, trimmings, &c. &c.—W. C. JAY and Co.

TO THE LADIES.—The high and universal celebrity which ROWLAND'S KALYDOR continues to maintain, as an active, yet mild and soothing eradicator of all impurities of the skin, is, during the present period, most pleasingly evinced. This preparation, eminently balsamic, restorative, and invigorating, is equally celebrated for safety in application, as for unfailing efficacy in removing all impurities and discolorations; and imparting a healthy freshness and transparency to the Skin and Complexion. Its universally great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled shopkeepers, who give the title of "Genuine" Kalydor to compounds of their own manufacture, of the most deleterious character, containing mineral astringents utterly inimical to the Complexion, and, by their repellent action, dangerous to health. It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the words "Rowland's Kalydor" are on the wrapper. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included. Sold by the Proprietors, A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden, and by Chemists and Perfumers.  All others are Fraudulent Imitations!!!

ROWLAND'S UNIQUE PREPARATIONS (under the patronage of the several Sovereigns and Courts of Europe, and universally preferred).—ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for the Growth, Preservation, and for Beautifying the Human Hair. Price 3s. 6d., 7s., Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s. per bottle. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for improving and beautifying the Skin and Complexion. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included. ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, for the Teeth and Gums. Price 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.
IMPORTANT INFORMATION.—Unprincipled individuals, for the sake of gaining a trifle more profit, vend the most spurious compounds under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty); they copy the labels,



GERMAN AND DANISH RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

GERMAN AND DANISH RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

We present our readers with the designs of three railway carriages, such as are used on the German and Danish lines, a system which is at present a novelty in England. These carriages were first introduced on the Hamburg line, and, we believe, by an English engineer, who had been precluded from adopting the same system in England by the inferior mechanical arrangements of the existing lines, and to which most new lines are accommodated. In Germany, a new line in a new district—the Hamburg and Bergedorf—left the engineer at liberty to use his own discretion, and the result was that he adopted six-wheel carriages, nearly thirty feet long, and of proportionate width for the narrow guage, 4ft. 8½in., and by these means he obtained as great steadiness as on the Great Western with the broad guage.

Most travellers are aware of the extremely unpleasant motion experienced on English railways, which keep the sitter in a state of constant lateral oscillation; as well as the occasional pitching, and the hard vibration in carriages which are not stuffed and lined. These unpleasant movements arise chiefly from the top-heaviness of the carriages and the insufficiency of base. The height is quite disproportioned to the length and width to permit steadiness at high velocities, and, moreover, being supported only in four points—the wheels—the least irregularity of the rails or road is communicated to the whole superincumbent mass. The base on which the wheels stand is eight feet six by four feet eight. The length of the body is seventeen to eighteen feet, and the height, between nine and ten from the rails. It is impossible that such a top-heavy construction should be steady at high velocities; and, on this account, it is found impracticable to apply elastic springs to such carriages. Were the carriages twice the length, and on six wheels, it must be obvious that both the lateral and vertical oscillation would be prevented. A carriage on six points of support could not pitch by one point or wheel falling into a hole. The difference may be thus stated. Supported on four points, the body varies its horizontal level with every inequality, i. e., the body rises and falls on the wheels. But with six or more points of support, and with great length, the body preserves its horizontal lever, while the wheels play up and down, and also laterally, to suit the inequalities. And in this mode the most perfectly elastic springs may be used, because no one spring can be unduly pressed in with a pitching movement, as is the case where there are only four points of support. And when the carriage is materially lengthened, the width may be considerably increased with great advantage, thus reducing the disproportion of height.

These carriages are also of great advantage in the number of passengers as proportioned to their wheels, and we are surprised that they have not been adopted on the English lines. The only apparent reason is that the mechanical arangements of the old lines are not adapted for turning them on the tumblers, which were originally constructed of too small size. But surely the convenience of the public, to say nothing of their greater economy, should outweigh so comparatively small an objection. We understand that Sir John Macniell has set a good example on the Irish lines, in adopting thirty feet carriages on six wheels, and is so well satisfied with the superiority to the short carriages on four wheels, that he even proposes still greater length. In the United States, we believe, some of the railway carriages are eighty feet long.

It will be seen that these German and Danish carriages are suspended on springs of a peculiar construction—we presume a German invention; and we are informed their elasticity is so perfect, that no movement or vibration is experienced even in the second-class carriages, and that persons can write and read in them with as great facility as on firm ground, even at the highest velocities. It is quite clear that they must possess great advantages, or they would not have been so universally adopted in Germany, in so comparatively short a space of time. We hope that the directors of the new lines about to be constructed will take care to adopt their mechanical arrangements so as not to interfere with the adoption of so marked an improvement. The small boxes to which horse transit was limited, which have been transferred to the first lines of railway, are not adapted to our improved capacities and advancing knowledge.

GERMAN AND DANISH RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

It should pique our national pride to be taught by "Young Germany" how to construct improved railway carriages. We hope that our engineers at home will go a-head even of this improved construction, and that they will give us rooms and apartments, instead of mere packing-boxes. We hope that ere long, with the advent of Free Trade, we shall repay the German enterprise by exporting to their land carriages far exceeding theirs in comfort and utility. With fair play our artisans will be the shipbuilders and carriage-builders of half the world.

DEATHS OF TWO RETIRED JUDGES.

We have, this week, to announce the deaths of two ex-Judges of eminence, Lord Wynford (formerly Chief Justice Best) and Mr. Baron Gurney.

Lord Wynford died at his seat, Leasons, Kent, on Monday, in the 82nd year of his age.

Baron Wynford, of Wynford Eagle, in the county of Dorset, P.C. and D.C.L., was so created June 5, 1829. His lordship was born 13th December, 1763. He was called to the bar by the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple in 1789, and attained the rank of sergeant-at-law in 1800; from which period he filled a large space in the public eye, having eminently distinguished himself by his eloquence, zeal, and knowledge of the intricacies of the law. In 1819 the deceased was appointed one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, and received the honour of Knighthood. In a short time afterwards he was advanced to the rank of Chief Justice of that court, but his infirmities (inveterate gout, disabling the lower extremities) induced him to retire in 1829, when he was raised to the peerage. The noble lord carried into the House of Lords his eloquence and aptitude for debate, and rendered the Conservative party, to which he was warmly attached, good service.

On the 6th of May, 1794, the deceased married Mary Anne, daughter of Jerome Knapp, Esq., by whom he had issue six sons and four daughters, The eldest son died an infant. The second, William Samuel (now Lord Wynford), was born Feb. 19, 1798.

Sir John Gurney, formerly one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer died on Saturday night last at his residence in Lincoln's Inn-fields. The father of the learned Baron was Joseph Gurney, Esq., of Walworth, and his mother was the daughter of William Brodie, Esq., formerly of Mansfield. This learned and eminent personage was born in the year 1768, and therefore at the time of his death was in the 77th year of his age. In the year 1793 he was called to the bar, and in four years from that time (1797) he married the daughter of Dr. Hawes. In the early portion of his professional career he devoted himself very sedulously, and very successfully, to Old Bailey practice, and, with his vigorous talents and unceasing industry, he soon attained a considerable reputation as a criminal lawyer. Twenty-three years elapsed before his professional station procured for him the honour and advantage of a silk gown. It was in the year 1823 that he was called within the bar. As a judge, he certainly never attained even that relative station amongst his learned brethren which he enjoyed at the bar; but in criminal cases he sometimes appeared to great advantage. In all the relations of life the learned Baron was most exemplary; and his charities were both extensive and unostentatious.

There has just been completed, at the manufacture of the Gobelins, Paris, an immense and magnificent carpet for the great hall of the Ambassadors at Versailles. It was commenced as long ago as 1783. At the four corners are bouquets of roses from drawings by Madame Elizabeth, the sister of Louis XVI.

The Russia Company.—Last Saturday this wealthy company celebrated another anniversary at the London Tavern, W. Astell, Esq., M.P., in the chair. None of the Cabinet Ministers could attend; but Sir G. Clerk, Viscount Canning, and several other gentlemen connected with the Government were present. On the health of the Russian Ambassador being given, Baron Brunow described the gratification felt by the Emperor of Russia on his last visit. "I remember," said the Baron, "the day when his Majesty—during his visit to Windsor Castle—walked down the race course at Ascot, surrounded by crowds of persons, but himself almost unattended, and entirely without display, with the fullest confidence in, and glad to find himself once more among the people of England. (Cheers.) I remember, also, the military review that took place at Windsor on the same occasion, and, the moment when the Duke of Wellington passed by at the head of his regiment, the Emperor put spurs to his horse and rode up to shake hands with the illustrious Duke—(cheers)—a proof at once of his Majesty's respect for that great man, and a pledge of the continued peace of Europe. (Loud cheers.) Never, too, shall I forget the day of his Majesty's departure. The road from Buckingham Palace to Woolwich was crowded by great multitudes of people, and the river was thickly covered with steamers, and ships, and boats. I can assure you it was a magnificent display of wealth, activity, and commercial prosperity. (Cheers.) The Emperor expressed his gratitude to Prince Albert—his warmest gratitude—for the attention which had been paid to him; and his Majesty was pleased to say to myself, also, that it was one of the most magnificent sights he had ever witnessed."—Sir G. Clerk, on the part of the Ministers, expressed regret that they were unavoidably absent, and said they had done all in their power to cement and render more strong those bonds of union between Great Britain and Russia, whose representative was now present at their board, and whose conduct so much contributed to promote those relations which tended to the welfare of all classes in the two nations.

Fire in Oxford-street.—On Sunday afternoon last a somewhat serious fire took place in a range of buildings in the occupation of Mr. Evans, bookbinder and fancy stationer, and Mr. W. Leader, coachmaker, in Berwick-street and Noel-street, Oxford-street. The accident was occasioned by two children, who were playing with a lucifer match, in Mr. Evans's workshop; having ignited it they threw it among a mass of paper shavings and ran off. The place was soon enveloped in flames, and although the engines were promptly on the spot, the conflagration was not got under until Mr. Evans's workshop and stock were destroyed; his warehouse and the goods in it had been much damaged, and considerable damage was also done by fire and water to five contiguous houses in the two streets above mentioned. Most of the property was insured.

Death of a Commissioner of Customs.—The Hon. William Cust, Commissioner of Customs, died on Tuesday morning. His decease was not altogether unexpected, as he had been in a declining state of health for a considerable time past, which has prevented him from attending his duties at the Board. Mr. Cust's death places a Commissionership of Customs at the disposal of the Government, being the third since their accession to office.

CHESS.

Answers to Correspondents.—"Miranda's" solution of Problem 58 is incorrect. If White for his 2nd move plays the Queen to Kt's 4th (checking), Black may obviously capture the Queen with his Rook.

"W. W. M."—No. 56 is radically wrong.

"Lionel," Warwick.—From inquiries we learn that there were above fifty amateurs who sent the correct solution of the Indian Problem to the editor of "The Chess Player's Chronicle," although, from the late period of the month when many of the communications reached him, not nearly that number of names were published.

"E. A. G."—By forcing the exchange of Queens, White would certainly have had the better game.

"Roy."—There is a very promising little chess club at Dumfries. Address a line to Major Michalowski, Dumfries.

"Queen's Pawn," Windsor.—The Problem received shall be examined, and if original and worth publication, shall appear.

"Strathbogie Chess Club;" "T. R.," Horncastle; "A. S.;" "Novice;" "Fowey;" "J. B.," Tuam.—The solutions are correct.

"E. A. G.," Baker-street.—Thanks for the suggestions. Mr. Lewis's address is 12, Chatham-place, Blackfriars.

"L. W.," Pershore.—The solution sent of 61 is not complete, as "L. W." will see on referring to our last Saturday's paper. There is no inaccuracy in the description of the solution to Problem 60. White's second move is "R to K R's 6th." All the moves of the White men counting from their own side of the board, and the moves of the Black pieces from their own side. In the present instance, therefore, "R to K R's 6th" is precisely the same as "R to adverse K R's 3rd."

"R. D——g," Louth.—We have to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of "R. D.'s" problems, which shall be duly examined.

"Xanthicus."—Your attempted solution is utterly incomprehensible.

"An Amateur," Wisbeach, is thanked for his offered problem.

"H. Y. Z.," Cambridge.—You have not yet hit upon the key to No. 62. Try again.

"H. P."—Quite wrong. How can you describe the move of "K to Q's R's sq" as "best," when instead of it, the King may take the B?

"Echec et Mât" must be jesting when he sends such moves as a solution to a problem.

"C. Wood," Brighton.—Next week.

"Scacchi," Glasgow, must be aware that the gentleman to whom he directs his comments, is not in any way responsible for the errors which may be found in this department of our paper prior to the 22nd of February. With respect to the particular game to which he calls attention, and which appeared a week before the date just mentioned, we have been at the trouble of playing it carefully over, and find it perfectly correct in every move.

Solutions to problems by "F. N. M.," "G. B. M.," "O. K.," "W. A. B.," "Charioca," "L. G."—Quite wrong all of them!

"A. F."—We have no space for the "laws of chess now in vogue." They will be found in the "Chess Player's Chronicle."

"A Constant Reader," Exeter, can have looked but very superficially at the problem and solution.

"C. B. M.," Liverpool.—Pray look again at the solution and the note thereto.

"E. E. O."—We have not time to study the problem sent, this week. Has it been published before?

"An Amateur," T——— Rectory.—It shall be reported on in our next.

"R. M———n," Birmingham.—See the "Chess Player's Chronicle," Vol. I., which contains a full account of the famous Automaton Chess Player.

And Black resigned.

* Black's best move, we believe, would now be to take the K B's Pawn with his K's Rook; White dare not then capture the Rook or the Queen, because checkmate would be the result in either case in two moves; White however, might play as follows:—

White.	Black.
	28. K R takes K B P
29. Q to her B's 8th (ch)	R takes Q; or (a)
30. R takes Q

And the game should be drawn.

	(a) 29. K R to B's sq (discovering ch)
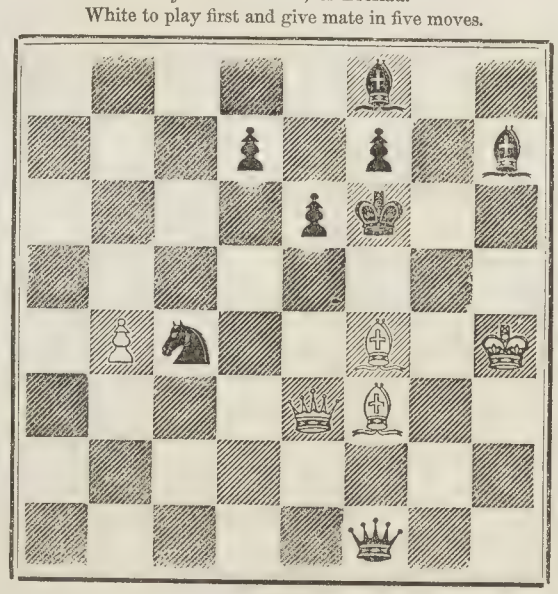
30. R takes Q	R takes Q

Drawn game.

If Black, in this variation, at his 29th move, play the King to R's 2nd White can safely take the Q's R with his Q.

Solution to Problem, No. 62.



White.	Black.
1. Kt to Q's 7th ch	K to Q Kt 2nd (best) *

* Observe, if the King is played either to Q B's sq or Q R's sq, white mates directly with his Rook.

Problem, No. 63.

By M. Anderssen, of Breslau.

White to play first and give mate in five moves.

Election for East Kent.—Mr. Deedes was on Monday elected, without opposition, to fill the vacancy in the representation of East Kent, caused by the elevation of Sir E. Knatchbull to the peerage. He was proposed by Sir E. Deering, and seconded by Sir Brooke Bridges. In answer to some questions, Mr. Deedes professed a determination to support the Church, and not to sanction any further diminution of agricultural protection. One elector warned him not to imitate Sir Edward Knatchbull, who had been carried into power to protect the agriculturists, and had treated them worse than their open enemies.

Conflagration at Peterborough.—There has been a fire in Peterborough, which has terminated in the loss of property to the amount of not less than £2000. It originated in the candle-house belonging to Mr. Wm. Vergette, Long-causeway, not far distant from the market-place, and extended to several adjoining houses.

THE COLONIAL OFFICE.

IN THE Empire of England it is said, the sun never sets. We have heard the phrase introduced in after-dinner speeches, nay, even in Parliamentary orations, with considerable effect. It turns a sentence prettily enough, the figure possessing a kind of indefinite magnificence which enquiring too curiously would perhaps spoil: it has also the sanction of age, and may, therefore, be allowed to pass current as a fact; the Romans and the Spaniards have used it before us, but it is not the worse for that; as a figure of speech it is quite as good as new. But, granting that there is always "smile and sunshine," somewhere in the dominions of her Majesty, we must still allow that "discontent sits heavy" on many portions of that wide empire, and on none more heavily or more constantly than those which have the calamity of being governed by the clerks of her Majesty's Colonial Office.

The damaging debate of Tuesday evening, when the transactions between the Colonial Office and the New Zealand Company were brought under the notice of the House of Commons, will have the effect of drawing public attention to what government by the Colonial Office really is; from the nature of the system itself, it cannot be good; that it is actually bad we see, and, all things considered, it is rather a matter of wonder it is not a great deal worse.

The head of the office is one of the leaders of the political party in power, and is changed with every political crisis. He is, of course, a man of ability, for without talents no man in England can rank among statesmen; but the misfortune is, that his ability is frequently misplaced; his whole life has probably been that of most of the English aristocracy—a youth passed in school and college, and a manhood consumed in the party struggles of the House of Commons, till circumstances or inclination transfer him to the calmer atmosphere of the House of Lords. He is thus intimately acquainted with all the relations of party in England, is practised in the "forms" of Parliament and office, is unmatched in debate, is industrious from choice, and honourable as a necessity of his birth and position; but with all these qualities he makes a bad director of the interests trusted to his guidance and control. The reasons of this failure—not peculiar to any one government, but common to all—are simple enough. No single mortal man, physically and mentally constituted as men are, could possibly rule the vast surface, the immense population, and the varied interests of the colonies of England. Countries that differ in climate, productions, and character; people that have no resemblance in manners, laws, language, or religion; some subjected to us by treaties, more by conquest; many the descendants of English colonists, or settlers new from England itself, are all governed by an office in Downing-street: and how is that office constituted? The chief of it is removeable, and is often removed, either by a change in the Parliamentary majority, or to suit what are called "Ministerial arrangements;" for all his information as to the past business of the department he is dependent on his subordinates, able men in their way we have no doubt, but, like their superior, home born and bred, having no knowledge of the "kingdoms, nations, and tongues," so much of whose welfare depends on them, save what they have derived from the pigeon-holes of the office, or from the cold, lifeless, and formal reports of Governors and Secretaries, all written according to the rules of official etiquette. What they do not possess, they of course cannot impart; and setting out with a foundation of ignorance to work on, and adding to it the difficulty of communicating with places at such great distances, the lapse of time and change of circumstances produced by it between the sending home of instructions, the delay in giving them, and their arrival at the place to which they are sent, often too late to be useful, we can form some faint notion of that mass of confusion, incacpacity, and mischief which goes by the name of the Colonial Office. England has had some severe lessons on this subject, has sustained very material injury from the system. It was colonial officeism, if we may coin the word, that lost America; as if to prove that the defects of the system were still producing their natural results at a much more recent period, we have seen Canada driven into rebellion, gaining then, as a matter of course, what might as well have been granted before — some voice in its own government. But a "Colonial Office" never thinks it possible it can be wrong, and makes no concession till too late. In all local matters, we believe, there is no government so good as that which men would frame for themselves, if allowed to do so; to none but perfect wisdom can we safely trust absolute power. We know there are Governments which, as far as the physical interests of their subjects are concerned, do exercise a despotic authority with a fair amount of prudence and success. But they are in the midst of those they rule; they adapt their measures to the peculiarities of the land and its inhabitants: the same system applied to the government of many people scattered over the whole surface of the globe would utterly fail—would become, in fact, what the system of our Colonial Office is at present.

There are endless disputes between the "Office" and those Colonies where a local Legislature exists. But these are as nothing compared with those that arise between it and a "Crown Colony," that is blessed with a Governor and Council without any check from popular representatives. The Governor is appointed at home, on account of his family connections, or parliamentary influence; whether he is fit for the post is quite a secondary consideration, and pretty much a matter of chance. He is at a great distance from the controlling power, and is left for long periods to act on his own discretion, which often turns out to be the reverse of what the world calls by that name. If the inhabitants remonstrate, he falls back on his "instructions;" they may be grievously injured, but they cannot resist, for he has the authority of the Crown, and Englishmen will suffer much before they openly rebel against the representative of their Sovereign. If they appeal to the "office," the Governor is always right and the people wrong; if they get their case carried into Parliament, though the Government confess themselves entirely ignorant of facts well known to everybody else, and make a most lame and wretched defence, there are plenty of gentlemen ready to testify to the many virtues and amiable qualities of the Governor; the settlers are being ruined and the colony destroyed certainly, but then the Governor is such an honourable, such an excellent, such an amiable man! This evidence to character is very worthless in such cases; it is no defence at all. Both parties are right, but they see the man under two very different aspects. His friends have met him on terms of equality, and know him only in the intercourse of social life, as the pleasant companion of the dinner-table, or the club; and to the qualities they have proved, they bear testimony. But the complainants have seen in him only the man in office, a superior in rank, holding power that he h[illegible] their injury and ruin, deaf to all remonstrances, careless reproof. What is his amiability or any other of his social qualities to them? They do not dine, or vote, or hunt in his company, and to them he is a mischievous blunderer and no more; so as they think of him they speak, and are perfectly just in so doing. We are far too indulgent to well-intentioned incapacity in places of trust. To those whose fortunes are wrecked by such a man's mismanagement, it is no answer to allege the "amiable" character of the instrument of mischief. Where vigourous action is required, incapacity is a crime, for which those who select such damagers of the community are responsible.

We have not gone into the particulars of this dispute between the Colonial Office and New Zealand. We have taken the general features of the case, because it is a type of a class, and also an illustration of a system, that cannot too soon be changed. Had our Indian Empire been governed by the same means, it would long since have fallen to pieces, and England would have descended in the rank of nations. From the debate of Tuesday night, take this one fact—stated by the Under Secretary of the Colonies himself—that of all the serious occurrences in New Zealand—of all the insane freaks of the Governor—his paper money and taxes on cattle, made known through the public journals in December last, the Government itself, from its own officers, knows nothing at all! Could a folio volume of comments equal this acknowledgment by the Crown, as an exposure of the working of the system? It is the Colonial Office all over, and might be matched by many cases quite as extraordinary

THE EXPLOSION AT BLACKWALL.

Our engraving represents the scene of the late fatal explosion, in the yard of Messrs. Samuda, the eminent engineers, at Blackwall, of which we gave full particulars last week.

On Monday there was an adjourned inquest at Poplar upon Thomas Wright, aged thirty-six years; Richard Grimes, aged twenty-nine years; and George Chapman, aged twenty-six years, the unfortunate sufferers by the explosion. Several witnesses were examined, but their evidence did not elicit the cause of the accident. According to one witness, the pressure on the boiler at the time of the accident was not more than twenty pounds to the square inch. The engineer, Mr. Lowe, not being well enough to attend, the inquiry was adjourned till Monday next.

Mr. John Barnes, an engineer of high standing, will, it is stated, be examined at the next meeting of the jury.

A great deal of sympathy is expressed in the neighbourhood for the widows and families of the sufferers, and it is proposed to raise a subscription for their relief. Certainly a case more deserving the notice of the benevolent has seldom occurred.

The five men who were conveyed to the London Hospital, after the explosion at Messrs. Samuda's, are in a very fair way of recovery. The man, W. Ingledewicke, who was most severely injured, is pronounced by the surgeon to be at present out of danger.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The striking events of the week are serious—without speaking of the grand battle of the arbitrary prima donna Grisi with ballet, in which, as in general, she forgot that very unimportant personage the public, who gives her some thousands per annum. The festive event has been the entertainment at the Count and Countess Jules de Castellani's. Amidst the immense girandoles of lights, the bouquets and the flowery shrubs, all the greatest beauties of Paris were seen in resplendent costumes. An opera comique, by the master of the house, was performed in his model theatre. The composer, Adolphe Adam, was the leader of the orchestra, and Alphonse Kàrr, the much-feared satirist, performed the part of the prompter; the tiger cat for the time being hiding its claws. The thirty-six danseuses Viennoises, now on the eve of departure for England, performed a ballet betwixt the acts, and a splendid banquet and general dancing afterwards of the guests completed this memorable fête. The same night Lolla Montez made her first début at the Porte St. Martin. Her triumphant appearance and her sudden disappearance at the Italian Opera in London—the pitched battles she fought with the Prussian gendarmes—and the mystery attending her origin and career, greatly excited the curiosity of the Parisians. Their love of art was gratified, for during the last year Lolla has held herself concealed, studying in secret choregraphy under the greatest masters. In London, the memory of Lolla Montez is destined to be eclipsed, for I have to announce to you that the most famous dancer of boleros of all Spain, the loveliest of all Andalusians—now at Seville—has engaged to dance at her Majesty's Theatre, and is every day expected to pass through Paris on her way to your shores.

Whilst your sportsmen, no doubt, are waiting with impatience for the cessation of the frost, our good Frenchmen follow their sports as if the road and the turf were as soft as the soil in a riding-school. By what lucky chance they do not kill their horses and break their necks, no one can explain. This week Fontainebleau has been the principal scene of their prowess. There, the Dukes of Nemours and Aumale, and the Prince de Joinville, held open house for the élite of the Jockey Club. The beautiful Lady Seymour, and several other English ladies of rank, witnessed the first day's sport. After Easter these ladies, with the Marchioness of Aylesbury at their head, will migrate back to London. If we are to believe what they profess, all the fashionables in Paris—French, Russians, Italians, and Germans—intend paying you visits, now your grand opera is open, so that they can be sure of meeting their friends. More than one of the younger members of the Royal Family will certainly go over to England; and the German Princes and Sovereigns (the Austrian Emperor excepted), who have not already paid their devoirs, intend to visit her Majesty Queen Victoria.

The missing comedy of Molière, "Le Docteur Amoreus," has at length been produced at the Odeon, the original manuscript having been placed in the Foyer for the inspection of the curious. The curious, however, have their doubts, and, notwithstanding the parole of the discoverer, and the long lettered affiche of the theatre, the public are slow in believing that the play is by Molière. Care was taken to make the performance pass off favourably, and a numerous claque was in its place, but I am one of those who doubt, and I find that the critics generally are not convinced.

How far the upsetting of a writing table, and spilling a bottle of ink can convert a portionless young lady into a rich Countess, has lately been proved at the chateau of the Count de L———, in Britanny. Mdmlle. F—— R——, and her mamma, were lately staying at the chateau in question, where the proprietor, a bachelor, very rich and very old, had invited a numerous party of friends. By a lucky misfortune the young lady threw down an expensive marble table and an inkstand of old China. She was in despair, but her gallant host consoled her by saying, "that she had left a lasting impression on his carpet as well as on his heart." From that hint a courtship took place, and the portionless young lady is now the Countess de L———, and each rich old bachelor in the department has locked up his inkstands, lest his fair visitors should tain the carpet in attemptiug to win his heart.

The merchants and bankers of Paris have determined on giving Marshal Bugeaud a grand dinner before his return to Algiers. The locale is the only difficulty. Some persons propose the grand saloon of the the Opera House; but I suggest the Bourse as the most appropriate place for a commercial dinner, and as the galleries afford full space for the accommodation of ladies who may wish to see the Algerine hero, and to hear the speeches of their fathers and husbands.

A duel took place yesterday between M. Beauvilion, Editor of the Globe, and M. Dujarrier, one of the Editors of La Presse, which I regret to say terminated fatally for the latter. He received his adversary's ball just under the eye, and dropped dead on the instant. Many reasons are assigned for this unfortunate affair—political differences of course being among the number; but I have reason to believe that woman, the source of all mischief, was the cause of this. An actress of the Porte St. Martin gave the deceased a marked preference over his rival, and thus a quarrel was engendered which has deprived society of one of its most amiable members.

We have lost a great celebrity in our fashionable world—I mean the well-known Russian, Prince Tufiakin, who came to Paris in 1801, and has since resided here, with the exception of the nine years of the Russian war—namely, from 1811 to 1820, when he became Lord Director of the Court Theatres at St. Petersburg. The Prince was of pure Russian blood, and he looked down with a certain degree of contempt on all the nobility created since the time of Catherine to the present hour. He commenced his career in the Royal Guards; then became Chamberlain in the Palace; married, and, on the death of the Princess, quitted St. Petersburg, and established himself, as I have said, in 1801, at Paris. He had the reputation of great wealth, and his death has proved this supposition. Two French ladies, who successively possessed his affections, divide his immense wealth.

FRANCE.

Some excitement has been again created in Paris by the supposed critical position of the Ministry, in consequence of the rejection of the Civil Pensions Bill by the Chamber of Deputies on Monday. The number of votes in favour of the bill was 188, and 201 opposed it, so that the Ministry were thus left in a minority of 13. On the same day, M. Remusat proposed some resolutions asserting the incompatibility of certain public functions with those of deputies. M. Guizot opposed the propositions, but said he should not object to their being taken into consideration. This concession is also represented as a defeat by the Opposition press, and there are the usual reports of a change of Ministry, but we believe M. Guizot has no intention of resigning. The Debats expresses its regret at the rejection of the Civil Pensions Bill, at which it says it is not surprised, nor is the fact of importance. The Debats remarks that everybody admits that the men who have devoted their lives to the state are not sufficiently paid, but, it observes, such services are not of a nature to touch the heart of the Opposition. M. Guizot has made another concession by allowing a proposition for the conversion of the Five per Cents to be considered, on the ground that members approve of the principle of the reduction, but consider present circumstances unfavourable to its accomplishment. They will of course oppose its being effected in this session.

At a sitting of the Chamber of Peers, during the discussion on the Secret Service Bill, there was a violent personal altercation, which is thus described:—M. Salvandy rose to defend his junction with the present Ministry, and having referred to his connexion with Count Molé, and his separation from whom he sought to justify, Count Molé rose, and expressed his astonishment at the proceeding. "I did not expect," said he, "that Count Salvandy would have presented himself to insult me in my place in Parliament; but, after his language, I confess I am more tempted to pity than to reply to him."

Upon this Duke Pasquier (the Chancellor) interposed, and expressed his hope that the Peers would confine themselves to Parliamentary language and usages. Counts Molé and Salvandy thereupon mutually explained, and matters were resuming a placid course, when the Marquis de Boissy rose, and declared that he belonged to no party, but that with respect to the majority which the Minister boasted that he possessed in that Chamber, one word would place it in its proper light. "There are," said he "180 Peers of France, and of these 155 receive pay from Government." General Colbert here interrupted him by an observation that was inaudible in the Chamber. It reached the Marquis, however, for he instantly addressed the General in these words—"Do you mean that as personal?" "No," replied the General. "Then hold your tongue, Sir." "You are an ill-mannered person," said the General. A violent tumult followed, in the midst of which the Marquis de Boissy was heard to say, "I am delighted at this interruption. It will prevent others. What I mean may be easily understood." General Gourgaud then rose and asked, "Is this a threat?" "To you, Sir?" replied the Marquis. "Is it a threat to the Chamber?" asked General Gourgaud. "Take it as you please," rejoined the Marquis. Here an universal shout of "order, order," rose from all parts of the Chamber. The Chancellor (by the assent of the house) called the Marquis to order. The Marquis resumed his speech, but observing that a considerable number of Peers had retired, he moved an adjournment, which was carried. The Chancellor and the remaining Peers then invited, or brought the Marquis and Generals Colbert and Gourgaud into the private room of the Chancellor, after a lecture from whom, it was agreed that the affair should go no farther.

The resumed debate on the Secret Service Money Bill was marked by further personalities, but ultimately the bill was voted. On a division (ballot) there were—

For the bill	111
Against it	44
Majority for the bill	—67

A duel with pistols took place on the Bois de Boulogne on Tuesday morning between M. Dujarrier, manager and a proprictor of La Presse, and M. Beauvilion, one of the editors of Le Globe, in which M. Dujarrier was mortally wounded. He expired before he could be brought home. M. Dujarrier is described as a man of very considerable talent, and his death has caused much regret.

There are various reports as to the cause of the quarrel. In some quarters it is supposed to have reference to a series of bitter and personal attacks upon the conductors of the Presse, which have recently appeared in the columns of the Paris Globe.

There is nothing of importance from Switzerland.

Letters from Zurich of the 7th inst. state, that the Minister of France presented to the President of the Diet on the 6th a note from M. Guizot to the same effect as that of Lord Aberdeen. The Diet was not to meet until the 10th to resume the discussion on the free corps.

The Grand Council of Vaud elected on the 7th a committee of fifteen members, who were to be charged with the revision of the Constitution of 1831.

SPAIN.

We have advices from Madrid to the 5th instant. Both Chambers were sitting, but their proceedings are of little importance, the Ministry being evidently desirous of avoiding bringing forward any matter of consequence at present. Some of the journals state that the Queen will leave for Aranjuez next month, and will proceed from thence to Valencia and Barcelona, at the last of which places she will remain for some weeks to take the baths.

The Gibraltar Chronicle mentions the death of Mr. Butler, the English Vice-Consul at Tetouan. The Consuls of Sweden and Denmark have resumed their duties at Tangiers.

The diligence from Perpignan to Barcelona was attacked by brigands on the 28th, in the neighbourhood of Tordero, and robbed. The brigands, fifteen in number, forced the passengers to sit in a ditch while they examined the contents of the vehicle. They broke open all the letters in the post-bag, as well as all the passengers' luggage, and carried away all that they found sufficiently valuable and portable. Ultimately they seized upon three of the passengers, who were of rich families in Figueras, and carried them into the mountains, where they will probably be retained till ransomed.

PORTUGAL.

It appears by our Lisbon letters of the 4th instant that public attention was chiefly engaged with the approaching elections. The Opposition party had formed an association for promoting the return of candidates hostile to the Ministry.

The decision of a Council of Ministers on the subject of the conversion of a portion of the foreign debt had led to serious misintelligence between the Ministers of the Interior and of War on one side, and those of Foreign Affairs and Finance on the other. The casting vote of the Minister of Marine determined the discussion in favour of the Barons Folgosa and Junqueiros, in opposition to the capitalist Romao, supported by Senhor Cabral and the Duke of Terceira. The Baron Folgosa (Brandao) remains charged with the management of this operation, and was expected to proceed to England immediately on this mission.

A new law for the reconstruction of the Council of State, creating an administrative body and several new offices, had been introduced by Ministers.

THE WEST INDIES.

The Royal mail packet the Tay has arrived with the West India mails. The contents of the papers are unusually interesting. They announce a most serious fire, which has destroyed the principal portion of the town of Bridgetown, in Barbadoes. The fire broke out on the morning of the 4th or 5th February, in the house of a Jew storekeeper, and was caused by a little girl, about nine years of age, playing with lucifer matches. It commenced in the part of the town principally devoted to commerce, and where the stores and houses are thickly studded. The buildings being principally of wood, old and worm-eaten, it may be readily imagined that the fire spread with the greatest rapidity, and defied all human efforts to suppress it. The fire having been observed by Admiral Sir Charles Adam, he immediately landed his officers and the whole of his sailors, together with the fire-engines on board. It is almost needless to state that such efficient services, although they could not put a stop to the devouring element, were instrumental in effecting a great amount of benefit by arresting the progress of the flames. Sir Charles himself was most indefatigable, and directed his men with untiring energy. The fire, notwithstanding such powerful aid, continued to burn with great fury for three days, and was smouldering when the packet left on the 9th. The negroes stood by, and looked on with the greatest apathy, and could not be induced to assist cheerfully. Their conduct resembled that at the great fire at Kingston about two years since. The whole of the public officers of the town were at their posts, and exerted themselves to the utmost. A great many of the principal inhabitants were sworn in to maintain order and regularity.

The Post Office is among the public buildings destroyed. The house of Moore, Brothers, and Co., are sufferers to the amount of 40,000 dollars; and there is a house connected with the Irish trade in Cork who are also great sufferers; some persons estimate the loss at £400,000, some at half a million, and others at even more. If, however, the valuable houses and buildings destroyed were to be rebuilt upon the same plans, the like furniture replaced, and the stolen and consumed goods thrown into the calculation, it would require little short of a million to do this. We subjoin a list of a few of the principal dwelling-houses and stores consumed.

HOUSES AND STORES BURNED AND DESTROYED.

Tudor-street.—Mr. Isaac Lobo's, where the fire commenced.

Beckwith-street.—Mr. Wilson's house, Mr. Terrill's lumber-store, and Mr. Morris's cabinet-maker's shop.

Chapel-street.—The whole of this street burned down from Miss Inniss's, with the exception of two or three houses below Mr. Robinson's (where the fire stopped) on the north side.

George's-street.—All the houses either burnt or pulled down.

Broad-street.—The house of Mr. Alkins, Mrs. Harris's house, the West Indian Office, the offices of the Hon. the Solicitor-General and the Speaker, the druggist establishment of Mr. John Gill, the Mercury Office, the house of Mr. John Gibson, the residence of Mr. C. Gill, the Post-office, the hotel establishment of Miss Caroline Lee, the premises and lumber-yards of Messrs. Higginson, Deane, and Stott, the cabinet-maker's shop of Mr. Wharton, Mr. Carew's house, Mr. S. Cummins's two houses, Mrs. Johnson's house, Mr. Ralph Crichlow's two houses, Mr. Alsop's house, Mr. Carvallo's house, Mr. Sharp's house, Miss Mahon's house, Mr. Aaron's cigar manufactory and retail store.

Canary-street.—Mr. Torre's house, Miss Nicholls's house, Miss Williams's house, Mr. Trimmingham's house, the stores of Messrs. Hardy, of Mr. John Sullivan, and Mr. Best, and down further towards the wharf, several other houses, with the back stores of the Messrs. Moore.

To these we may add the total destruction of all the houses, most of them small ones, in Bull-head-alley, Crown-alley, Joslyn's alley, and down to the Reef towards Miss Rebecca Phillips's hotel, which, with Miss Hannah Massiahs's and Miss Hannah Lewis's hotels, were preserved only by the most extraordinary exertions.

Just before the accounts left, a Committee of Safety had been appointed, to assist the firemen in their duties.

These papers confirm the statement of the capture of Santa Anna. It is stated that after his attack upon Puebla, he fled with 1000 cavalry to San Antonio, and from thence he stole away in the night, with four attendants only, and left his followers in the lurch. He attempted to reach his farm, that is, his private property at Encerro, but on his way was caught by a small party of Indians, who captured and made him prisoner. This took place at the village of Hico, about three leagues from Calopa, whence they escorted him, their party having been reinforced, and delivered him over to the authorities. He was shortly afterwards removed to the Castle of Perote. The general impression is, that he will shortly be put upon his trial, afterwards banished the country, and the whole of his property confiscated to the State. He was careless enough to write to some friends at Vera Cruz respecting his money and other treasures, and to give directions for their disposal. The letters were, however, seized, and an embargo laid upon the whole. General Bravo, it is supposed, will be the new President. The country is now tranquil.

The commander of the Tay reports that he experienced very bad weather in the Gulf, and was obliged to stand off Tampico in a heavy "norther," in which a sloop upset, and all hands perished. Her name could not be ascertained. He also experienced another heavy norther off Vera Cruz. A fine American schooner went ashore there, and soon became a total wreck. The crew were, however, saved. The Tay had a heavy gale all the passage home.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

OTAHEITE.—The Earl of MINTO gave notice that on Monday he would move for copies of any correspondence received within the last twelve months, from the ships Basilisk and Hazard, on the subject of the proceedings at the island of Otaheite.

DISABILITIES OF THE JEWS.—The LORD CHANCELLOR brought in a bill to relieve her Majesty's subjects of the Jewish persuasion from certain disabilities affecting them in respect to the holding of municipal offices. (Cheers). The bill was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

CONSTABULARY IN IRELAND.—The Marquis of NORMANBY said, that having postponed his motion on the subject of Promotion in the Constabulary in Ireland until this day, it was with great unwillingness he had declined to postpone it again. But he did not think that the presence of either of the two Lords, on account of whose absence the postponement had been requested, was necessary to the discussion. (Hear.) A recommendation made to the Inspector-General of Constabulary, upon an understanding between all parties in Parliament, had been lost sight of in recent promotions. But if he could have an assurance from the Government that such would not be the case again—and there was no one whose assurance he would more readily take than that of the noble duke opposite—— The Duke of WELLINGTON: You won't have it then. (A laugh).—The Marquis of NORMANBY said he was not to be deterred from proceeding with his motion, although the noble duke had stated the course he proposed to take. —The noble marquis then submitted his motion upon the subject, and also for some returns respecting the army in Ireland.—Some discussion ensued upon the motion for these returns.—On a division, the motion was negatived by 32 to 12.—The house adjourned soon after seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

NEW MEMBERS.—Mr. Brinsley Sheridan took the oaths and his seat for Shaftesbury. Mr. Deedes took the oaths and his seat for East Kent.

CORN LAWS.—Mr. WODEHOUSE gave notice that it was his intention to move an amendment to the motion of the honourable member for Stockport, which stood on the orders of the day for Thursday next. The motion was for a select committee to inquire into the operation of protective duties upon the interests of tenant farmers. To that motion it was his intention to move as an amendment the following resolution:—That an inquiry into the operation of protective duties on imports, as regarded the interest of tenant farmers and farm labourers, was objectionable in principle if the purport of it was to show that they had a distinct and separate interest from that of their landlords, or those on whose property they chose to live; that the condition of tenant farmers and farm labourers did indeed deserve the most serious attention of Parliament, and it was the bounden duty of the house so to shape its deliberation, as to make known to the occupiers and tenants of the soil the necessity for their having a continuance of all protective duties; and that the removal of all protective duties was averse to the general interests of all classes of society.

PURCHASE OF CALIFORNIA.—Mr. S. WORTLEY begged to put a question to Sir Robert Peel with regard to a statement that the English Government had offered to purchase California for 25,000,000 of dollars.—Sir ROBERT PEEL stated his belief that the report was utterly without foundation.—Lord PALMERSTON, on behalf of the late Government, also denied any connection with such an offer.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—Mr. CHILDERS wished to know from Sir Robert Peel, whether it was the intention of the Government to grant a Queen's letter this year.—Sir R. PEEL replied that the subject, he believed, was now under the consideration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

WAYS AND MEANS.—On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER that the house resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. WILLIAMS rose to express his regret, that, from a belief that the questions before the house last evening would occupy a longer period than they did, he was too late to bring forward his motion. All that he required was an explanation of the facts connected with the sale of certain lands belonging to the Crown, adjoining the Duke of Newcastle's estate.—The Earl of LINCOLN said that a motion complaining of the conduct of a public servant ought to be brought forward at the earliest period possible. He would not now, however, enter into any further explanation on the subject.

After a long and desultory discussion, the house went into the Committee of Ways and Means, to discuss the Sugar Duties.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER then stated that he should adhere in substance to the course he had already intimated, but he admitted there were many difficulties connected with the subject. Nevertheless, he argued that the principle of a distinctive duty, in regard to sugar, was desirable in itself, and was just, equitable, and expedient. The resolutions were discussed at great length, and several amendments were proposed. Ultimately they were agreed to, the house resumed, and an adjournment took place at one o'clock on Saturday morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

CIVIL DISABILITIES OF THE JEWS.—The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of a Bill to remove the Civil Disabilities under which the Jews laboured. He pointed out what he termed the anomalies and absurdities of the present system, and stated that the object of the bill was to remove them. Among these anomalies the Lord Chancellor noticed that Jews were considered eligible to fill the offices of county magistrates, of deputy-lieutenants of counties, and of high sheriffs of counties and of corporate towns. Nay, more, they were bound, when appointed to these last-named offices, to discharge the duties attached to them, under heavy penalties. In the City of London Jews were found eligible to serve as Sheriffs, and were compelled, under a fine, to accept the office. Yet, having served with zeal and ability, by a construction of the Act of Parliament they were debarred from holding the situation of Alderman, which was intended as a reward for those who had filled the office of Sheriff with fidelity.—The Bishop of LONDON said he should offer no obstacle to the present bill, but reserved to himself the right to oppose any measure which might, on a subsequent occasion, be introduced for the admission to Parliament of persons professing the Jewish religion.—The bill was approved of by the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Brougham, and Lord Campbell, who, however, appeared to think it did not go far enough, and the second reading was carried.—Adjourned at half-past six.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE INCOME TAX.—On the motion that the report on the Income-tax be read, Mr. C. BULLER moved an amendment—"That the circumstances under which the renewal of the Income-tax is at present proposed are such as to render it exceedingly improbable that Parliament will have the power of dispensing with its continuance at the end of three years; and that it is, therefore, the duty of this house to take care that the tax be imposed in a form in which its operation shall be less unequal and inquisitorial than it now is."—Mr. Buller argued upon the inquisitorial nature of the tax, and remarked upon the inconsistency of those Whigs who denounced it, and yet voted for it; but the chief purpose of his speech was to prove that the poor man would not derive any benefit from the abolition of the duty upon the 430 articles of the new Tariff. The hon. member made a humorous examination of some of these articles. He said "he could not conceive what the poor man was to gain by the duty being taken off these articles. The right hon. baronet would not give the poor man corn. (Cheers.) He would not give him butter (cheers)—but he would give him alum to adulterate his bread (cheers and laughter)—and lard to adulterate his butter. (Renewed cheers and laughter.) Now he did not know, unless it was, perhaps, upon such articles as divi divi, albanalla, and some other articles which nobody could tell him about (a laugh)—on what it was the poor man was to gain. It was true he had never before heard of those articles, and he had no very longing desire to hear an explanation as to their qualities." (A laugh.) Mr. C. Buller next calculated that from the duty being taken off cotton, the poor man would only save on his dress 25 16 of a penny, or 1d. and 9-16. He then took the case of a woman's gown. (Laughter.) In that he had also made inquiry. (Much laughter.) He made allowance for waste, and he found that it would weigh about two pounds, and the reduction upon each woman's gown would therefore be about three farthings. (Much laughter.) Supposing a woman, therefore, to have two gowns a year, her husband would save 1½d. per annum." (A laugh.) Mr. Buller also denied the assertion of Sir Robert Peel, that a man might make up his Income-tax by the Tariff. It was nonsense to call this a free-trade Budget—it was a monopoly Budget. What they were to understand by free-trade was, that it was the taking off everything but protective duties. Oh! but then the right hon. baronet took the duty off pigs' bristles (a laugh), and off lard (a laugh), and off all those other twopenny-halfpenny articles (a laugh); but he forgot that, in doing so, he still kept on the most important restrictions on other articles.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER replied to Mr. C. Buller, and said that if the suggestions of that hon. gentleman for the reductions of taxes were carried into effect, there would be a deficiency in the revenue of about sixteen millions sterling—a sum rather more than the surplus derived from the Property-tax could admit of. Mr. Buller, he said, had spoken disparagingly of various duties repealed in the tariff, and of striking off the export duties; but if the poorer classes were not benefited by a large amount of direct reduction, they would be benefited by the extension of the field of employment, which would be caused by the abolition of these restrictions. Our capitalists would make new exertions; manufactures of a particular kind would be extended; the poor would be more employed; and thus the plan of the Government afforded to the lower classes of society means of sustenance, comfort, and relief, on a greater scale than could be accomplished by a direct remission of taxation on articles of consumption.—Lord Howick and Sir R. H. Inglis supported the proposition of Mr. C. Buller.—Mr. Warburton caused some laughter by saying he did not know how he should vote.—Mr. M. Milnes, Mr. Hume, and Mr. Spooner, opposed the amendment.—Mr. Hawes supported it.—Sir R. Peel contended that the amendment and the speech of Mr. Buller were inconsistent with each other. He answered the satirical remarks of the latter gentleman by saying that they were taunted with admitting (along with other articles of hard names) alum, in order, as was said, to adulterate the poor man's bread. But alum was an important article in our manufactures, and he thought it strange that they should be derided with having assented to the force of arguments which urged the uselessness of retaining in the tariff articles which only complicated the Customs, and produced nothing to the revenue. Even the repeal of the auction duty would be more beneficial than had been alleged; and he thought that the voice of the country was, on the whole, in favour of the selection which they had made. No doubt other taxes might be named which might be equally, if not more, beneficial to the labouring population; but, looking back to the distresses of 1840 and other years, and to the rapid extension of our commerce in 1844 as compared with 1843, he was sanguine as to the favourable results of the remission of taxes bearing on the manufactures of the country. At the end of the next three years it would be for the house to determine whether or not it should be abrogated or still farther applied, in the shape of direct taxation, and the farther repeal of indirect.—Mr Sheil made some energetic remarks upon the inquisitorial character of the Income-tax, and adduced instances of the vexatious course adopted by some of the local commissioners.—After speeches from Mr. Cobden, Lord J. Russell, and Mr. Villiers, there was a division: the numbers were—

For Mr. C. Buller's amendment..	..	..	..	112
Against it	..	..	..	240
Majority against the amendment	..	..	..	——128

Mr. W. Miles proposed a clause giving a greater power of appeal against the decisions of the Commissioners, but it was rejected by 196 to 92.

The Game Laws.—Mr. Bright proposed to nominate the Select Committee on the Game Laws. A discussion was elicited by proposals to substitute names, but ultimately the composition of the Committee was arranged thus:—Mr. Bright, Mr. Burroughes, Lord G. Bentinck, Mr. M. Gibson, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Cripps, Viscount Clive, Mr. Forbes Mackenzie, Mr. Villiers, Mr. Bankes, Mr. Etwall, Mr. Grantley Berkeley, Mr. Manners Sutton, Mr. G. Cavendish, and Mr. Trelawny. The house sat till half-past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday.

The house sat only three-quarters of an hour, and no business of importance was transacted.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday.

The house met at twelve o'clock, and disposed of many clauses of the Railway Consolidation Bill.

Buenos Ayres and Monte Video.—In answer to some questions from Lord Palmerston, Sir R. Peel explained the course of interference adopted by the British and French Ministers at Buenos Ayres, for the purpose of inducing the Governments of Buenos Ayres and Monte Video to suspend hostilities. He admitted that Mr. Mandeville, our Minister there, as well as the Minister of France, had exceeded their instructions in holding out menaces of forcible intervention, but he excused them on the plea of the difficulty of their position.

New Zealand.—Mr. Somes moved for copies of correspondence respecting the issue of debentures as a legal tender in New Zealand; of all correspondence respecting taxes proposed in the Legislative Council; of all correspondence relating to the measures taken by the Governor of that colony to fulfil Lord Stanley's agreement of the 12th of May, 1843, respecting the grant of a conditional title to the lands of the New Zealand Company; and also of correspondence relating to the affairs of that company, their purchases of lands, &c.—In the course of the discussion that ensued, Mr. Hope, on the part of the Government, did not express any indisposition to give information, but he protested against the charges made against Lord Stanley in reference to the New Zealand Company.—Mr. C. Buller took a review of the history of the colony, condemning in severe terms the whole policy of Captain Fitzroy. He said he wished to pass no severer censure on Captain Fitzroy, than that he was a most foolish and incompetent governor, unfit to be intrusted with the management of the most ordinary affairs, and whose recal was absolutely requisite for the interests and safety of the colony.—Col. Trevor and some other gentlemen defended Capt. Fitzroy.—Sir R. Peel condemned the unjust and unjustifiable manner in which Captain Fitzroy and Lord Stanley had been assailed upon newspaper reports and without any authentic information. He called on hon. members to bring forward a proper straightforward motion on the subject of the Colonial Department and the New Zealand Company, and promised to meet it boldly and firmly.—The motion, with a slight alteration, was agreed to,

The Poor-law Bill.—Mr. S. Crawford called the attention of the house to the petition from the ratepayers and inhabitants of Rochdale against the introduction of the new Poor-law into their district, and moved that the petition should be referred to a select committee appointed to inquire into the administration of the Poor-law in Rochdale.—Mr. Ferrand, in seconding the motion, accused the Conservatives of using the cry against the Poor-law bill to obtain power. On a division the motion was rejected by a majority of 59 to 16.

The Consolidated Fund (£8,000,000) Bill was read a third time and passed.

Adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

The Income and Property Tax Bill.—This bill formed the chief subject of discussion. On the proposition for its third reading, some conversation took place, in the course of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that if persons were not satisfied with the decisions of local commissioners, they might appeal to the commissioners at Somerset House, or they might appeal to them in the first instance.—The bill having been read a third time, Mr. Spooner proposed the addition of certain clauses, the object of which was to allow persons in trade or profession to make certain deductions from the gross amount of their income, in order to enable those who employed members of their family in lieu of servants to place themselves on an equality with others; and also to deduct the annual payments for insurance, poor rates, and other parochial and local charges. This clause was rejected by 151 to 39.—On another clause, allowing the deduction of the annual amount of life insurances, a discussion arose, and the proposition was lost by 87 to 26.—Mr. Wakley next proposed an abatement by way of compensation to landlords of houses, where the rents were lost by insolvency or fraud; but, after a brief discussion, the amendment was negatived without a division.—Sir R. Inglis proposed an amendment to the first clause, that, "Provided always that the said rates and duties shall not be assessed or taken upon any income whatever, except in respect to the sum by which such income shall exceed the sum of £150," with this addition to it, "that this proviso shall cease to operate when the income amounts to more than £500."—The Chancellor of the Exchequer opposed the amendment, because he thought the exemption would lead to great frauds.—The amendment was rejected by 59 to 25.—Sir W. Clay then urged several objections to the principle of the bill, which was supported by Sir R. Peel. Ultimately the bill was read a third time and passed.

The Sugar Duties Bill and the Justices Clerks and Clerks of the Peace Bill were read a second time.

The house adjourned at half-past eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

The Easter Recess.—The Duke of Wellington gave notice that on Tuesday next, he would move that the house adjourn for the holidays, from that day till Thursday, the 3rd of April.

The Income and Property-tax Bill was brought up from the House of Commons.

Railway Schemes.—Lord Brougham said that he wished to ask at what time of day the decision of the Board of Trade had been come to respecting the several lines from London to York. His reason for asking the question was this:—It was well known in the City, at 12 o'clock on Tuesday, that the London and York had been decided against, and the consequence was that the shares of the other two lines had risen 2 and 3 per cent. premium long before the Gazette which contained that decision was published.—The Earl of Dalhousie said that the precise time at which this decision was made was in the afternoon. The Board on that day was held in the afternoon, and therefore it was utterly impossible that this rise could have resulted from any communication with the Board of Trade.

Their lordships arose at an early hour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

There was another morning sitting to day to discuss the Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill. The committee proceeded as far as the 81st clause.

At the evening sitting various petitions were presented. Among them were several upon the subject of the Post-office spy system.

Mr. Sheil gave notice that he should, on Tuesday next, bring forward the motion of which he had given notice, on the subject of the opening of letters of foreigners at the Post-office.

Mr. Wyse gave notice that, after Easter, he should renew the motion which he had made last session on the subject of national education.

Dartmouth Election.—The committee to try the petition of Mr. Moffatt against the return of Mr. Somes, were sworn. Their names are as follow:—Mr. Pakington (chairman), Mr. J. Parker, Mr. Darby, Mr. Hayter, and General Lygon; three Conservatives and two Whigs.

Protective Duties.—Mr. Cobden then brought forward his motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the causes of Agricultural distress, and the effect of protective duties on the tenant farmer and labourer. The hon. member supported his motion in a long and able speech. In the debate that followed, Mr. Herbert, Mr. S. O'Brien, Mr. Bankes, Mr. Bright, Mr. Villiers, and several other members took part. On the division, the motion was lost by a majority of 92—the numbers being, for, 121; against, 213.

The house adjourned at one o'clock.

THE HAMPSTEAD MURDER.

Some of the papers have published long and rambling statements of the manner in which Thomas Henry Hocker became acquainted with Miss Philps. The result to be gleaned from this lengthy narrative is that Mrs. Edwards, the lady with whom Miss Sarah Philps, the young lady to whom the prisoner was paying his addresses, is residing, had been in business in the county of Norfolk as a dressmaker, but came to reside in London four years ago. Miss Philps is a native of Cromer, in the same county, and having become acquainted with Mrs. Edwards when there, the latter having no children of her own, adopted her as her daughter. Miss Philps has been under the guardianship of Mrs. Edwards, who is a most respectable woman, for nearly four years. The length of intimacy which has subsisted between Miss Philps and the prisoner Hocker has already been stated to be ten weeks. The prisoner Hocker met Miss Philps one day in St. Martin's-lane, and accosted her, but she took no notice of him. Three weeks afterwards he met her again in the New Road, and, advancing to her, made some commonplace remark expressive of affection, but, she knowing nothing of him, passed on without taking any notice of him. He, however, followed her to No. 6, Bath-place, and as she was opening the gate, repeated the expression of his attachment to her, and begged permission to accompany her into the house. She resented the proposal, when he exclaimed, "By heavens, Miss, I will see you at home!" She, considerably alarmed, entered the house, but said nothing to Mrs. Edwards, her guardian, about what had passed. In an hour afterwards the prisoner called at the house, and on the servant maid opening the door she inquired who he wanted. "The young lady," he replied, "who lives here," not at the time knowing her name. "Oh, Miss Philps, you mean," observed the maid. "Ay, Miss Philps," he replied, delighted at learning her name. "Will you give her my card, if you please," he said, handing his card to the servant girl, with the name, "Mr. Thomas Henry Hocker," engraved upon it. Not knowing the name of the young man who had twice accosted her in the street, Miss Philps, when the card was handed to her, had no idea that it was the same person. Not wishing, therefore, to go down to see a gentleman whose name she had never heard before, Mrs. Edwards went in her stead. That lady went the more readily because the idea flashed across her mind that the person had only entered for the purpose of stealing some articles from the room, while the servant maid was upstairs. On entering the apartment where Hocker was, Mrs. Edwards inquired what was his pleasure. He answered that he had seen Miss Philps on several occasions, and being quite fascinated with her, had called for the purpose of asking permission to pay his addresses to her. Mrs. Edwards, as might be expected, was quite confounded at this. On recovering her presence of mind, she said to him, "This, sir, is very strange conduct on the part of one whom neither Miss Philps nor I, who am her guardian, know anything, and even of whose name we have never heard before." "You may rely on it, Madam," remarked Hocker, "that I am a person of respectability, and that my intentions are most honourable. My parents reside at 17, Charles-street, Portland town." Strange as were the circumstances under which the prisoner introduced himself, there was something so sincere in his manner, and (according to the account) so much of gentlemanly bearing about him, that Mrs. Edwards eventually called down Miss Philps. She at first met his protestations of love with repulse, but before she had been a quarter of an hour in his company, she began to feel in some measure influenced by his exceedingly winning manner. The interview ended in his obtaining both Mrs. Edwards's and Miss Philps's consent to his calling again on the following day, Mrs. Edwards in the interval taking the precaution to ascertain that his parents did reside at the address he had given. After this, it appears Hocker often renewed his visits to Bath Place, and made several misrepresentations respecting his position, family and prospects. Some letters passed between Hocker and Mrs. Edwards, in which, as before, there were plenty of falsehoods; but the marriage with Miss Philps appears to have been arranged. It is believed, however, that he has been corresponding with a young lady of Sheffield up to the time of the murder, notwithstanding he was at the same time paying his addresses to Miss Sarah Jane Philps.

There is no doubt that the alleged murderer, during his intimacy with Mr. Delarue, received from his victim the sum of nearly £150, the whole of which he had squandered in vice and debauchery, and that he was well aware that a stop was about to be put to his career, and that his victim would no longer submit to his importunate demands.

These additional circumstances have transpired in regard to Hocker's demeanour on the night of the murder. Miss Philps called on Sir Oswald Moseley's housekeeper, at Portland place, about half-past eight on the night of the murder, and her first inquiry was whether Hocker had been there that evening? The housekeeper replied that he had not. "Well," remarked Miss Philps, "though I had no appointment with him to-night, I did some how or other think he would call." "Oh, it's too late for him, my child," observed the other. "It is later than his usual time," replied Miss Philps, "but still I think he will come." About ten minutes past nine his knock was heard at the door. He entered, and remained for about an hour and a half. "Sarah," said he, after having shaken hands, and asked her and the housekeeper how they did, "Sarah, this is the brilliant ring I told you three weeks ago I had bought at Sheffield." And as he made the remark he handed her a ring. "Why don't you put it on and wear it?" she inquired. "Because," said he, "it's too large," and he put it on his finger to show her that it was so. "I have also," he observed, "bought this watch," showing her the watch referred to so often in the examination at the Coroner's inquest and at the Marylebone police office. After this they entered into general conversation; and the young lady, observing that he had some spots of blood on the front of his shirt, asked him how it happened that they were there? "Oh," said he, "the governor and I have been having a piece of fun together, and he accidentally made my nose bleed." Struck with the circumstance of his looking unusually cheerful that night, she made an observation to that effect. "Yes," he replied, "I don't know how it is, but I never felt so happy in my life before. My mind, thank God, is more at ease to-night than it has been for a long time past." This, singular as it may seem, was said with a peculiar emphasis, and was again repeated in the course of the evening's interview. Miss Philps remarked to her friend, after Hocker had parted with her, that she never before saw him so full of fun and spirits, and at the same time expressed her inability to account for the circumstance.

Last Sunday the discreditable exhibition of the previous Sunday was repeated. We are told by the morning papers that "Throughout the entire day, both the Yorkshire Grey, where the inquest on Delarue was held, and the spot where the unfortunate man was murdered, were again visited by thousands of persons: and hundreds of the fairer sex were to be seen wending their way, up to their ancles in mire in Haverstock-field, to gratify their morbid curiosity. Depredations have been carried on to such an extent, that not only have large pieces of the stile or railing, over which the deceased Delarue was supposed to have been crossing when he was murdered, been cut away, but even large portions of the brick work of the ancient wall of Belsize-park, against which the body of the murdered man was found have been removed. In some parts this has been effected to so great an extent that large repairs will be necessary before it is placed again in safe condition."

RE-EXAMINATION AND COMMITTAL OF THOMAS HENRY HOCKER.

Thomas Henry Hocker was again examined at Marylebone Police Court on Tuesday, and, as will be seen, some additional evidence of importance was given. It is hardly necessary to say that the court was very much crowded. When the prisoner was placed at the bar, he manifested much the same ease and apparent indifference to the situation in which he stands as on former occasions.

The first witness called was John Baldock, S 304. He stated: When I was in the field in which the murder was committed, and while another constable had gone to get a stretcher to carry away the body, I heard a man come whistling along. When he had come nearly up to me I called out "Halloa!" and he replied, "Halloa, policeman." I then said, I have got a very serious case in the corner here. He said, what is it? I said, it is a dead man, and I think he has cut his throat. He said, are you sure he is quite dead? I answered, "Yes, I have felt his pulse, and I think he is quite dead." The man then put out his hand and himself felt the dead man's pulse. He next said, "You have got a nasty job alone, policeman." I said, "They are gone for the stretcher, and I dare say they'll soon be back." He said, "I'll wait with you till the stretcher comes, as you are left alone." He said he felt very much shocked at seeing such a sight, and added that he had been in the habit of travelling that way at night for the last two years, but never "see'd no danger in coming that way before." He said he transacted business in London during the day, and generally came that way home at night—that he generally had a great sum of money upon him, a watch and a ring upon him, and that he had been cautioned by his parents not to come that way, but he never saw any danger in it himself. He afterwards said he felt very queer, and thought he wanted a little drop of brandy. He asked me if I would like to have any, and I said "No;" he next took a shilling out of his pocket, and asked me to take that to get some with. I said I must not take it, as I was not allowed to do it. He pressed me to take it, and said there was no harm in it, as he would not say anything about it. I said I would rather not; but after he pressed me more I took it.

Mr. Rawlinson: That is the reason, I suppose, why you did not tell me or the coroner of this before?—Witness: No, sir; it was not.

Magistrate: Then, why did you not mention it?—Witness: I thought it was of no consequence.

Magistrate: But you are sworn to tell the whole truth, and not to judge of what is important and what is not.

The witness proceeded: Sergeant Fletcher and other officers then came with the stretcher and carried away the body. I last saw the person who gave me the shilling near Bellsize-lane. I do not know that I should know him again. He had a cloak on, and was muffled up a good deal, as any person would be on a cold night. I produce the hat which was found at the feet of the dead man; it is bruised, and has blood upon it. I produce a stick also, which has blood upon it too.

[This was not the stick which was found near the Regent's Canal.]

James Euston, D 163: I was here last week, and was appointed to be with the prisoner in his cell before his examination, and remained with him until the examination came on. He made a communication to me, although I never asked him any question. He had some toast brought into the cell, and it remained there an hour before he ate it. He then commenced eating the toast, and jumped up, kicked at the door, and said he could throw some light upon it. He said he wanted to see the waiter at the Swiss Cottage. I told him when the gaoler came he could send a message or a note. The gaoler came shortly afterwards. What passed between them I cannot tell. After he was gone the prisoner said he had gone on the night of the murder to the Swiss Cottage, asked for a glass of rum and water, gave the waiter a shilling, and told him to fetch him a fourpenny piece and twopence. The waiter brought him the change, he gave him the twopence for himself, and put the fourpenny piece in his pocket. The waiter said, "You are a gentleman." The prisoner added, "And he did not know me." He said, "Then, that Baldock, the policeman, I stood in the field five-and-twenty minutes with him, close to the deceased. I had my cloak on, it was a cold night, and I asked him to have some brandy, which he refused. I pressed him to have it very much, and at last he received a shilling. I remained there while they went for the stretcher." That is all he said. I made no remark.

Mr. Fell, the clerk, said he thought if the magistrate allowed the witness to recollect himself he would state something else.

Witness: He said a good deal, but nothing of importance.

Mr. Rawlinson: You are not to judge of the importance: state all he said.

Witness proceeded: Oh, yes. He said he had got it down "ins and outs." He had four sides of paper written on. I said, "Have you got it down, then?" and he answered, "Yes, I have got it all down here," and he meant to explain it when he went inside.

Mr. Rawlinson here asked the prisoner if he wished to ask the witness any question?

Prisoner: Every thing he has said is perfectly correct. But he has made one grand omission. (To the witness): Did I not mention to you something about a knife?—Witness: You asked me if I had got a knife.

Prisoner: I did not. I was alluding to a knife which I had when in company with the constable Baldock.

Witness: I don't recollect anything of that sort.

Mrs. Maria Edwards was next called. I live at 61, Great Tichfield-street. I have been town housemaid to a gentleman in Portland-place for some years. I know the prisoner at the bar, and have known him since a little after Christmas. I first saw him at 6, Bath-place, the house of my brother and sister-in law. A young person named Philps was allowed to sleep in Portland-place. By her sleeping there, Mr. Hocker "was used to see her there." Sometimes he came to the door, and sometimes he came in. On the night of the 21st of Feb. he came there about nine o'clock, or a little after. He saw Miss Philps, and went to the housekeeper's room with her. He appeared cheerful and in good spirits. He said he had just come from Grafton-street. I did not know what he meant by that. I don't remember anything particular that passed. He merely asked her how she did, and said, "Well, my girl, how are you?" He did produce a watch which he said he had bought; there was a chain to it which looked like gold. There was a ring also which he showed to Miss Philps. She remarked that it was too large, when he put it on his finger; it appeared to be a brilliant ring. He afterwards put it into his pocket. He had a crust of bread and cheese.

Mr. Rawlinson: People sometimes wash their hands before eating; did he do so?—Not that I saw; there was water in the room, but I did not see him. I was in and out a good deal. I heard nothing said about blood on his shirt. Miss Philps saw it, and mentioned it after he was gone. I did not hear anything said about any part of his dress. He had a macintosh on his arm when he came in.

Henry Evans Taylor: I live at 8, Alsop-mews, Dorset-square. About three weeks ago I found a stick on Macclesfield-bridge, Regent's park.

Mr. Rawlinson: Recollect yourself; you must be mistaken.—Witness: No; it was about three weeks ago.

[The stick was here produced; it is a heavy bludgeon, and rather a formidable weapon.]

Witness continued: The stick is in the same condition as when I found it. It has not been washed. I did not observe anything particular about it. [There was a mark of blood on the handle, and another near the lower end.] The witness, who is a lad about 13 or 14 years old, appeared uncertain about the time. Henry Taylor, father of the last witness, said his boy brought him the stick produced eight or nine days before the murder was committed. (The prisoner here smiled.) I heard of the murder the day after it was committed.

The boy recalled: I have never said it was on the Saturday that I found the stick.

Inspector Grey: I went on Friday last to the residence of the father of the boy Taylor, and on my inquiring for a stick he gave me the stick which has been produced, and which then had distinct marks of blood.

Mr. Rawlinson: How do you account for the marks being so faint now?—Inspector Grey: I think the stick had probably been washed before it was found, and that exposure to the air had made the stains as they now appear.

Thomas Hocker, the father of the prisoner, called: The stick produced I believe to have been my son's, the prisoner Thomas. To the best of my knowledge, the last time I saw it was when it was fetched from my house and conveyed to Victoria-terrace, which must be three weeks or a month ago, to the best of my knowledge. I had heard that he had lost it.

James Hocker, the prisoner's brother, called and examined: I know the stick produced. It is my brother's, and the one of which I before spoke. He told me that he had lost it. I am quite sure it is the same stick.

Mr. Fell, the chief clerk, proceeded to read over the whole of the evidence. While this was being done, the girl Philps nearly fainted. Mrs. Edwards trembled so violently that she could not stand.

Joseph Henry Nash then stepped forward and stated: I live at 17, Old Church-street, Paddington. On the Friday night upon which the murder was committed I was on business round St. John's-wood, and on coming to the Swiss Cottage I came into the Avenue-road. It was between six and seven in the evening. When I got into the Avenue-road, I heard the cries of murder, and stopped and listened to hear where the sound came from. It appeared to come from across the fields. I did not pay much attention to it, but stood there about ten minutes, and then saw a man coming along towards me. He was running, and ran right up against me. He stopped all of a bustle for an instant. I said, "Did you hear the cry of murder?" He never answered, but ran on, and I went about my business. I am confident the prisoner is the same man, for I had seen him before. He appeared all of a flurry. I did not observe that he had a stick, and I did not observe his dress, although I think his clothes were dark.

The evidence of this witness created a great sensation in the court; and almost as soon as he appeared, the prisoner, who had only a few minutes before been accommodated with a chair, started up and held the iron rail before him with a firm grasp, and assumed a particularly daring aspect as he looked towards the witness.

Mr. Rawlinson then addressed the prisoner, and said: It now becomes my duty to commit you for trial, and if you have anything to say now is the proper time to speak. You can, however, use your own discretion as to whether you shall say anything or nothing. But if you do say anything, that which you speak will be taken down in writing, and may be used against you.

The prisoner, with a slight bow, and the most composed and easy manner, merely said, "I decline saying anything to-day, sir."

Mr. Rawlinson: Then you stand fully committed by me, as well as upon the Coroner's warrant, to take your trial for wilful murder at the next session of the Central Criminal Court.

The prisoner was immediately removed from the bar.

Hocker was sent from Marylebone Police-office to Newgate in the prison van, where it arrived a few minutes after two o'clock, and, in a minute or so a number of people collected around the prison door, for the purpose of seeing the prisoners come out, not knowing that Thomas Hocker was among them. One of the constables in charge of the van having delivered in the warrant, returned to the van and brought out Thomas Hocker. He exhibited great buoyancy of spirits, and leaped out of the van as if going to a merry-making instead of being about entering a prison. He was laid hold of by each arm by two police-constables, and handed up the steps into the prison. On getting inside, the warrants of committal by the magistrate and the coroner were placed in the hands of the governor; and the name, age, and description of the prisoner, together with the nature of the crime with which he was charged, having been entered in the journal kept for that purpose, he was removed to a cell on the north side of the prison, appropriated to untried prisoners. He exhibited the same indifference as he has hitherto done, entering freely into conversation, and offering his snuff-box to those willing to take snuff. He expressed a wish to be supplied with pens, ink, and paper, which was granted.

The Metropolitan Drapers' Association.—There was a most interesting meeting of this Association at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday evening, Lord J. Russell in the chair, to receive the report of the committee for the past year. The body of the Hall was completely crowded, and many ladies were among the assembly. Indeed, there was so much anxiety to be present, that the platform and every available space was occupied. Numbers of persons too were unable to obtain admission. The report stated that the experience of the committee had tended to confirm them in the opinion with which they first set out—namely, that the custom of "evening shopping" is the sole cause of the late hours of business; and while a discontinuance on the part of the public of that custom, will, nay, cannot fail to result in a reduction of the hours of business, it is the only practicable means by which that object can be generally and permanently effected. The receipts of the year, including a balance of £56 4s. from last year, amounted to £643 11s. 7d., and after the payment of all expenses, there remained a balance of £24 15s. 11d. in favour of the association. Lord John Russell, who was much cheered, made an address to the meeting, in which he argued that late hours of business were not only injurious to health, but they prevented young persons from improving their minds, and from fulfilling the higher duties of life. The report having been adopted, the meeting was addressed by Mr. Rodney, Mr. Pearce, of Regent street, Dr. Lancaster, Rev. Dr. Alder, J. Payne, Esq., Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, and others. Resolutions expressing the sense of the meeting against late hours of business were carried unanimously. There were between forty and fifty gentlemen on the platform, representing some of the principal drapery establishments in various parts of the metropolis, nearly all of whom have already adopted the business hours recommended by the association.

LINCOLN CASTLE.—ASSEMBLING OF THE SHERIFF'S PROCESSION.

CIRCUITS OF THE JUDGES.—LINCOLN AND OXFORD ASSIZES.

A few weeks since (No. 145) we illustrated the Election of a Sheriff, and the Regal Ceremony of Pricking the Sheriffs' Roll; and explained briefly the origin and judicial functions of this important officer of the Crown. We now proceed to illustrate the principal scenes of the pageantry of the Sheriff's office, or "state," as it is usually termed, when he meets the Judges on their circuits, with all due solemnity befitting so impressive an occasion. It should be mentioned, however, that the Sheriff's state has, of late years, been in many instances shorn of its splendour: the custom of his being attended by bands of Javelin-men, and liveried servants, the retainers of the feudal age, has been, in most cases, dispensed with: and, in order to complete our series of illustrations, we have necessarily chosen them from two counties—Lincoln and Oxford; for, in the former city, where the processional scenes are generally enacted with imposing effect, the individual "pomp and circumstance" of the Javelin-men is dispensed with; but this portion of the ceremonial is still preserved at Oxford, and presents a goodly array of the semblance of power, as the procession advances through the fine architectural High-street of that noble city.

Commencing, therefore, at Lincoln, the Castle is a venerable ruin, beautiful, even in its present state of decay. It is picturesquely situated on a lofty eminence, commanding the city and the surrounding country for a distance of upwards of twenty miles; rivers and wood, seats, villages, and churches, lying scattered beneath it in every direction the eye can trace. The greater part of the remains of the Castle are Norman, and of these the keep, or donjon, is by far the most magnificent and imposing. It is seated on an artificial mound of earth, similar to the Round Tower at Windsor, Clifford's Tower at York, &c.

The entire Castle was built by William the Conqueror; and to clear the site on which it was erected, one hundred and seventy-six Roman edifices were destroyed, and seventy-four more to leave a space around it. There are in all, three towers in the circuit of the Castle walls, exclusive of those at the gateway, and the keep; one in the north-west angle, in the lower part of which is the west gate, or sallyport, now built up; another on the north, called "Cobb's Hall;" and the last at the south-west angle.

The interior of the Castle includes an area of six acres and a half of ground, but is devoid of all ancient buildings. It contains the County Hall and the County Prison, a plain substantial brick building, erected from the design of Mr. Carr, of York, remarkable for the excellence of its arrangements, and its fine healthy airing grounds.

The only entrance to the Castle is by the eastern gate, called "Castle Gate." The upper part is ruined, and has evidently been several feet higher than at the present time; it has, however, even now a most noble and commanding aspect, and forms a fit approach to the stronghold of the law. This gate, which we have engraved, looks upon an open square, called Castle-hill, not far from, and facing, the west end of the Cathedral. On the north side of this square is a neat and substantial modern building, called the Judges' Lodgings; and opposite are the temporary Sheriffs' Offices, &c.

The procession of the High Sheriff (Thomas Coltman, Esq.,) was formed in this square, on Saturday afternoon last, and, at half-past three, advanced in the following order:—

SHERIFF'S PROCESSION PASSING THE STONE BOW, LINCOLN.

THE SHERIFF OF OXFORD'S JAVELIN MEN, ESCORTING THE JUDGES OF ASSIZE.

Two Trumpeters, on horseback, the trumpets decorated with banners bearing the High Sheriff's arms.
Ten Sheriffs' Officers on horseback, bearing long white wands, dressed in blue coats, with red collars and cuffs, and red waistcoats.
Twenty Officers and Court Keepers on foot, two and two, carrying white wands, and dressed in long blue coats, reaching to the feet, with red collars and cuffs, and red facings to the laps behind.
Clerk of the Peace on horseback.
Four Sheriffs' Officers mounted as before.
The High Sheriff's Carriage,
Drawn by four superb horses, and containing the High Sheriff and his Chaplain.
The carriage accompanied by Six Policemen on either side.

The procession, thus formed, moved slowly forward along Castle Hill, through the Exchequer Gate, one of the finest of the remaining gates of Lincoln, now used for the offices of the Registrar of the Diocese and the Chapter Clerk, in whose office is still existing one of the authentic copies of Magna Charta, which in King John's reign were deposited in the most important cathedrals and monasteries of England. Proceeding forward through Minster Yard, the procession passed along the south side of the magnificent Cathedral, and by the residences of the Precentor and Sub-Dean, the Vicar's court or college, the Chancellor's and Choristers' houses, and the remains of the old Episcopal Palace, as well as the present magnificent palace of the Bishop. The procession then left the Minster Yard by the Potter Gate, and advanced through the New-road by the City Prison, along Silver-street, into High-street, and through the Stone Bow, or Guild-hall. This elegant building crosses the High-street, and consists of a large pointed arch, guarded on each side by a round tower; and on the outside of each tower is a lesser elliptical archway, for foot passengers. On the side of this building, in a niche in the east tower, is an elegantly sculptured statue of the Angel Gabriel, holding a scroll; and in the western one, the Virgin Mary, treading on a serpent; between them, over the principal arch, is a coat of arms, but much decayed; and on the outside the towers are the city arms. On the north front of the building are the rose and fleur-de-lis, crowned; an ornamental illuminated clock also adorns this building. The interior is used as the Common Hall for meetings of Town Council, &c.; for Record Rooms, and all the various municipal business of the city. The prisoners for the city were formerly confined here, and the sessions held in the large hall: the lower part is now used for shops.

From this point the procession advanced along High-street, over the river Witham, at the High Bridge (an ancient structure of one arch), then continued forward by the Corn Market, the fine old Norman church of St. Mary-le-Wigford, and the elegant little building, St. Mary's Conduit, and the churches of St. Mark and St. Peter at Gowts; the venerable remains of the palace of John of Gaunt, the Gowts Bridge, and St. Botolph's Church were then passed, and the Sheriff met the Judge, Sir Nicholas Conyngham Tindal, in his travelling carriage near the Bargate: here his lordship alighted, and having taken his seat in the Sheriff's carriage, the procession returned in the same order, and by the same route to the city gaol, where his lordship was received by the Mayor of the city, J. Stephenson, Esq., and conducted by him to the Court, a small inconvenient room, badly arranged and confined. The Judge's costume consisted of a black gown, with short wig, band, and black three-cornered hat. His lordship took his seat on the bench with the Mayor on his left hand; on the right were the High Sheriff and his chaplain; and on either side, the city Magistrates. The Crier of the Court having ordered silence, the Clerk of Assize read the writ appointing Judges, followed by that of the appointment of Councillors, &c., and the commission appointing assize day. The City Justices were then called over, and the Grand Jury sworn in, the proclamation against vice and immorality was then read, and the charge given to the Grand Jury. The Court was then adjourned to Monday; and, his lordship having again entered the carriage, the cavalcade moved forward, up the New-road by the Cathedral, to the Castle. The fine gates were opened to receive the procession, amidst a flourish of trumpets. On arriving at the front of the County Hall, the Judge was met by the Governor of the Gaol, and other gentlemen, and thus escorted into Court, when, the commissions having been read, the Court was adjourned, and the Judge returned to his lodgings.

The County Hall is a modern Gothic building, from the designs of Smirke: it consists of a spacious entrance hall in the centre, and two courts occupying the two wings; Grand Jury Room, Waiting, and Witnesses' Rooms, &c. There are subterranean passages for conveying the prisoners into the bar. The interior of the Courts is in a palatial style: the Judges' seats, and the panneling throughout, are very elegant.

On Monday the courts met; the Judges (Mr. Justice Maule having previously arrived privately in the City) taking their seats at 11 o'clock. The business commenced by the names of the Justices of the Peace being called over, and answering to their names; this was followed by the proclamation of "Gentlemen of the Grand Jury, answer to your names, and save your fines." After being called over, and an oath to observe impartiality, &c., being taken by the foreman, the Grand Jurors, four at once, had the following oath administered to them: "Gentlemen, the same oath your foreman hath taken on his part, you and each of you shall well and truly observe, perform, and keep, on your parts respectively, so help you God!" After this, the Proclamation against vice and immorality having been read, and silence ordered by the Bailiff, the Judge delivered his charge to the Grand Jury, and they retired. The Petty Jury were then called over, and sworn in by the following oath: "You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our Sovereign Lady the Queen and the prisoners at the bar, so help you God!" During this time, the Grand Jury having determined on finding a true bill against a prisoner, the foreman, accompanied by the jurors, enters the gallery, and, having placed the bill in a square open tray, attached to the end of a long pole, hands it down to the Clerk of Assize, and, the bill and indictment having been read over to the prisoner, the trial commences.

During the swearing in of the Justices, an officer of the court holds a long white wand, on the end of which is a glove, which he hands round, and into which each one present drops a shilling.

On Sunday morning the Judges attended divine service at the Cathedral, in state; and this majestic pile of building was never seen to greater advantage than on the entrance of this splendid pageant into its aisles. The civil procession was formed similarly to the previous day—but all on foot, preceding the carriage. On arriving at the west entrance of the Minster, the trumpeters having stationed themselves at the doorway, his lordship entered amidst a flourish of trumpets, and, accompanied by the High Sheriff, his Chaplain, and other civil officers, proceeded up the nave, where they were met by the ecclesiastical authorities in full costume, who escorted them into the choir. As the two processions met, the officers with the wands filed off right and left, to let the vergers and the clergy pass. His lordship proceeded up the nave, with the Chancellor of the Diocese on his left hand, and the Minor Canon on his right, his train borne by an officer in waiting. Full Cathedral service having been celebrated by the Chancellor, the Minor Canon and other clergy, an excellent sermon was preached by the Chaplain to the High Sheriff; and the procession returned in the same order as on its entrance. A vast concourse of people, numbering several well-dressed ladies, assembled to witness this imposing pageant. Every space was a complete circle of beauty, contrasting strangely with the sombre solemnity of the gigantic arches, and the warmth and variety of colour in the dresses with the cold rigidity of the stone.

Javelin-men were formerly the most picturesque portion of the procession; they have, however, been of late years abolished at Lincoln, and the white wand used instead. Javelin-men are still used in several counties, and, to render our examples complete, we have engraved a group of them, as they have just been revived at Oxford. The present High Sheriff of that county, Colonel North, having determined upon adopting them, chose 25 of his principal tenantry, and who were habited in the gentlemanly dress of olive green coat, buff waistcoat, drab breeches, and gaiters. They were all mounted on fine horses, and each man carried a javelin. The High Sheriff, in his carriage and four, dressed as a deputy lieutenant, and accompanied by the trumpeters in livery and Javelin-men, and a numerous retinue of friends, met the Judge at the railway station, and escorted him into the city with all the usual honours.

We find recorded an interesting instance of this relic of feudal pageantry, in the "Memoirs of John Evelyn," who was the last Sheriff of the counties of Surrey and Sussex, jointly. On this occasion, he attended the Judges, with 116 servants in green satin doublets and cloth cloaks, guarded with silver galloon, as were the brims of their hats, which were adorned with white feathers. These men carried new javelins; and two trumpeters bore banners, on which were emblazoned Evelyn's arms. There were, besides, 30 gentlemen, to whom he was uncle, or great-uncle, all clad in the same colours, who came, with several others, to do him honour.

The New Houses of Parliament.—Mr. C. Barry, the architect, has sent to the Government, an account of the exact state of the buildings intended for the new Houses of Parliament, upon which it appears that the centre and curtain portions of the river front are roofed in. The north wing is up in readiness for the roofs, part of which are already fixed, and the remainder are being put on. The south wing is nearly up to a level of the roofs, which are prepared, and in readiness for being fixed. A considerable portion of the north flank of the building is now being roofed in, and the south flank is up to the level of the roof which is being prepared, and will soon be ready for fixing. The remainder of the north and south flanks, together with the turrets and pinnacles surmounting them, will be completed in the course of the present year. The Victoria Tower is carried up to a height of thirty-eight feet, and the Clock Tower is at a height of thirty-six feet above the ground. The House of Lords is roofed in, and the ceiling and other fittings of that chamber are in hand. The central tower is carried up to a height of twenty-eight feet above the ground. The House of Commons is about thirty feet above the ground, and will be roofed in during the present year. The other portions of the building are, upon an average, thirty feet above the level of the ground, some of which are in readiness for the roofs (now nearly ready for fixing), while others are being roofed in. The alterations directed to be made at the Victoria Tower and Gallery, and the Queen's Robing room, have been carried into effect. A contract has been entered into for the finishings of the entire building, and those of the House of Lords, and the rooms provided for the business of that house are in hand. Some delay has taken place in the fixing of the ironwork of the roofs, owing to the unsettled state of the iron trade, and difficulties with workmen. The stone for the exterior of the building is still continuing to be supplied in great abundance, and of most excellent quality. The present estimate of the total amount of the cost of the building, is £928,913. Prince Albert and the Commissioners for Encouraging the Fine Arts, visited the new houses a few days ago, and spent some time in the examination. His Royal Highness warmly congratulated Mr. Barry, the architect, and Mr. Grissell, the contractor, upon the progress made and the admirable manner in which the work was executed. There are now upwards of 700 men employed on these works, under the superintendence of Mr. Allen, and sheds are being erected to accommodate 150 more masons.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1845.

The most effective debate that has yet occurred on the Income-tax took place on Monday evening. We speak, of course, of the arguments, for as to the votes, they remain as they were—the words and the actions of the great body of the Whigs being of no kin to each other. This carping and cavilling at the tax—this denouncing in principle what they do not oppose in practice—is beginning to be exceedingly contemptible. The inconsistency of many of his own party was happily exposed by Mr. Charles Buller, with that witty sarcasm of which he has so perfect a command; and we wish it had as much effect in the house as it will out of it. Along with his strictures on the Income-tax, he dissected the whole financial plan of the Government with great skill and some truth—the omission of the greater articles of consumption from the remodelled Tariff being a fact that almost invites invidious observations. It is true the change does not affect corn and butter, and does let in alum and lard, by which both butter and bread may be adulterated; and such articles as divi divi and goose-skin furnish an apt enough topic for a little raillery. But it should be recollected, the main ground on which these 430 duties are abolished, is their unproductiveness. They were nearly useless as sources of revenue, and that the articles themselves should scarcely be known by name, that they should be "remote from use, obscure, and subtle," is not to be wondered at. Had they been well known, and in demand, they would have been productive to the revenue, and, as a consequence, would not have been abolished at all: it would be better to have the greater boon, but we can only have what can be safely afforded. Public feeling will not go so completely with Mr. Buller in this part of his subject as the other; he will have the laugh with him, for that his cleverness deserves and wins from every one; when he attacks the injustice of the Income-tax with the same weapon, he gets the laugh and the conviction too. The member for Liskeard would, doubtless, say that a different plan would have effected these greater changes and secured the revenue also; but the Legislature has to deal with the specific plan before it and no other: a better one might be framed, perhaps, but no Government has as yet proposed it.

We have so repeatedly stated our opinions of the justice and policy of a Property-tax, and of the injustice and impolicy of a Tax on Income, that we do not feel called upon to go into the question again in this, probably the last week of its discussion in the Commons. To the striking illustration of the oppressive inequality of the tax furnished by Mr. Sheil, when he placed the precarious income of the literary man in comparison with the fixed, certain, and permanent revenue of the landed proprietor, as substantial as "the sure and firm set earth" from which it is derived, nothing can be added; nor is the defence of the injustice of taxing the struggling man of a profession, at the same rate as "the lord of Netherby, and the master of Drayton," so much founded on the principle that it is right to do it, as on the difficulty, in practice, of doing otherwise. This appears to us a poor defence; the "difficulties" in the way of living honestly in the world, do not pass as a valid plea at the Old Bailey when an individual has chosen to adopt the short and easy method of helping himself to other people's means instead of earning his own. It may be difficult to live honestly; but it is by no means impossible, and the duty of society is to compel both individuals and governments to try the experiment. We must confess that Sir Robert Peel has not been much pressed on the subject by excitement out of doors. The flock has submitted to the shears with extreme quietude, which may be attributed in a great measure to the fact of pasture being at present pretty abundant. When food gets scarce, employment slackens, and the sources of wealth lose some of their fulness, we shall hear complainings arise, loud and frequent. The principle of the measure is as unjust now as it ever will be; but in England it is seldom much popular excitement is roused on behalf of an abstract question of right and wrong. The bitterness of the draught is "craftily qualified," and will go down smoothly.

While Mr. Disraeli was accusing Sir Robert Peel of appropriating to himself the political garments of the Whigs, the Ministry was preparing another proof of there being some degree of justice in the charge. The removal of the Civil Disabilities of the Jews, was one of the measures the Liberals proposed, but never could carry; their opponents being the men who now make the concession they formerly resisted. The measure will, of course, become law.

A discussion was raised on Tuesday evening, on the New Poor Law, which was chiefly remarkable for exhibiting more decisively than ever, the political extinction of the member for Knaresborough, Mr. Ferrand, of "devil's dust" celebrity. The Home Secretary is not particularly thin-skinned, but he cannot totally overlook an attack from an opponent who has any shred of political influence. There is a significance, therefore, in his being able to preserve a perfect, even a contemptuous silence towards this hon. gentleman. Mr. Ferrand made a speech on Tuesday evening, one of his speeches which could be made by no one else,—and to all the furious denunciations of the Poor Law and the Government in general, and Sir J. Graham in particular, the callous Secretary deigns not in reply a single word; from his answer to Mr. S. Crawford, it could not be gathered that he is conscious of the existence of Mr. Ferrand, once "the Thunderer of the Scene."

COURT AND HAUT TON.

Her Majesty's Second Levee.—Her Majesty held her second levee for the season, at St. James's Palace, on Wednesday. It was most numerously and splendidly attended. The Queen, accompanied by Prince Albert, left Buckingham Palace shortly before two o'clock, and was loudly cheered by the crowd which had assembled in the Park. The Foreign Ambassadors, and all the Cabinet Ministers, arrived in state shortly before two o'clock. Her Majesty and Prince Albert appeared in excellent health and spirits. The general company and the presentations were exceedingly numerous.

The Order of the Thistle.—After the levee on Wednesday, the Queen held a Chapter of the Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle. The Queen was seated in the chair of state, and wore the mantle and collar of the order. His Royal Highness Prince Albert also wore the mantle and collar. Her Majesty was pleased to command the Knights Brethren to take their seats at the table, according to their seniority in the order; the officers standing in their places at the bottom of the table. The suffrages having been duly collected, the Queen was pleased to declare that James, Duke of Montrose, had been duly elected a Knight of the Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle. Her Majesty also conferred the honour of knighthood upon the Duke of Montrose. His Grace rising had the honour to kiss the Sovereign's hand. The Duke of Montrose again kneeling near the Sovereign, and the Deputy-Secratary on his knee presenting to her Majesty the riband and jewel of the order, her Majesty was graciously pleased to place the same over the Noble Duke's left shoulder. His Grace having kissed the Sovereign's hand, and received the congratulations of the Knights Brethren, retired. The ceremony took place in the throne-room in the presence of the Ministers and Officers of State.

Death of Lord Churchill.—Lord Churchill, uncle to the Duke of Marlborough, died at Brighton last week. His lordship had not been in good health for several years, most of which he spent in Brighton. Just before his death, however, he was in his usual state of health, and his immediate dissolution was unexpected. His lordship was the second son of George, fourth Duke of Marlborough, and was born the 26th December, 1779. He was uncle to the present Duke of Marlborough, and was created Baron Churchill in the year 1815. He was Colonel of the Queen's Own Regiment of Oxfordshire Yeomanry Cavalry. His lordship is succeeded in his title by his eldest son, Francis George, now Lord Churchill.

The Earl of Mornington.—A Brussels paper says:—"Lord Wellesley, who has so long resided at Brussels, which he left only on Saturday last, has already taken the oaths to her Britannic Majesty as Earl of Mornington having succeeded to that title on the death of his father, with a fortune of £60,000 sterling per annum."

The Dowager Grand Duchess of Baden.—The Duke and Duchess of Hamilton gave a grand entertainment on Wednesday evening in Portman square, the guests being invited to meet her Royal Highness the Dowager Grand Duchess of Baden. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester honoured the noble duke and duchess with her company at dinner on the occasion. The Duke of Hamilton received his illustrious guest in the entrance hall of the mansion, and conducted her Royal Highness to the principal saloon. The banquet was served at eight o'clock. At a later period of the evening the Duke of Hamilton had a musical soirée. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge came from Buckingham Palace shortly before eleven o'clock.

Earl Grey.—Earl Grey completes his 81st year to-day.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY. March 8.

At the last congregation the following degrees were conferred:—
Honorary Masters of Arts.—George Thomas Orlando Bridgeman, Trinity College.
Masters of Arts.—William Frederick Witts, King's College; John Harrison, Queen's College.
Bachelors of Arts.—Compton Hutton, Trinity College; William Brownrigg Smith, St. John's College.
Classical Tripos.—Mr. Frederick Peel, of Trinity, already announced in the first class of Classical Tripos, is second son of Sir Robert Peel. Of the six gentlemen comprising the first class, five are of Trinity; and of the twelve making up the second class, eight are of the same college.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY. March 11.

Henry Barnes Byrne, scholar of Oriel College, was this day elected to the University Latin Scholarship. There were 36 candidates.

Henry Wentworth Acland, M.A., Fellow of All Souls College, has been appointed Lee's Lecturer in Anatomy, vacant by the resignation of Dr. Kidd.

The Late Innovations in the Church.—Acting, as it is understood, in accordance with the expressed wishes of the Bishop of London, the officiating clergymen at St. Mary's Ware, have resumed the use of the gown in preaching, and have given up the prayer for the Church Militant, and the weekly collection of the Offertory. The preacher last Sunday morning entreated all who had left to return. The service in the town-hall continues to be well attended, and on Sunday, Dr. Alder, of London, read prayers, and preached to crowded congregations; and it is intended that on Easter Sunday the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper shall be administered in that building.

The Bishop of Ely.—We learn that the Bishop of Ely still suffers from his cough, but in other respects his lordship is better.

The death of the Rev. Sydney Smith, canon residentiary of St. Paul's, has rendered vacant the vicarage of Halberton, near Tiverton, Devon, and the rectory of Combe Florey, Somerset.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Election of City Pleader.—John Locke, Esq., has been elected City Pleader, by a majority of 20, over Sir Walter B. Riddell, Bart.

Bank of England Meeting.—On Thursday, the half-yearly meeting was held, and was fully attended. Mr. Cotton, the Governor, moved a resolution that a dividend at the rate of 3½ per cent. out of interest and profits, after deducting 7d. in the pound for the Income tax, should be declared. In reply to a question, the Governor stated that the Rest, before the dividend was deducted, would be £3,573,524 4s. 2d.; and after the dividend was paid it would be £3,079,025 7s. 9d, The resolution was agreed to, and thanks were voted to the chairman and deputy-chairman.

The Literary Fund.—The annual meeting of the members of this institution was held on Wednesday, in Great Russell-street, Sir William Chatterton, Bart., in the chair. The report stated that the sum dispensed, during the past year, to distressed authors and their families, was £955, and that the total amount applied to this purpose since the formation of the society was £31,183. The committee felt happy to announce that her Majesty had granted the institution the privilege of bearing the Imperial Crown as an addition to its armorial bearings, with the title of the "Royal Corporation of the Literary Fund." The Marquis of Lansdowne was re-elected President, and the vacancy caused by the death of the Earl of Mountnorris, was filled up by the appointment of the Archbishop of Dublin. After the adoption of the report, Charles Dickens, Esq., Fraser Tytler, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Mill, Sir Harris Nicolas, Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, William Brockeldon, Esq., and Edward Gandy, Eeq., were elected members of the committee.

Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest.—On Sunday evening last a sermon was preached on behalf of the funds of this truly excellent charity, by the Rev. Saunderson Robins, M.A., at Christ Church, Dorset-square. In the course of a very eloquent appeal it was stated that the total number of out-patients relieved is now nearly 3000, and the number of in-patients 200. At the conclusion of a very impressive sermon a satisfactory collection was made.

Mortality in the Metropolis.—The registration for the week ending Saturday last shows the total number of deaths, from all causes, to be 1141. The weekly average of deaths in 1840, 1841, 1842, 1843, 1844, and corrected to the middle of the present year, appears to be, males, 491; females, 471; total, 963. The number of births in the week ending Saturday last is put down at 1254. By the meteorological observations taken at the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, it appears that the variations of the thermometer were thus during last week:—Monday, highest, 40 5, lowest, 26 0; Tuesday, 31 4, 23 8; Wednesday, 31 4, 19 6; Thursday, 28 7, 18 8; Friday, 35 6, 27 3; Saturday, 37 0, 29 6—the means being 34 4, 24 2.

The Weather.—The very severe and extraordinary weather for the season is the topic of general conversation, and the prolongation of winter begins to give rise to general discomfort. During the week there has been severe frost and snow. On Tuesday afternoon there was a very heavy snowstorm, and it has snowed occasionally since. A keen north-easterly wind has generally prevailed. On Wednesday night the thermometer stood at 20 degrees, and on Thursday morning at nine o'clock it was at 22 degrees. Wind north-east.

LAW INTELLIGENCE

The Independent West Middlesex Assurance Company.—A case has been heard in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, by the decision upon which the plaintiff will obtain restitution of some property out of which he was defrauded by the above swindling Company. The plaintiff, a Mr. Snow, was one of the persons entrapped by the scheme, and was induced by the captivating representations of the directors to invest a sum of £2000 in the purchase of an annuity of £280 a year, for the joint lives of himself and his wife and the survivor, the payment of which was "secured" by the bond of the managers. The plaintiff discovered the fraud practised upon him in 1841, and proceeded, by actions at law upon the bond against such of the parties as he was able to pursue. Meantime Hole, the manager, invested some of the plunder in the purchase of leasehold houses at Maida-hill, which he had endeavoured to secure by a settlement upon his wife, and the present bill was filed to set aside this settlement, on the ground of fraud, and to make the property available in repayment of the plaintiff's £2000. Hole himself had disappeared from the contest, and the opposition to the plaintiff's relief in equity was made on behalf of the trustee of the settlement, the children of Mrs. Hole, and other persons who were interested under it. The Vice-Chancellor said that the courts of equity were established to set aside frauds. The only question was, whether it was not manifest on the face of the narration that a fraud had been practised in the present case; and unless the Court had vigour enough to break through the sort of cobwebs which were thrown about the case by the technical difficulties which had been raised upon matters that would not sustain the objections, the Court might as well, as far as regarded this part of its jurisdiction, be altogether abolished. His Honour then recapitulated the facts of the transaction, and said he thought there was a clear case made out against Hole, who did not appear, and quite a sufficient case also against the other parties, who, though personally innocent, were implicated in the transaction, because Hole had thought proper to make use of their names in order to secure to himself the plunder he had made of other persons. He, therefore, declared that the settlement was fraudulent, and ought to be cancelled, and decreed a sale of the property and the payment out of the proceeds of the plaintiff's £2000, with interest at five per cent.

POLICE.

A Respectable Lady Charged with Stealing from a Shop.—At Worship-street, on Saturday last, Elizabeth Farmer, an elegantly-attired elderly widow, residing in Brunswick place, City-road, was charged with having stolen a piece of salted beef at the shop of a butcher named Flowerdean, in Pitfield-street, Hoxton. — Charles Welford, a shopman to the prosecutor, stated that the prisoner entered the shop between ten and eleven o'clock that morning, and he was privately ordered by his mistress to keep a watchful eye upon her, as she was suspected to have purloined some meat when she last called, a few days previously. Having advanced to the counter, the prisoner requested to be served with some sausages, and while giving the order she stooped forward over a pan containing several pieces of salted meat, one of which she adroitly abstracted, and secreted it underneath her shawl. He made no observation at the time, but handed her the articles she had purchased, which the prisoner paid for, and immediately left the shop. Witness followed her out into the street, and on accusing her of the robbery, the prisoner vehemently denied the charge, when he suddenly lifted up her shawl and exposed the stolen property. The prisoner then earnestly entreated forgiveness, but he turned a deaf ear to her supplications, and on the arrival of a policeman he gave her into custody. Police-sergeant N 32 stated, that since the prisoner had been in custody he had visited her residence, which presented nothing whatever to indicate that the offence had been committed under the pressure of distress, as it was well furnished, and bore every appearance of comfort and respectability.—On being asked if she wished to say anything, the prisoner, who was dreadfully agitated, made an agitated appeal to the magistrate to induce him to take a lenient view of the case, and spare her the pain and ignominy of a committal to prison. She assured him that she had acted on the occasion under a sudden and uncontrollable impulse, which she felt it impossible either to account for or excuse. She was connected with a family of the highest respectability, and having herself been a householder in the parish for more than twenty years, she implored the magistrate to deal mercifully towards her, and she was willing to make any pecuniary atonement for her folly and indiscretion.—Mr. Broughton told her, very properly, that it was his duty to administer even-handed justice, and remanded her till Monday.—On hearing the decision, the prisoner burst into a passionate flood of tears, and was removed, in a fainting state, out of the dock.—On Monday the prisoner was again brought up, but the witnesses were not in attendance.—Mr. Broughton said he could not suffer the interests of justice to be compromised by the withdrawal of the evidence in a case of this description, and he should, therefore, again remand the prisoner, and order summonses to be issued to compel the attendance of the necessary witnesses at the next examination.—The prisoner was again brought up on Wednesday, when the shopman was in attendance, and after some hesitation he admitted that the prisoner's friends had made an application to his master.—Mr. Broughton ordered the depositions to be taken at once.—In defence, the prisoner, who covered her face with her hands, and appeared convulsed with grief, said she was at a loss what to allege in answer to the charge, further than to declare that she had dealt for more than twenty years at the prosecutor's shop, and had never on any occasion been guilty of a dishonest action.—Mr. Broughton said that he felt it his duty to commit her for trial upon the charge, and that anything she had to offer in exculpation she might lay before the jury.

The Late Case of Poisoning at Camberwell.—At Lambeth Office, on Monday, George May, shopman to the late Mr. Montague, who, it will be recollected, had, with Mrs. Montague, been poisoned at Camberwell on the 11th of last month, was placed in the felons' dock on the following charge—"For feloniously appropriating to his own use various sums of money received by him for and on account of his late master; also with forging the name of the deceased to various receipts in the parish of St. Giles, Camberwell."—Mr. Dodd, the vestry-clerk of Camberwell, attended to prosecute on behalf of the heir-at-law to the late Mr. Montague. Mr. Dodd said that since the mysterious death of Mr. and Mrs. Montague their books and accounts had been examined, and it was found that the prisoner, who had been their shopman and confidential servant, had received various sums of money on account of his master, of which he had made no entry in the books kept for that purpose; and, coupling this fact with the information which had been obtained from the customers themselves, the nephew of Mr. Montague, who is next of kin, deemed it advisable to give him into custody on the charge of embezzlement and forgery.—After some evidence had been given, the magistrate (Mr. Henry) said that he was of opinion that there were grounds for remand, and he asked what was the total amount of the alleged embezzlement.—Mr. Dodd replied, from £50 to £100, and added that he should be able to show on a future occasion that the prisoner had represented himself on many occasions as the nephew of the deceased.—The prisoner was remanded.

IRELAND.

Death of Sir H. F. Barrington by Fire.—On Thursday morning last week a fatal accident occurred to Sir H. F. Barrington, a very old gentleman, who resided in the house of Mr. John Ryan, 20, Middle Gloucester-place, Dublin. The deceased, who, it is said, was not at all in affluent circumstances, resided for some time past in the above house, and was attended by a female named Ellen Barrington. On Wednesday night she left the deceased going to bed about ten o'clock, and on Thursday morning, about ten, she went in and found him dead, sitting in an upright position in his chair before the fire. She at once called in a policeman, and he found that deceased had been burned in several places, and no doubt he died from the injuries he had received. It is a curious fact that, with the exception of the chair and the portions of deceased's person already stated, nothing else in the apartment seems to have been on fire. Mr. Hyndman held an inquest on the remains of the unfortunate gentleman, and after the examination of several witnesses—one of whom was Lady Barrington, sister-in-law of the deceased, who deposed that the family of which he was a member were desirous of conferring acts of attention and kindness on him, but that he would not receive them—the jury found that he died of suffocation, caused by his clothes having accidentally caught fire. The deceased was elder brother of the late Sir Jonah Barrington.

Fatal Accident in Cork.—On Thursday week an accident of a fatal kind took place on Patrick's Quay, Cork, occasioned by the falling of a corn store, four stories high, the property of Burke Brothers. It was soon ascertained that four persons were missing—John O'Brien, a chandler; Timothy Hanlan, an old labourer; Patrick Walsh, a young man and labourer; and Honoria Griffin, a young woman similarly employed with the others. A fifth person, James Dillon, escaped. The stores are very extensive, and it is computed the quantity of wheat in them amounted to 120 tons, in addition to 600 or 700 barrels of oats.

The Repeal Association.—The amount of subscription announced at the meeting of the Repeal Association on Monday, was £477. The principal proceedings were a notice of the late assertion, said to have been made by the Duke of Wellington, that at the monster meetings no petitions had been adopted, which the speakers said must be a mis-report, as there were a great many; a notice of the manner in which Irish papers are treated in England, which was severely condemned; and a further condemnation of the report of Lord Devon's commission. Mr. O'Connell was present and spoke on all these topics, but they were introduced by other gentlemen.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

The Convict James Tapping.—This unfortunate young man persists in refusing to acknowledge his guilt or to make any confession. To the admonitions and instructions of the ordinary (the Rev. Mr. Davis) he has attended with perfect docility, reading those portions of the sacred Scriptures and other works pointed out and recommended to him, but evincing a great repugnance to converse upon the subject of the crime for which he is to suffer. He attended divine service both morning and afternoon on Sunday, in the chapel of Newgate, and joined in the devotions with great apparent piety. He frequently gives way to tears, and expresses much affection for the unfortunate deceased (Emma Whiter). When the dreadful announcement was made to him on Saturday morning that Easter Monday was the day positively fixed for his execution, and that he had not the slightest chance of a reprieve, he fell into a paroxysm of grief, but recovered, after a little while, the same composure he had before exhibited. The last culprit executed at Newgate was Crouch, for the murder of his wife in Little Marylebone-street, St. Marylebone, who suffered on last Easter Monday, the day appointed this year for the execution of James Tapping.

An Old Woman Burned to Death.—On Saturday morning, between twelve and one o'clock, a female named Sarah Cox, who had arrived at the age of 103 years, expired under the following distressing circumstances:—The deceased resided at Chapel-place, Brompton, and was in possession of a small independence. Her daughter, who is upwards of 60 years of age, and who lived with her, had left home for the purpose of obtaining her quaterly amount of income, when the old woman, in reaching something from the mantelpiece, fell over the guard in front of the fire and set herself in a blaze, in which state she was found by her landlady; but before the flames could be extinguished her clothes were consumed, and her person frightfully scorched. She was conveyed to St. George's Hospital, where death terminated her sufferings.

Death from Starvation.—On Monday evening an inquest was held, before Mr. Gell, at St. James's Workhouse, Poland-street, on the body of Mary Ann Thompson, aged 75. Mr. Frederick Tothill, surgeon, said that, on Saturday afternoon last, he was called to see the deceased, at her lodging, in Hopkins-street. He found her lying upon an old mattrass, covered with a few filthy rags, and in a room almost destitute of furniture. She was quite dead, and apparently had been so for eight or ten hours. His decided opinion was that she died from want of proper and sufficient raiment and food. The room was in a filthy condition, and there was not the slightest appearance of comfort. From some inquiries witness made, he learned that the deceased had been in the habit of getting her living by begging at the door of a chapel in Warwick-street, until she and other poor persons were driven away. The jury returned a verdict of "Died from the want of the necessaries of life."

Robbery of Bullion.—On Friday morning week a box, containing two bars of gold, value £1600, was stolen from the luggage-train station of the Dover Railroad, at the Bricklayers' Arms. The box arrived between three and four o'clock in the morning, and was deposited amongst other luggage, and at six o'clock it was missed.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Private letters from India, state that the Bishop of Calcutta, the Rev. Dr. Wilson, was suffering from severe indisposition. His lordship intended returning to England immediately; but as he was at a distance of 800 miles up the country from Calcutta, it was apprehended that this great distance would be almost too much for him to accomplish without very great fatigue.

A curious but not a very uncommon discovery was made in Hamoaze last week. The moorings lately occupied by the Actæon, 26, off St. John's Lekè were examined, when, on heaving up the anchor, a small hole was perceived in the stock on the surface. On driving off the hoops and taking the stock apart, out came a fine black congor eel, above four feet in length, and weighing above 10 pounds. He must have entered when very young, as the hole on the outside would not admit one half his size, and although he could not turn in his house, yet he must have lived well, as he was remarkably fine and fat.

A continental meteorologist has predicted an unusually warm summer for 1845, because the spots on the sun are diminishing in size!

The quick trains commenced running on Monday on the Great Western Railway. The journey from Exeter to London, 194 miles, was performed in four hours and fifty-three minutes, up to the ticket platform, and the passengers had alighted in the Paddington station within the prescribed time of five hours. The down train reached Bristol, 118¾ miles, in less than three hours, after stopping ten minutes at Swindon, and calling at Didcot and Bath. The running time is calculated at fifty miles an hour, and the whole journey was performed with ease and exactitude as to time.

According to intelligence from Vienna, dated 23rd ult., the Duchess de Berri is at present staying at Venice, and has given up her residence at Gratz. It is stated that she hopes to find at Venice much greater facilities for maintaining her connection with the Legitimist party in France.

By the last accounts from Constantinople, which are of the date Feb. 17, we learn that Dr. Wolff had arrived at Trebisonde, in company with an Ameer, who was on his way to England, as Ambassador from the King of Bokhara to her Majesty Queen Victoria.

A letter from Belgrade, of the 24th ult., assures us that Servia is again in a very disturbed state, and that the emissaries of Prince Milosch are actively sowing the seeds of a new revolution.

A Dijon journal states that a few days ago two little Savoyards were found in the road near that place frozen to death. One of them was kneeling, with clasped hands extended upwards, as if in the act of prayer.

A few days since a gentleman shot in the neighbourhood of Hasborough, Suffolk, a very curious bird, called the chanting hawk, or Falco musicus dandin. It is a native of Africa, and is very seldom seen in this country. Cuvier says it is the only bird of prey that sings agreeably. In size it equals the goshawk, its plumage is grey above, white, barred with brown on the lower part of the back and on the under parts of the body.

The report that Sir Edward Knatchbull was to be raised to the Peerage has been contradicted, apparently on good authority.

Reschid Effendi, the Governor of Smyrna, has issued a proclamation, interdicting the issue of coin at more than its value as fixed by the tariff reducing the price of bread and meat, and subjecting bakers who shall sell by false weight to penalties. Instead of bastinado, which is the usual punishment, delinquents are to be obliged to close their shops one day for every drachma that their bread is deficient in weight.

The King of Naples has just ordered surveys to be made for two most important railroads, which are to unite the capital with the two extreme points of his states from north to east. The first of these two grand enterprises, from the north, is a length of forty-four leagues, and is to run from Naples to Termoli, on the Adriatic. This line will also have a branch to Chieti. The second line, to the east, is seventy-eight leagues, and is intended to be carried from Naples to Lecci, being eight leagues from the port of Brondes, on the Adriatic. The Duke of Tuscany is also endeavouring to obtain a communication as far as Ravenna, or Rimini, with the railroad constructed between Leghorn and Florence.

Four engineers have started from Paris this week to make a survey for a projected railway from Madrid to Cadiz, connecting the capital with the principal Spanish seaport. The length of line will be about 300 miles and it will have to pass two chains of mountains. M. Lafitte, we hear, is the principal speculator in this great and important enterprise.

Gibraltar letters mention the death of Mr. D. Kay, the British Consul General at Tangier. The occurrence took place rather suddenly.

A letter from St. Petersburgh, in the Journal de Francfort, states that the health of the Emperor of Russia is completely re-established, and that the natural strength of his constitution has enabled him to triumph over the effects of his recent family afflictions. The health of the Empress, the letter states, is still very delicate, and requires the constant attendance of her physicians.

MONSIEUR PERROT.

In the last number of the Illustrated News we offered a striking likeness of M. Perrot, and in accordance with a promise made at the same time, we now give a sketch of the principal incidents of this distinguished artist's life. M. Perrot was born at Lyons, in 1810. His father was the principal mechanist of the Grand Theatre, and no sooner had the little fellow strength to undergo the severe training required for the profession, than he was put under the care of the head teacher of dancing. He was thus born for the stage, and stepped, as it were, from his cradle on the boards. He soon became the favourite pupil of his master—his agility was prodigious—his patience exemplary—his aptitude intuitive, and at ten years of age he was more advanced than other lads generally are at fifteen. At that period, Mazuria, whom our readers will recollect appeared at Covent Garden during the latter years of Mr. Charles Kemble's management, was the rage of Lyons. The Grand Theatre was every night filled to an overflow to witness his performance of the Italian Polichinelle, or of the monkey Jocko, in which he displayed an activity fearful to behold, and a degree of comic humour almost irresistible. The young Perrot saw and admired, and having full opportunities at rehearsal of witnessing the studies of Mazurier, he determined to appear in the same character at one of the minor theatres. Without letting any one into his confidence, he prepared the necessary costumes, and having arranged with the manager of the Theatre des Celestines, he appeared in the Petit Carnival de Venice as Polichinelle, and astonished as well as delighted the audience.

Perrot, encouraged by this success, eagerly sought for an engagement in the capital, and we find him, in 1823, at the age of 13, making a first appearance in Paris, at the Gaieté. Mazurier at the same time was astonishing the Badauds by his performance of Jocko the ape, but Perrot's representation of a similar character was deemed nearly equal, and the Gaieté was crammed every night he played. It was well known that Mazurier studied all his pranks from the living models at the Jardin des Plantes, and Perrot, following the example of so good a master, was also a frequent visitor at the Singerie. But he did not confine his studies to the monkey tribe, but, extending them to the movement of birds in the large aviary of the Garden, was inspired with the idea that the graceful rising of a bird from the ground could be successfully imitated in dancing. The celebrated Taglioni had conceived and acted on a similar inspiration, and she and Perrot thus formed that school of grace which has superseded the jumping and bounding of the old style.

The object of Perrot's ambition was the Academie Royale, and in 1830, he made his début before the most critical audience in the world, where there is no indulgence for first attempts, and where one false step is literally an unpardonable faux pas in the Rue Lepelletier. A rôle was not granted to him, but he was allowed to appear in the "Rossignol," and in a pas in the "Muette de Portici.' At that period men dancers were out of fashion, and Perrot had an awful struggle to surmount that feeling. He did surmount it, however, and in a pas de deux with the celebrated Taglioni, in the ballet of "Fernand Cortes," he received thunders of applause. His style was so light, so elegant, and graceful, that he was at once pronounced to be the only man dancer fit to appear with Taglioni. The ballet of "Flore and Zephyr" was then got up for the purpose of giving full scope to those brilliant stars, and Perrot was again successful.

After a long repetition of similar triumphs at the French Opera, our artist made a tour through all the capitals of Europe, and he was received in the most rapturous manner at Naples, Milan, Berlin, and Vienna. In this latter capital he aspired to a higher rank, and not only danced at the Grand Theatre, but he composed ballets, which have been deemed models of perfection. The public are not only indebted to M. Perrot for his individual talent as a dancer and a composer of ballets, but it is to his masterly lessons we owe the admirable performances of Carlotta Grisi. About eight years since Carlotta appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre, in a pas de deux with Perrot. Her style was then unformed, but Perrot saw that she possessed all the qualifications of a first-rate artist. He became her master, revealed all the secrets of the art, demonstrated the principles on which Taglioni's excellence was created, and in the end made La Grisi the excellent dancer she now is.

When, three seasons since, the beautiful ballet of "Alma" was brought out, Perrot, with a view to display his peculiar talent, devised the admirable pas de fascination, which excited so much applause. Mr. Lumley was so struck with this proof of his genius, that he immediately contemplated employing Perrot as Maitre de Ballet. He was first employed to produce Dumilâtre to her advantage, and the succcess of the divertissement of "L'Aurore" justified the choice. Dumilâtre's fame has been perpetuated by a beautiful sketch in the part, which represents her sailing away on clouds. The "Houri" was another conception of Perrot's, adapted to the aerial form of Dumilâtre. On the occasion of the Queen coming in state to the Opera, Perrot devised the celebrated pas de deux betwixt Ellsler and Cerito, in which for the first time these great rivals were combined in a memorable struggle for pre-eminence, which produced applause, encores, showers of bouquets, and ovations innumerable. Since that time Perrot has revelled in the most varied creations. "Le Bal sous Louis XIV.," "Ondine," "La Paysanne Grande Dame," "Esmeralda," and last, but not least, "Eoline," prove that Perrot can pourtray with equal ease romantic and positive existence, as well as that which is purely imaginative. Until repeated accidents had warned him to desist, Perrot performed the most remarkable and the most novel feats of dancing. Since then he has taught his corps de ballet, with the greatest success, the art of combining mimic effects and poetical motion with those that are merely saltatory, and his ballets combine the most novel devices of scenery and machinery, of dancing and of pantomime. The art must ever remain his debtor.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Sooth to say, the opening of Her Majesty's Theatre on Saturday last was a species of miracle. The severity of the weather had first laid low all those of the troupe who possessed voices, and next those who had the most need of their legs. To complete the misfortune, at the last moment, Perrot, in one of his fits of impetuosity, descending through a trap-door, had broken his head, and had shed as much blood as one of the heroes of Ariosto. Fortunately, like the aforesaid imaginary personages, all the dramatis personæ re-appeared on the stage at last, although three-quarters of an hour after the appointed time. But, owing to the abovementioned causes having rendered the rehearsals incomplete, the performances dragged on to an unusually late hour, and half the perfections of opera and ballet were obscured. On Tuesday they came forth in full relief.

The opera is a work of the highest order of merit; the composer has taken possession of the ruling thought of Victor Hugo, and has worked it out up to the catastrophe without for a moment swerving from his object in the search of clap-traps of style and meretricious effects. On Tuesday, encore followed encore from the rising of the curtain, and if all the demands for repetition had been acceded to, the second night's performances would have been as prolonged as the first. Solos, duets, and trios were applauded with equal fervour, but the concerted pieces created the most surprise and admiration. The composer has managed his score in the introductions to his concerted pieces so as to allow each singer in his turn to develop the resources and beauties of his voice—the diversity of feeling by which the personages are agitated is constantly felt, and thus the ensembles possess a novelty and an impassioned fervour unprecedented.

Verdi has been unusually felicitous in his distribution of the vocal parts. The various characters are so musically individualised, and so peculiarly accompanied by the orchestra, that the voice of the singer becomes as easily recognisable by the motivi, as he does by his costume. To secure this is the highest achievement of the dramatic composer. Another difficulty has been surmounted by Verdi—a difficulty the conquering of which has been the study of the great German writers, and which, with the exception of Glück, they have failed to surmount—we mean the natural and unforced moving of the chorus. In the drama, a line is sufficient for the removal of a host of attendants; a word may command their presence—and effect their exit. In lyrical works their presence and their voices are as vitally important as those of their Greek precursors. In many of the morceaux d'ensembles they form the very superstructure of the score—their responses and their action are the keystone of the composer's design. To use these great aids effectively—that is without too great prominency—is the true pons asinorum of the lyrical writer. Madame Rita Borio has, by her dramatic excellence, and fine vocal powers, fully established herself as a received prima donna, by the most cold and hypercritical audience in Europe. Her's cannot be called efforts; for her pure soprano, enriched by lower notes of excelling beauty, flows unmarred by the slightest apparent labour; the auditor is never pained by signs of physical exertion: sparing of embellishment, the thoughts of the composer are never marred by ambitious and slovenly executed fiorituri. In her first solo—a cavatina, with a slight approach to the polaca—the running passages were conquered with singular precision, and the cantibile given firmly and equally throughout. She never for a moment relaxes her energy and musical prominence in the concerted pieces. Madame Rita Borio is not only an admirable artiste, but is—what we regret is a rare quality—a conscientious one. Signor Botelli, the new barytone, has the merits of an extended register, a fine person, and dramatic action. The music of "Carlos Quint" is more adapted for the scale of a low tenor—and hence the voice straining to reach the F sharp and G, which are of frequent recurrence, begets a huskiness which in some degree mars the general effect of his singing; but he is, without dispute, the best second barytone we have heard on any stage, and will, in the course of the season, prove that he is in possession of qualities of singular usefulness and excellence. Moriani has returned with renovated voice and added vigour,— his exquisite tones go at once to the heart, and evoke all the hidden sympathies of our nature. His impassioned utterance—now trembling with fearful energy, and again melting into tones fraught with tearful emotion—charmingly illustrates

The battle wild of Boreas old,
With Zephyr soft of younger spring.

He is a true artiste, and has quaffed inspiration at the tragic fount. Stern and fervid, he never departs from the truth of his impersonations to awaken false applause or misplaced approbation. Fornasari, as the old Castillian noble, resembled a portrait of Velasquez frowning from the discoloured panels of the Escurial. His naturally fine organ has acquired steadiness, and his rendering of the character was chivalrous and poetical. At the fall of the curtain the principal performers were called forth, amid the enthusiastic cheering of the audience.

The new ballet, "Eoline, ou La Fille de la Dryade," proves that Perrot's imagination is akin to the German tale-teller, for not only has he embodied the vague thoughts of the legend, but he has imparted new beauties, and poetical colouring to the original. What a fine fancy is the "Mazourka d'Exstace," in which the wild passions of the Gnome overcome the mixed aversion of the semi-mortal nature of the forest-born maiden. In this exquisite creation the truth is not overstepped, and the poet's thought is undebased by the artificiality of the canvass or the glare of the gas-light. The fragile form of the Dryad, whirling unresistingly in the grasp of the half-fiend, until her frame is weakened, and her strength exhausted by the effort, is worthy the inventor and the fair illustrator. It would be vain to seek for so admirable a representative of the quaint creation of the legend as Lucile Grahn—her fair northern complexion and undulating form—her delicately chiselled feet, and hands are worthy the sculptural genius of her late countryman, the great Thorwaldsen. Her style partakes of the best qualities of Taglioni and Elssler—for she possesses the graceful buoyancy of the former with the sparkling terre a terre execution of the latter. Perrot is, par excellence, your only fiend—not the vulgar "auld Clootie," but the spiritual fallen one—rejoicing in all the wild poesy of Ariosto, and the vivid grotesqueness of Calot. When we add that Marshall's scenic effects are worthy the subject, we can offer no higher praise. The several scenes deserve an "art article" to do them scant justice.

SCENE FROM THE NEW BALLET OF "EOLINE," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

MADAME RITA BASSO-BORIO.

This lady, whose successful début at Her Majesty's Theatre on Saturday last we have had the pleasure of recording, was born at Mondovi, in Piedmont, in 1819. She lived happily in private life with her family, not manifesting any particular disposition for music, until, by accident, having heard a grand opera she was so strongly affected by the sweetness of the melody, and brilliancy of the harmony, that the passion hitherto concealed within her breast broke forth, and she devoted her whole time to the cultivation of her voice. Her family and friends, delighted with these dispositions, seconded them by every means in their power, and in order that suitable instruction should not be wanted, she was sent to Milan, and placed under the care of Mr. Ray, then a famous professor of singing, and now a master of counterpoint at the Conservatory of that city. An accident of an alarming nature, however, had nearly cut short her career, and it is only wonderful how she recovered sufficiently from its conseqaences to be able to continue the profession in which she had engaged. A boy, playing with a gun which he did not know was charged, directed it in sport towards her, and drew the trigger. The gun was loaded with two balls, both of which struck the poor little Rita. The persons present thought she was killed, but medical assistance was procured, and her life was saved, though a long and painful illness followed. The regular course of study was interrupted by this calamity, and it was a long time before the fair subject of this memoir was enabled to follow the lessons of her master. Youth and a good constitution at last prevailed, and Madame Rita worked with double energy when her health was restored to regain lost time.

SIGNORA RITA BORIO.

After her studies were completed, she was selected as prima donna to open the new Italian Theatre, built under the auspices of King Otho, at Athens. Her success was great, and her private life was, at the same time, so respectable, that she was received at the Palace, and in the mansion of the resident nobility, both native and Bavarian, on the most friendly terms. Indeed, her influence was so remarkable in the best circles, that, at a concert given for the benefit of the distressed inhabitants of the Island of Crete, she collected a sum equal to 20,000 francs.

It was at Athens that she married Mr. Joseph Borio, a civil engineer, then resident in that city.

Soon after her marriage, Madame Rita Borio determined on returning to Italy, notwithstanding the tempting offer made by the director of the Athenian theatre, and the entreaties of the Court and the principal inhabitants. She first sung at the Opera of Corri, in Piedmont, and then, for the space of two years, made a circuit of all the great theatres of Italy, gaining fame on every boards, and adding to her vocal knowledge by an earnest study of the methode of all the great artists with whom she was associated during that period. From Italy she was tempted to go to Madrid, where she had to contend against the souvenir left by Julia Grisi, Madame Lalande, and other primas donnas of excellence; but she was received with enthusiasm, and continued for a long time to be the special favourite of the Madrilenos.

Her last engagement was at Turin, where she went through the whole range of premier rôles, which we hope to see her repeat in this country. In all she was successful, and many offers were made to her from the great operas of Europe, but London is the great point of attraction for all prima donnas, and our artist naturally gave the preference to those o Mr. Lumley.

Madame Rita Borio is inclined to embonpoint; but her face has a most pleasing expression, and her smile instantly wins an audience in her favour. Her voice is rich, and of most extensive compass, as it equally partakes of the reach of a high soprano and the depth of a sound contralto. It perhaps wants flexibility; but at a period where ornament is carried to excess, a pure and natural style of singing is more acceptable on account of its great rarity. Madame Rita Borio is an excellent musician, and we must already consider her as an established favourite at Her Majesty's Theatre.

HER MAJESTY AT CHRIST'S HOSPITAL, ON SUNDAY LAST.

PIGGIN BEARER.

BASKET BEARER.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

On Sunday evening last her Majesty and Prince Albert visited Christ's Hospital. A Royal visit to that institution is by no means a common occurrence, no Sovereign having been to it during several reigns. Her Majesty, however, has recently taken some interest in Christ's Hospital. Besides being herself a governor, she caused the Prince of Wales to be made one; and Prince Albert is one also.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness arrived at half-past six o'clock, alighting at a temporary entrance erected on the south side of the hall leading to the principal staircase, wnere they were received by Mr. Alder man Thompson, M.P., the President, and Mr. R. Hotham Pigeon, the Treasurer. The Royal suite consisted of the Duchess of Buccleuch, Mistress of the Robes; the Countess of Dunmore, Lady in Waiting; the Earl of Morton, Lord in Waiting; Mr. R. Ormsby Gore, Groom in Waiting; Colonel the Hon. Charles Grey, Equerry in Waiting; and Major-General Sir Edward Bowater, Equerry to the Prince.

THE READER.

The occasion of her Majesty's visit was her wish to witness an interesting scene, which is, no doubt, familiar to many of our readers—the public supper of the youths educated at the school, or, as they are more commonly styled, the "Bluecoat Boys." These suppers take place annually, on eight successive Sundays, prior to Easter Sunday. They are held in the great hall of the hospital, the public being usually admitted by tickets, signed by the treasurer, and issued privately; and great numbers of persons are accustomed to assemble on these occasions to see what is really a very interesting and even imposing scene, from the numbers of the boys, their orderly conduct, and, above all, from the religious solemnity which accompanies the ceremonial—the public expression of their gratitude to Heaven and to their earthly benefactors, by these hundreds of youths, many of them orphans, all more or less dependent on the bounty of the institution for that education which may in after life fit them for distinction among their fellow men. These acts of prayer and thanksgiving, so characteristic of the simple, humble, and undiscriminating piety of the age in which the foundation of Christ's Hospital dates, may be regarded by the spectators, and participated in by many of the boys, as mere forms; but that they must have some effect on the young minds of the latter may be inferred from the uniform and remarkable decorum of their behaviour, the air of quiet, unpretending self-respect which is discernible in the elder boys, and that degree of respectability and almost of dignity in their bearing which not even their ungraceful and unbecoming dress can neutralise.

BOWL BEARER.

The admissions were confined to the governors and their friends; but as the number of governors exceeds 300, even this limitation did not prevent a very large assemblage of visitors. The arrangements were as usual. The sides of the hall were completely lined with gentlemen, and at one end there was a large deep gallery, with another smaller one overhead, both filled with elegantly-dressed ladies. The boys occupied their customary seats at the tables, which run lengthwise down about three-fourths of the hall. Those who formed and accompanied the choir sat in another gallery, in which the organ is placed. Among the general company present were the Marquis of Exeter, Lord Arundel, Lord Sandys, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Mr. Baldwin, M.P., Mrs. Anson, Miss Burdett Coutts, the Lord Mayor, the Court of Aldermen, and the Sheriffs.

As the Royal party entered the hall the organ commenced playing the national anthem. Her Majesty and Prince Albert (who wore the star of the Most Noble Order of the Garter) passed up the middle of the hall, followed immediately by the President and the Treasurer, and also by the Royal suite.

The appearance of the hall was very interesting; the building, which is about 200 feet long, 52 feet wide, and 47 feet high, contained near 900 scholars, ranged at long rows of tables; and great numbers of governors of the institution occupied seats on either side of the hall.

At the east end was the organ gallery with the scholars composing the choir, and at the west end were a number of raised seats, filled with the ladies of the governors and of the members of the corporation.

Her Majesty sat in the chair of state usually filled by the President, who sat on this occasion on her Majesty's left. The Treasurer was on the right of Prince Albert; the Duchess of Buccleuch and the Countess of Dunmore were on the right of the Treasurer, and the noblemen and gentlemen in waiting occupied seats on the left of the President.

The chair of state was placed in front of the raised seats at the west end of the hall, and behind the Queen sat Mrs. Thompson, the wife of the President, and Mrs. Pigeon, the wife of the Treasurer.

The Steward of the Hospital was stationed underneath the magnificent window of stained glass in the middle of the hall, which contains the arms of its four Royal governors, viz., the Queen, Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, and Prince George; and those of Edward VI., the founder of the hospital, and of Charles II., founder of the Mathematical School; also the arms of the President and the Treasurer.

As soon as the Royal party were seated the usual ceremonial was gone through. It commenced with the singing of the first two verses of the 100th Psalm by the boys. The lesson was then read. It consisted of a part of the 10th chapter of St. Luke, from the 28th verse to the end. The reader was Mr. Algernon Newton, the eighth on the list of Grecians. He was selected for the office because his voice and manner of reading particularly qualified him. He occupied, as is usual on these occasions, the pulpit, which is placed about half-way down the hall, facing the place where her Majesty sat. Mr. Newton also read the usual prayers for Sunday evening, originally compiled, as well as the other forms of prayer used in the institution, by Dr. Compton, formerly Bishop of London. The boys then sang a portion of the 139th Psalm. Her Majesty joined in all these religious exercises with marked attention.

KNIFE BASKET BEARER.

Mr. Newton next delivered the grace before supper, to which meal, frugal though it was, and taken at an earlier hour than usual, the boys applied themselves with a readiness that showed their appetites at least to be independent of the influence of royalty. Their fare is of the simplest, consisting of bread and butter—familiarly known in economical houses as "bread and scrape"—with an allowance of thin beer. The table arrangements are equally simple. No knives and forks are needed, and their beer they drink out of wooden vessels. While the supper was going forward her Majesty and the Prince, followed by their suite, and attended by the chief officers of the institution, walked round the room, between the tables, looking on,—apparently much amused at the celerity with which the supper was being removed. Not less rapidly were the tables cleared. Everything is of course done by rule in such a place, each boy having his allotted duty; and the royal party had scarcely reached their seats again, ere not only the supper, but every vestige of the table-furniture, table-cloths, beakers and all included, had vanished as if by magic. The Queen seemed at once surprised and amused at the quickness and precision with which all this was done—no noise or confusion, but all quiet, orderly, and effectual; the monitors meanwhile marching up and down between the tables, two and two, looking on and seeing that all went well.

Mr. Newton now read the grace after supper, after which the boys sang the following anthem:—

"The Lord is good, fresh acts of grace
His pity still supplies;
His anger moves with slowest pace,
His willing mercy flies.

"Therefore will we the righteous ways
Of Providence proclaim;
Will sing the praise of God most high,
And celebrate his name.

"CHORUS.

"By angels in heaven of every degree,
And saints upon earth, all praise be addrest
To God in three Persons, one God ever blest,
As it has been, now is, and always shall be."

The concluding portion of the evening's proceedings was the most singular, and apparently the most amusing to her Majesty. It is the custom, on the occasion of these suppers, for all the boys to walk in procession, two and two, past the chair of state, where they make their bow. As it was her Majesty's wish that the proceedings should be in the usual course, this part was of course not dispensed with, but it occupied no little time for upwards of 800 boys to pass and make their formal bows to the Queen. They were preceded by the 12 Grecians, Messrs. Evans, Scargill, Voigt, Greenfield, Laing, Polehampton, Potter, Newton, Williams, Hayman, Searle, and Russell. It appears that these Grecians on the occasion of ordinary public suppers never bow to the governors; in the present case the rule was relaxed, and they set the example. Twelve of the boys of the Royal mathematical school (founded by Charles the Second, and who are especially called "the King's boys,") followed after the Grecians, and bowed separately as they passed. Then came the whole of the rest, divided according to their respective wards or dormitories, a sub-matron, or "nurse," as they are called here, heading each division. One feature in this procession amused the Queen much. It has been mentioned with what magical rapidity the tables were cleared. The table-furniture is not, it seems, removed at the time, but certain boys belonging to each division are appointed to remove it; yet they form part of the procession. It was not a little amusing, therefore, to see a long and apparently interminable cavalcade of boys, a "very little" one heading the rest and holding a pair of candlesticks, the light from which seemed almost to annihilate him, and followed by others, one bearing a wooden platter, another a wooden mug, another the tablecloth, and, though last, not least, another with a huge breadbasket much larger than himself on his head, staggering under the weight of which he, like the rest of this singular string, had to make his bow to the Queen as he passed. Her Majesty and the Prince laughed heartily as the first division of these business-like peripatetics paseed them, with their quaint grotesque dresses and their awfully solemn manner, sinking as they seemed to be under the solemnity of the occasion. A long and seemingly endless train followed, the enormous breadbaskets rising one after another in the distance like banners, the "little men" at intervals holding up their candles, those who bore away the remnants and utensils of the feast bringing up the rear, each with something or other, like the break-up of a gipsy encampment. The Royal party appeared to be much interested in this scene. Both her Majesty and the Prince bowed separately to each pair of boys as they came up: it was noticed that they did not omit to return the salutation of their young admirers, even although engaged in conversation at the moment.

With the close of this procession of the boys the proceedings terminated. Her Majesty expressed to the President her great satisfaction, and the Royal party immediately afterwards departed. They were cheered by the people outside as they drove off. There were no less than 200 of the Governors present. Dr. Rice, the Head Master, and the Rev. Mr. Webster, the Head Mathematical Master, were present in the hall. Her Majesty wore a green velvet bonnet, trimmed with black lace; a black velvet Polish pelisse, trimmed with ermine; and a plaid silk dress.

The solo part of the anthem was sung by Master Sharp; the duet by Masters Pizey and Hunt. Mr. George Cooper presided at the organ. Copies of the anthem and of the psalms were handed to her Majesty and the Prince by Masters Barker, Hill, Handfield, and Scott.

When the Queen and Prince Albert quitted the hall the President and the Treasurer conducted her Majesty and his Royal Highness to their carriage.

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

So, on Thursday next the Easter Holidays are to commence, and Parliament is to take its first turn of enjoyment after a manner in which the people are not overlikely to participate. It affords a pretty easy condition of idleness and nonchalance does the pleasant business of legislation. We seldom encounter an M. P. with round shoulders or a broken back. There is seldom any stint of growth occasioned by the labours of the legislators—they do not grind themselves with work; and fainting fits from exhaustion at Bellamy's, or indeed anywhere about St. Stephen's, are of very unfrequent occurrence. But the most pleasing ease which they exhibit to constituent contemplation is ever discovered before Easter. "Before Easter" embraces the magic period in which, by a sort of tacit understanding, the Conservatives agree to do nothing, the Whigs to help them, and the Radicals to look on.

It is true there must be a little of the work of promise held up to the public hope, and it is not unlikely that a wise Premier will smooth away all his anxieties upon the subject of money before he goes into the Easter Holidays, to prepare for the remainder of his Sessional Campaign—but of wise, practical legislation, for redressing the grievances or improving the condition of the people, not an atom will be done. But, on the 14th of March Sir Robert Peel comes down and tells the members that on the 20th he will let them loose, after their nothing doing, for ten days' holiday—he is sorry, as they have done no work, that he can't give them more play—but they must be good boys, and make the best of the time which the indulgence of the Cabinet affords them at the expense of the country. This is the true spirit of the Minister's tone on Thursday, and this is the true way in which the nation interprets it.

But up to the present moment what have we got out of the present session? Let us see—

1. An income-tax debate to renew a triennial injustice.
2. A sugar debate to sweeten away the bitter of the income-tax.
3. A violation of-confidence debate without prospect of a redress of grievances.
4. A factory debate, without promise of alteration in the slavery of the system.
5. A poor law debate, with no other hope in it than that of an increased tyranny for the poor.
6. A corn-law debate, with the Premier adhering to his scale.
7. A personal debate with a castigated Minister and discontented partizans.

This is all that has been done—and this is nothing. We are not going to moot here any of the political questions involved in these debates, but only to remark that they have by their discussion produced no results—that the business of the nation, except the money business of the Minister, has been left by them in statu quo, and that Great Britain has made in the present session no progress in social or political improvement. Well, we must e'en endure, and hope the best for after Easter.

In France the Ministry are beaten; and although we would fain have had them hold the reins of power, if they could have done so upon constitutional principles, yet we fear the very manner of their defeat has an air of discredit about it, and that if Guizot loves—as we believe he does—character more than expediency, he will assuredly go out. We do not see now that he can—much as we wish he could—even resort to a dissolution. Foiled upon a money question, and we may almost say upon a second trial of it, for the evasion of the first division was almost equivalent to a defeat, only we think not quite so respectable; his Cabinet ought now to be considered in the throes of dissolution, and we have only to hope that the spirit which may pervade any new (and, we trust, not hastily formed) Administration may be a spirit conservative of friendship with England, the happiness of France, and the peace of Europe.

We have to congratulate public upon her Majesty's visit to Christ's Hospital. We are also glad that Prince Albert should have so far used his influence in the capacity of Governor, as to have interested the gracious kindness of the Queen, in an institution so every way worthy of Regal and munificent support. The educational foundations of the empire—the schools of its wisdom—the fountains of its learning—must ever be worthy of the countenance of a Royal regard; and it should be a source of delight and enthusiasm among the people, when their rulers, princes, and potentates evince a genuine desire—by pleasing and practical patronage—to deepen the well of literature and fertilize the fields of art—to create emulation and stimulate ambition where the elements of genius and virtue are young and fresh, and pliant—and where a love planted industry may be best made to shoot forth the fruits of knowledge, and to spread over the general community the branches of our social welfare and our public renown.

Ireland is also looking for a visit from her Majesty, but quite in a different spirit to that evinced by the youthful denizens of our nobly-founded hospital; for though the topic of education has been torn to tatters in the Sister Isle, we do not believe that either the priests on one side or the Orangemen on the other are preparing to evince any particular loyalty at the grant to Maynooth! Concessions in Ireland—and the truth is a melancholy one—have been seldom very graciously made or very gratefully accepted; and new-born benefits occasionally seem to set upon this remarkable people almost as uneasily as their burdens. Still, if they could get the Queen over, even Mr. Mac Nevin is prepared to admit that she would be greeted with an honouring loyalty, and that Dublin would be half frantic with the temporary and profitable excitement of that novel episode in its history—the immediate residence of a splendid court and a numerous nobility.

The criminal trials which are progressing on all the Circuits, still point to a sad system of social demoralization; and a very lucid and remarkable charge delivered to his Grand Jury by Mr. Justice Coleridge (one of the most able and discriminating Judges on the bench), presents matter for serious reflection upon the all-important subject of summary jurisdiction. We have always inclined to the opinion that this power in the hands of magistrates should be at least extended. The evil, as a matter of expense of sending a number of petty cases for trial has always been palpable; but when we learn that out of thousands of prosecutions, the acquittals are in the ratio of one-third, we perceive at once the ruinous mischief of such a burthen upon the people. But the Judge adds, in a large number of the committals, the offences have seemed expiated by the imprisonment before trial, and an unwillingness to sentence the culprits beyond the just measure of a proper punishment often weakens the force of example, and obliges justice, on account of the past, to disproportion its present severity to the amount of wickedness committed. This must be on all hands injurious; and a system, however generally good, which has superinduced much mishief, deserves to be speedily inquired into, with a view to retain the good and to reform the evil. We therefore rejoice that Mr. Justice Coleridge has brought it so emphatically before the notice of the public.

We have been greatly distressed by reading an awful account of the fire which has laid waste so large a portion of the capital of one of our most flourishing West India colonies. We speak of Bridgetown, in the island of Barbadoes—a loyal and devoted place, long proud, through its inhabitants, of being designated "Little England." The damages of this sweeping conflagration are estimated at not less than a million of money; and the sudden destitution of persons comparatively wealthy is described as appalling. For the sake of the progress of the press in this distant colony we lament deeply that two flourishing newspapers, type, offices, paper, the whole ménage in fact, have been annihilated by the flames.

It is a consolation to learn that no human lives have been sacrificed, and that slavery had been expunged from the soil before the occurrence of this dire calamity. A fire in a slave colony is terrific. Many years ago we were present at a great fire in this very Bridgetown, when incendiarism was the prevailing suspicion of every mind, and the fear that the slaves were in organised rebellion half paralysed the exertions of the inhabitauts to quell the flames. Every shop shut—every public office closed and guarded by military—the alarmed militia galloping from street to street—the desperate and reckless removal of property—the want of fresh water,—and the superstition of the Negroes that salt water would not quench the flames that were raging in one of the steady breezes of the tropics—all these combined circumstances of alarm, doubt, folly, and desperation, made the ensemble of a picture the most exciting and horrible we ever beheld. One of the principal of these elements—the dread of slave insurrection—was absent from this late catastrophe, and accounts for the system of self possession and concentration of human aid so immediately brought to bear upon the rescue of property and the preservation of peace. Still the sacrifice has been lamentably enormous, and we hope our English benevolence will not shut its heart against the losses of the suffering Barbadians.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

The first appearance of "Robert le Diable" in this country was towards the close of Monck Mason's unfortunate management of her Majesty's Theatre, where, under the superintendence of the composer himself, it was produced with extraordinary splendour. The untimely termination of the season did not afford it a chance of enduring popularity, and the subsequent adaptations of it to the English stage only served to give an unfavourable opinion of its merits.

Its reproduction by Mr. Bunn at Drury Lane has placed it in a more favourable light to the general public. Still there is a ponderosity about it, which accompanies all Meyerbeer's works, and will render them anything but immortal. There are gems in it, such as "Robert toi que J'aime;" but the general feature is that of struggle after effect without producing more than surprise.

Of its performance we cannot say much in a commendatory way; for we recollect poor Nourrit, Levasseur, Dorus Gras, and the sweet Heberlé, and it would be vain to compare the present with the past. Altogether, we should pronounce it to be a "fiasco."

HAYMARKET.

Mr. Peake's new comedy of "The Sheriff of the County," followed by "Speed the Plough," or other established pieces, continues to attract large audiences to this very popular theatre. In dramatic as in domestic matters, good management is the prime element of success; and we have rarely seen the rule so well exemplified as in the full tide of prosperity at the Haymarket.

To our mind, Mr. Peake's bustling three acts are, however, forced into somewhat disadvantageous comparison with Mr. Morton's sterling comedy, by the performance of these pieces on the same night, when the farce, oddly enough, precedes the play. The latter is a very judicious revival; for "Speed the Plough" is as sound a specimen of homely English comedy as is to be found in our dramatic repertory. It is, on the present occasion, admirably cast; and had the author written it to measure for the actors, he could not have fitted them better. First, we have Farren in the polytechnic Sir Abel Handy; and Mrs. Clifford as his virago of a Lady: the former with his inventive absurdities, and his dress embroidered with snuffers, was very ludicrous. Holl, as Bob Handy, was careful in a part which is usually a lure to extravagance. Sir Philip Blandford was rendered conventionally cold by Mr. Stuart. Prominent, however, in interest, were Farmer Ashfield and his wife, excellently played by Webster and Mrs. Glover: the opening of Susan's trunk, the dame's timid curiosity, and the farmer's conscientious bluntness, were admirably contrasted; and the joy of the rustic couple at their child's good fortune was a perfect representation: Webster's homely pathos presents a remarkable instance of natural acting matured by careful study; as will be acknowledged by those of our readers who remember his loud manner and hard style in the Drury Lane Company, several years since. The dance, at the close of the second act, was as warmly received by the audience as would have been the last new polka: it was, indeed, a genuine picture of well-sustained rusticity.

THE FRENCH PLAYS.

Since our last notice, the great Frederic Lemaitre has appeared in his chief character, that of Rémond, or, as he is more popularly known, Robert Macaire, in the drama of "L'Auberge des Adrets." The French phrase, that such and such an actor has "created" a part, was never better applied to any one than to M. Lemaitre in this rôle, which was first represented in Paris at the Ambigu-Comique, in July, 1823, and which he has made completely his own.

The circumstances connected with the production of this drama are somewhat entertaining. Several stories are told of it, but we believe this to be the true one. The original piece was a melodrama, abounding in the most horrible features of the French school of pieces of that class, and the part was entrusted to M. Lemaitre. On the first night of its representation he perceived that its condemnation was rapidly approaching, when, with consummate tact, he threw overboard all the notions of the authors, took the interpretation of the character into his own hands, made him a highly comic swaggering chevalier d'industrie, instead of a "heavy villain," and brought the piece to a most triumphant conclusion. He finished, when pursued by the gensd'armes, with leaping into a private box and appealing to the audience for protection, maintaining that the soldiery had no right to enter there. From this time the piece enjoyed the most extensive popularity, and "Robert Macaire" became the rage. He was selected by the clever comic artist, Daumier, as the type of any swindler projecting a scheme or conducting an exploitation. He was made the sign of shops on the Boulevards, reproduced from the "Charivari" and the "Musée Philippon;" and his black patch and red trousers became as well known at the carnival as the boots of the hussars or the white shirt of the debardeur.

His representation of this renowned individual, at the French plays this week, was perfect, and kept the audience in a roar of laughter whenever he was on the stage. He made every point tell, even the most trivial, whether it was the scroop of his snuff box, or his comical accompaniment to the village dance, played on the bottles, plates, and tumblers, with the handle of his knife. In the "Valze de Faust," which followed, his pantomime was exquisite; indeed, it was scarcely a burlesque. Had M. Lemaitre put on the costume of a demon instead of his well known attire, his action would have been the complete pourtrayal of an evil spirit fascinating a young girl into his toils. Some praise is due to the young lady who was his partner, but with whose name we are unacquainted. As we have stated, the reception of the piece was throughout most enthusiastic.

On Wednesday, Mdlle. Clarisse took her benefit, when the drama of "Trente Ans" was repeated. We expressed our opinion of this piece last week. We have only to notice in addition, that its success might have been jeopardised by the ludicrous arrangement of the concluding effect, where the hut is burned. Is there supposed to be a stage-manager attached to this establishment?

PRINCESS'.

Mr. Forrest has appeared at this house in the part of King Lear, and with much greater effect than in any of his previous characters. Indeed, if first impressions are as important as they are generally allowed to be, it is a pity he did not choose King Lear for his début, since he certainly reaped very few laurels in his preceding performances. The entire impersonation was most effective and careful, and every physical attribute of the part admirably assumed, although we did not imagine he could make up so well for the tottering and infirm old king. In his bursts of passion there was far less of the ranting manner which we had observed in some of his previous performances; at the same time his anger was very forcibly pourtrayed. At the close of the second act his denunciation brought down loud and repeated bursts of genuine applause; and these were constantly renewed. He also betrayed an acute acquaintance with every phase of the character, especially in the mad scenes, which were excellently conceived. It was in every respect an admirable performance. Mrs. Stirling was graceful and unaffected in Cordelia—the part suiting her gentle style; and Mr. Graham was a commendable Edgar, lacking animation, however, in some of the scenes. We were glad to see the theatre so well filled. The Easter burlesque is to be founded on "Timour the Tartar," written, as we understand, by a new author.

LYCEUM.

This theatre closed its prosperous season on Friday evening, when the performances were for the benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Keeley. The general respect in which the talented couple are held would have been sufficient to ensure a full attendance of their friends; but a very capital bill of fare was put forward as well. "Martin Chuzzlewit" was revived, introducing Young Bailey and Mrs. Gamp once more to the Lyceum audience. The Messrs. Distin performed "Robert, toi que j'amie" and "Fra Poco," on the Sax-Horns, in which they were loudly and deservedly encored. Miss Farebrother danced the Polka with Miss James; and Mdlles. Adele and Louise, the Bolero: Mrs. Wigan's funny interlude of "A Model of a Wife" followed, and the programme concluded with "Valentine and Orson."

In the course of the evening, the following address, on the close of the season, written by Mr. Albert Smith, was spoken by Mrs. Keeley:—

Ladies and Gentlemen—The last night of the season having arrived, it devolves upon me, as directress of this theatre, to address a few words to its patrons. The task is to me most pleasing, not less from the bright retrospection of past success, than the cheering anticipation of soon meeting you again.

Until last year there was a cloud hung so unfortunately over this house, that at last the world looked upon the Lyceum as Betsy Prig did upon Mrs. Harris—"They didn't believe there was no such theatre."

By careful and fortunate management, however, the establishment, from a fiction, has, I am proud to say, become a "great fact," and in imitation of our larger neighbours, we have held League meetings here nightly, which have materially assisted our Treasury. But ours was a league only against dulness and blue devils; various were the forms in which we assailed them, nor were we scrupulous as to the allies we called to our assistance. First, we assaulted them with the "Forty Thieves," but finding, after a series of attacks, that even they relaxed in their vigour, we called upon the magic aid of "Aladdin's Lamp and Ring," and as fresh occasion called for new assistance, we summoned from the brains of our authors "Valentine and his savage Brother." With these we have occupied our dramatic field of battle, flanked with twenty new pieces of various calibre, but all of which went off with great effect. We have maintained our ground victoriously.

Gentlemen of the Pit—You will be happy to hear that the revenue exhibits a most cheering balance. I have, however, several new taxes to impose, but they are only upon your kindness and constant attendance. I continue to receive the most friendly assurances from the authors who have already written for the Lyceum. On them will the pen and ink'em tax fall most heavily; but they will not object to it, even if it extends beyond Three Years. They inform me that the late Budget, in removing the duty from Staves, will enable them to furnish me with Songs on the most advantageous terms.

Gentlemen of the Gallery—I have directed estimates to be made of various alterations connected with your part of the house. The gallery will be far more commodious, and better adapted both for seeing and hearing than the honourable benchers who fill it have hitherto found it.

Ladies and Gentlemen—Such improvements will be immediately commenced in every part of the house as will, I trust, tend materially to your future comfort. It will be thoroughly cleaned and redecorated, and the introduction of a new chandelier will render what has hitherto been a most enlightened audience, still more so. Within an hour after your quitting this house, scaffolds will be erected for the execution (don't be alarmed)—the execution of my orders to that effect. But I fear I am trespassing on your patience.

On the part of my frequent partner, Mr. Keeley, and myself, I beg to express most sincere thanks for your unceasing patronage. You have been the means of shedding happiness for twelve months over many, many families. Pray be assured that your favour, so liberally extended to us in public, has been sincerely felt and acknowledged in our own homes.

The fair directrice retired amidst a volley of applause and bouquets, which had not finished when Mr. Keeley appeared, in the character of Mrs. Gamp, stating that he, or rather she, did not know what that blessed woman had been a saying of, which was not beknown to her husband, but that Sairey Gamp, would be at home, at the Lyceum, on Easter Monday, if there was any orders. This appeal, as might be supposed, created great laughter, especially when Mrs. Gamp distributed a pack of her cards to the pit, with a true eye to business. The entire proceedings of the evening appeared to give great satisfaction to the audience.

We regret to announce the very serious indisposition of Mr. W. Harrison, the tenor singer. This gentleman was taken suddenly ill during the performance of "The Bohemian Girl," at Drury-lane, on Monday, when the performance was changed in consequence. On Thursday he was a trifle better, but not considered out of danger. He is said to be suffering from brain fever, brought on by over-work, and too prolonged attendance at rehearsals and evening performances. We hope next week to report more favourably of this attack.

There will be no less than six burlesques produced at the theatres on Easter Monday, viz., the Haymarket, Lyceum, Adelphi, Princess', Olympic, and Strand. This will be the sharpest melée of joke-producers that has been for some time,

MUSIC.

MR. WILSON'S SCOTTISH ENTERTAINMENTS, AT THE MUSIC-HALL, STORE-STREET, MONDAY, 10TH MARCH.

Although Mr. Wilson's former entertainments might have been continued for years without a chance of arriving usque ad nauseam; yet he has introduced a new one, which, however excellent, cannot make us forget the old, which we hope to hear repeated from time to time. One of the chief features in this new Entertainment is the "Covenanter's Lament," the exquisite words and music of which were admirably given by Mr. Wilson's charming and expressive voice. We have no doubt that his merited success will long (and long may it) continue!

MR. LOVER'S ENTERTAINMENT.

This triple artist, as we have often had occasion to denominate him, continues to attract and delight audiences. There is a witty, harmless "laughing devil in his eye," which, nevertheless, possesses a talismanic influence over you, and sheds a magic charm upon his performance.

MR. BEULER'S CONCERT.

This gentleman's annual concert took place on Monday last at the Crown and Anchor, and was most numerously and respectably attended. In addition to his own funnyisms, many excellent vocal pieces were performed, several of which were encored.

Mr. Lavenu's Concert of next Tuesday will afford a novel treat to the lovers of native talent. The chief parts of his programme will consist of selections from an opera entitled "Gul Razee," the libretto by Mr. Wade; and report says that more beautiful music has never been heard. It has all the grace of the Italian with the learning of the German schools.

LITERATURE.

MAXIMS AND OPINIONS OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON; with a Biographical Memoir by G. H. FRANCIS, Esq. Henry Colburn.

The actions of the Duke of Wellington need no additional chronicle to impress their greatness, or their success, on the present generation. He yet lives (and may he be long spared) among us, and even those who can scarcely be called witnesses of his military career, are familiar with every incident of it, for it is a theme often spoken of, and never without pride. Nothing can be added to what is already known of this part of the great Captain's life. Military memoirs may be multiplied and re-written to any extent, but "what is done, is done," and we despair of our knowledge of these achievements being increased by them. It is not so with his political life, which may be said to have begun, in England, only when his military career terminated, though the present volume proves that his opinion frequently had considerable weight in the Cabinet at home, while his genius was directing the energy of its arms abroad. The "Maxims" of a great man, are valuable, as they convey the principles and motives on which he has acted; the "Opinions" of a great mind show us how it has been affected by circumstances, and what conclusions it has drawn from them. Considering what the life of the Duke of Wellington has been, over what a space it has extended, with what events it has been filled, whose "Maxims" or "Opinions" can be of higher value? The present volume is intended to illustrate his political life, which Mr. Francis truly says has been "comparatively neglected." For this reason, the extracts from the dispatches of the Duke are not so extensive as those given from his parliamentary speeches. As these speeches extend over a considerable period, and have not hitherto been collected, the task of bringing together the many characteristic passages here given required great research, industry, and an intimate acquaintance with the political events of the last twenty years. The task has been exceedingly well performed. There is no other work in the language that gives so complete and perfect a record of the Duke's whole career as a statesman; of his own actions we have his own explanations, with his own motives for them, stated tersely and strongly; his opinions we have also before us, laid down with the same force; and, whether the reader may agree with them or not, it is impossible not to admire the clear, if not always extended view, taken of circumstances and events, the perspicuity of the language, and, above all, the superiority to mere party motives, which is frequently exhibited. In this respect the portion of the volume furnished by the Parliamentary proceedings throughout the latter years of the Whig Ministry is especially worth a perusal. The memoir which Mr. Francis has prefixed to the work, is an elaborate effort to establish the claim of the Duke to the character of a great statesman, as well as that of a great warrior. It is earnestly and ingeniously written, and if the reader went no farther, he would be convinced that the fact was proved. But the speeches of the Duke himself go far to weaken the claim set up for him by the biographer. An able Minister, a first-rate administrator of the established forms of government, the Duke undoubtedly is; a great legislator, or far-seeing statesman, we cannot consider him to be. His opposition to Catholic Emancipation, even when Ireland was on the verge of rebellion—and then its hasty, ungracious concession; his eulogy of our old "rotten" system of representation, his resistance of every, even the most reasonable change in it; his denunciations of the Reform Bill, his declarations that when carried no Government would in this country be possible; all these things are here registered, and we read them with the full experience that time and events have proved his fears to have been unfounded, his denunciations unreasonable, and his forebodings altogether falsified. A more utter want of political foresight no statesman ever exhibited, and we could cite numerous passages from the work before us that would prove our assertion. But these comparisons, which the reader is enabled to draw between the predictions of the past and the realities of the present, give a lively interest to the work, which we can sincerely recommend to the reader as the best he can refer to for the political life of the Duke of Wellington; it is, in fact, indispensable to those who wish to have a full knowledge of the modern political history of England. It is printed in a good "library form," and the style and getting up of the volume are unexceptionable.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Since the days of Actæon, Diana and her nymphs have surely never been so discomfited as during this instant winter. Will there ever again be a will or a way for woodcraft? For months past the fashion of the chase has been in this wise. The sportsmen go forth; haply they rendezvous at the cover side (but even that is not to be relied upon), and the instant the hounds are thrown in, they go off, and securing themselves under the lee of some compassionate barn, or friendly hay-stack, they draw their cigar-cases, and having smoked there twenty minutes, best pace, return home—thankful that they live to hunt another day. In every necessary, not to say convenient, appliance, the current hunting season has been one of the worst on record. The weather speaks for itself, while scent has been almost universally execrable. The taste for steeple chasing is on the wane; the seasonable time for coursing is over—for no true knight of the leash will risk the death of a matron doe "and all her pretty ones at one fell swoop;" and for the spirits that delight in incidents by flood and field, this is truly the winter of their discontent. During the present week, to meet the exigencies of those gentlemen of enterprise in the metropolitan districts, one of those passages of modern chivalry, called prize-fights, was provided by the caterers of such entertainments. The cause of humanity—the allegiance man owes to his fellows—demand that this specimen of a practice defended by well-minded people, as well as promoted by the whole gamut of blackguardism, should be told by those who, while they "set down naught in malice," will "nothing extenuate."..... On Tuesday last, an "adjourned fight" between two professors of the manly art of self-defence, named respectively "Young Sambo" and Jordan, was celebrated on Horley Common, greatly to the credit of the Sussex magistrates. After the usual preliminaries, we are told, they were brought into the ring, in the presence of 2000 spectators, and because Jordan could not go to scale the stipulated weight, 9st. 7lbs., in his professional appointments, with "harness on his back," he was compelled to engage bare-footed, while his adversary was armed with a pair of shoes, such as are used by pugilists—studded over the soles with exceedingly sharp steel spikes, about an inch long. When fifty rounds had been fought, the betting was in favour of Sambo, who "availed himself of his spiked shoes by treading with them on the naked feet of Jordan, and mutilating them exceedingly." Thus the manly exhibition went on; in this wise the mirror of fair play and manhood was held up to two thousand spectators. They kept up the contest for three hours and forty-seven minutes, Sambo continuing to thrust the spikes of his shoes into the feet of his antagonist at every opportunity; frequent appeals were made to the umpires, who decided it fair and within the rules of boxing. Of course it is not necessary to say the hero of the spikes won the laurels as well as the money; the miracle is how human endurance could have held out for nearly four mortal hours under such a course of unheard of torture.

Now we have nothing to urge against either of the miserable beings engaged in this foul butchery: neither, most probably, was worse or better than the other. Had Jordan been favoured with the alternative which fell to his opponent's share, he would, it is to be supposed, have "availed" himself of it. His backers would, no doubt, have insisted on it, seeing that "it was fair!! and within the rules of boxing." We do not stay to cry "Shame, shame," to the abettors of this base, brutal, and bloody conflict, for we know that they are beyond the sense of ignominy; but we do ask how long will the Legislature of a Christian, a civilized community, connive at such unholy outrages—such truculent treason against manhood—as are perpetrated in the prizering, and come within the rules of boxing? That a pitched battle is a serious nuisance to the neighbourhood in which it occurs is a point conceded by its advocates: that those who make the ring a profession are not among the useful or ornamental ranks of society, they will probably also admit. What contingent advantage, then, attaches to the practice of prize-fighting, that for its sake social outrages should be constantly inflicted on peaceful districts, and a flood of the scum of ruffianism suffered to pollute them? Shall we be answered, "It tends to uphold the principle of fair play in popular contests, and to promote a spirit of manly courage?" We reply by pointing to the exhibition of Tuesday last, on Horley Common. The public prize-fights, which are now of almost daily occurrence in the vicinity of this metropolis, are got up by a clique—and we write it with true satisfaction, a very small clique—for their own objects. It matters not to the question who or what they were: it in no degree affects the nature of the fact how it is brought to pass. To say that the system of the ring is calculated to improve the character of any class in this country is a gross, disloyal libel upon Englishmen: to sanction its existence, even by inference, is treason against the spirit of the age, and the honour of the land we live in. The details of the scene at Horley relate to an event but a few days old: read them again—ponder on them as facts contemporary with the march of humanity of this enlightened era, and say has not the citizen of the metropolis of the world grave cause for disgust, that barbarities should be licensed at his door which he would shudder to read in the history of a horde of savages.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A good deal of "pottering" business was done on the two standing dishes, without leading to any important results. We may observe, however, with reference to the Cup, that the four leading favourites maintained their positions unchallenged, and were in steady demand. On the others nothing was done worth speaking of, but from what was said, we shall not be surprised if that renowned animal now called Zanoni, gives rise to an investigation similar to that which made his Running Rein career so conspicuous. The Derby transactions had no material influence on the odds; they helped to prove, however, that the Cobweb colt and Old England are anything but rising favourites—they have been tolerably well "peppered."

THURSDAY.—This was, beyond comparison, the dullest afternoon of the year, Obscurity for the Cup, and Clear-the-Way and Old England for the Derby, having been the only horses backed to any purpose. We need not, therefore, exclude matter of more immediate interest, by giving any more than a short quotation of the closing averages.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.—The arrangements for the first trip for the season have just been completed, and it has been fixed for Thursday next, on which day the greater portion of the yachts connected with the club will assemble at Greenwich, and proceed from thence to Erith, and on the two following days the cruise will be extended to the Nore. The first race of the season will be for the cup given by Lord Saye and Seale, and the contest will lay between Greenwich and Erith. Mr. Alderman John Johnson, the next in rotation after Alderman Thomas Wood for the civic chair, has been elected a member of the Club, and has presented a valuable cup, which will be sailed for during the season. Lord Alfred Paget has also given some prizes. Several new yachts are now in course of construction for some recent members, amongst them being Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Sir Henry Webster, and others.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.—This popular place of entertainment will be opened at Whitsuntide for the hundred and fifteenth season, under the direction of Mr. Robert Wardell, the former proprietor, who has become sole lessee. The most extensive preparations are making, in order to render this delightful retreat as attractive as it was in its palmy days.

SUDDEN DEATHS.—On Tuesday Mr. Gale held an inquest at St. George's Hospital, on the body of Robert Elkins, aged sixty-nine. The deceased, it appeared, on Saturday night last, was carrying a small basket of linen through the Green Park, when he suddenly stopped and leant over one of the hurdles. A police-constable ran to his assistance, and whilst he was removing him to the hospital he died. Verdict, "Natural death."—On Wednesday another instance of the uncertainty of life occurred to a man named James Darby, a blacksmith, residing in Ewer-street, Gravel-lane, Southwark. The deceased was at his business in his usual good health, when he suddenly fell to the ground and expired. He has left a wife and seven children unprovided for.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—The arrivals of English wheat up to Mark-lane, during the present week, have been on a full average scale. Although the stands, both on Monday and Wednesday, were fairly supplied with samples of that description of grain, the demand for most qualities was steady, at prices fully equal to those previously paid. In free foreign wheat comparatively little has been doing, yet the quotations have been supported in every instance. So little doing in corn under lock, that the rates may be considered almost nominal. The supply of barley has been about equal to the demand, and prices have ruled about stationary. Superfine malt has sold steadily, other kinds slowly, at unaltered prices. Oats, beans, peas, and flour, dull, at late currencies.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 48s; ditto, white, 46s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 30s to 36s; grinding barley, 27s to 30s; distilling, 26s to 30s; malting ditto, 31s to 35s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 58s to 63s; brown ditto, 56s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 59s to 60s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed 16s to 18s, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 23s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s to 22s; ditto, white, 21s to 23s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 38s to 40s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 35s to 36s; white, 33s to 35s; boilers, 36s to 38s, per quarter. Town made flour, 42s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 35s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, —s to —s; Dantzig, red, 38s to 43s; white, 50s to 54s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s to 24s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 16s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to—, per barrel

Seed Market.—Our market for all kinds of seeds has been heavy, and prices have been with difficulty supported.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic, crushing, 40s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa —s to —s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s, per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 18s, per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 8s to 14s; white ditto, 10s to 13s. Tares, 6s to 7s 6d, per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £24 to £26, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 5s. per 1000: Rapeseed cakes £6 15s to £7, per ton. Canary, 42s to 48s, per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Gazette.—Wheat, 46s 6d; barley, 32s 2d; oats, 21s 7d; rye, 30s 5d; beans, 35s 1d; peas, 35s 8d.

Mark-lane Express.—Wheat, 47s 8d; barley, 32s 8d; oats, 21s 7d; rye, 31s 9d; beans, 35s 6d; peas, 34s 4d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 6s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 7s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—The late arrivals of tea are in steady request at very full prices; but in old qualities comparatively little is doing, though they cannot be considered cheaper.

Sugar.—Next to nothing has been doing in sugar during the week, still merchants have obtained full prices, notwithstanding the late large arrivals. Several parcels are advertised for next week. Refined goods are decidedly lower.

Coffee.—Ceylon has met rather a sluggish inquiry, since our last, at 46s to 47s for good ordinary. In other kinds of coffee very little doing.

Cocoa.—West India is still in sluggish request, and some qualities may be purchased on easier terms. Foreign cocoa steady, at full prices.

Rice.—Bengal is in active request, and 2000 bags at auction sold at 11s to 12s per cwt. for middling and white, being the full value.

Fruit.—Currants are in better request, at somewhat more money. Patras are selling at 51s to 52s; Zante and Cephalonia, 49s to 50s per cwt.; raisins dull, at 48s for Valencias, and 40s to 46s for red Smyrna.

Cotton.—Several large purchases have been made in Surat and Madras, but at no more money.

Provisions.—Owing to the easterly winds, the imports of butter have been very trifling since our last report. Dutch butter has sold steadily, at an advance of quite 1s per cwt., the best Friesland producing 110s to 112s; fine Holland, 106s to 112s; and fine Kiel, 104s to 108s per cwt. Irish butter is in good request, at 1s to 2s per cwt. more money. Carlows, landed, are producing 90s to 100s; Clonmel, 90s to 93s; Cork, 90s to 96s; and Waterford, 88s to 92s per cwt. The value of bacon has again had a downward tendency. Prime Waterford sizeable, landed, has sold at 40s to 43s; Limerick sizeable, 39s to 41s; Waterford heavy, 38s to 40s; and Limerick heavy, 39s to 40s per cwt. Lard moves off slowly, at 56s to 58s for Waterford, bladdered; Belfast, 52s to 56s; and kegs, 48s to 52s per cwt. The best hams are in request; but most other kinds of provisions are a heavy inquiry.

Oils.—Linseed oil is a slow sale, and somewhat lower. All other kinds of oil rather inactive though not cheaper.

Tallow.—P.Y.C. still remains in the same dull state as for some weeks past, the price on the spot being 38s 9d to 39s 3d per cwt. Odessa is offering at 38s 6d to 38s 9d; town tallow, 39s to 40s, net cash.

Coals.—Chester Main, 16s; Tanfield Moor, 19s 6d; West Wylam, 16s; Killingworth. 17s Lambton, 20s 3d; Caradoc, 19s 9d; Adelaide, 19s, per ton.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 8s to £4 4s; useful ditto, £4 6s to £4 18s; fine upland ditto, £5 0s to £5 3s; clover hay, £4 8s to £5 16s; oat straw, £1 16s to £1 18s; wheat straw, £1 18s to £2, per load.

Hops.—This market still continues in a very sluggish state, and we have no alteration to notice in the quotations.

Wool.—Selected qualities of English wool are commanding a steady inquiry, at full prices; but, in other kinds, we have very few sales to report.

Potatoes.—The cold weather and the falling off in the arrivals have produced a better demand for most kinds of potatoes, which are selling freely, at 50s to 80s per ton.

Smithfield.—The supplies of each kind of fat stock having been on the decrease, the general inquiry has ruled somewhat active, at, in some instances, improved currencies:—Beef, from 2s 6d to 4s; mutton, 2s 8d to 4s 4d; veal, 4s to 5s; and pork, 2s 8d to 4s 4d, per 8lbs, to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—These markets have been tolerably, but not to say heavily, supplied with each kind of meat since our last. Prime qualities have commanded a steady demand, at full prices Otherwise, the trade has ruled dull:—Beef, from 2s 6d to 3s 6d; mutton, 2s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 10d; and pork, 2s 8d to 4s 4d per 8 lbs, by the carcass.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The only operations in the English Market during the week have been on the part of the public, speculation having for the present apparently transferred itself to the Railways, as a more fertile source. Consols opened on Monday at 99⅞ to par, for money, and 108½ to ¾ for time, and maintained these prices until the news of the defeat of the French Ministry was received on the Market. Prices have since been a trifle flatter. Exchequer Bills have fluctuated between 64 to 66, and 61 to 58 (the closing price), having in the interim advanced to 65 to 67. Bank Stock gradually advanced to 220 for the account. At the meeting on Thursday the announcement by the Governor that an addition of £9727 would be made to the Rest, after the payment of the usual dividend, was received with much applause; but the price receded, and now quotes only 217. Consols are par for money, and 100 to ⅛ for the account.

There has been scarcely any speculation in the Foreign market during the week; prices, however, have been maintained with tolerable firmness. Spanish Actives on Monday, closed at 29⅜ to ⅞; and the Three per Cents, 40⅞ to 41. These quotations were improved on, during Tuesday, but have since yielded to sales, and the last quotation is for the Actives, 29⅞; for the Three per Cents, 40⅜. Portuguese maintained its high quotation of 69 to 70, until Wednesday, but has since receded to 68 to 69. Mexican has not improved materially upon the last advices from Mexico, although the capture of Santa Anna will doubtless cause a cessation of hostilities and lead to the chance of a dividend, by promoting peace. The closing quotation is 36¾; Dutch Three per Cents are 63½. Four per Cent Certificates 99¼. Belgian is 102½, and Peruvian 32⅜.

The Share Market was rather flat on Monday and Tuesday, but became the scene of extraordinary excitement on Wednesday, from the rejection of the London and York line by the Board of Trade being published in the Gazette of the preceding evening. The amount of speculation in this line can scarcely be estimated, and the news was followed by a rapid decline in the price of the shares. Birmingham Stock rose, but not to the extent anticipated. Midland Stock, on the contrary, advanced ten pounds per share. Eastern Counties also improved. Direct Northern, on the day previous advanced to a premium, and, on the decision becoming known, quoted 4¾, while London and York declined to 3½ to ¾. The French lines are worse, affairs in Paris not being satisfactory. A new company is formed to compete for the Great Northern of France Railway, and the shares in the old company have consequently declined. Caledonians have been in request, both in London and Liverpool, and the Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton, and Dudley line, although withdrawn from Parliament for this session, has quoted 4 to ¾. The Bears have oversold themselves in these shares, and being obliged to purchase for delivery, a rise has been the result. The closing quotations are—Bristol and Exeter (New), 6½; Caledonian, 8¼ Cambridge and Lincoln, 6¾; Churnet Valley, 7; Direct Northern, 4¼; Eastern Counties, 20⅜; Great Western, 175; Harwich, 1⅜; London and Birmingham Stock, 234; Croydon, 18½; South Western, 11¾; London and York, 3⅜; Midland, 104; Northern and Eastern, 50; Glasgow and Dumfries, 16s. 6d.; Sheffield and Manchester, 104½; Norwich and Brandon, 18; Rugby, Worcester, and Tring, 4; Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 6½; Dover, 43; Trent Valley, 22½; York and North Midland, 99½; Boulogne and Amiens, 11⅛; Bordeaux and Toulouse, 2⅜; Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Cette, 2⅝; Great Northern of France, 6; Orleans and Vierzon, 17½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 9⅜; Paris and Lyons (Lafitte's), 4; Paris and Lyons (Ganneron's), 2⅜; Paris and Orleans, 51¼; Paris and Rouen, 44½; Rouen and Havre, 32; Tours and Nantes, 2⅜; Strasbourg, 13.

"DARING." "FLYING-FISH." "ESPIEGLE."

THE EXPEREMENTAL BRIGS.

THE EXPERIMENTAL BRIGS "FLYING-FISH," "DARING," AND "ESPIEGLE."

These fine brigs, which have excited so much interest in the naval world, proceeded to sea on the 4th inst., on another trial to test their qualities. Their orders were, we understand, "to go out and look for a gale of wind, and remain at sea till they found one." They got under weigh from Plymouth about two o'clock P. M., with the wind at east; Flying-fish leading, her commander being the senior officer, closely followed by Espiégle and Daring. When outside the port, the little squadron set studding-sails, and kept a beautiful line to the Eddystone Light-house; thence, they proceeded down Channel to the Bay of Biscay, where the trials are to begin.

We look forward with the greatest interest to the return of these vessels, when we anticipate a similar report to that on the former trials, viz., that Daring will maintain the superiority and advantage she has had hitherto over all the brigs, and under all circumstances, with the exception of dead before the wind, which is a point of minor importance. She carries her guns higher, stows her provisions, is stiffer under canvass, and more weatherly than any of the others—very essential requisites in a man-of-war; and, moreover, sails faster. The detractors from the well-earned fame of the builder of this fine brig have vainly endeavoured to decry her qualities. One says her draft of water is too great for a brig; but we would remind our nautical readers that she only draws 9 inches more water aft than Espiégle, and much less forward; and therefore, in case of emergency, could be taken into shoaler water, by bringing her by the head: her draught of water is—forward, 12 feet 2 inches; and aft, 16 feet 8 inches. This objection is a failure. Another is, that she is strained all to pieces, and, consequently, leaks. If this were the case, why should she have leaked before proceeding to sea—which she did—and n the same ratio as she now does? 11 inches of water per diem, or nearly three-quarters of a ton. She was docked twice, had her copper off, rudder unhung, caulked, &c., but still the cause of the leak remains undiscovered; it is generally attributed to defective timber. The argument to prove that she is not strained is, that she makes the same water in harbour that she did during the trials that took place.

We have seen the papers teeming with reports favourable to each of the other brigs, but little comparatively has been said for the Daring. Sir G. Cockburn simply remarked in "the House," that the Daring appears to have the advantage, and stated that she was "built by an excellent practical man, but not a scientific shipwright." We cannot understand what is required of a ship. Daring has every requisite for a man-of-war. Does she not carry her guns higher, stow provisions better, sail faster, and is she not more weatherly than the others?—and all these advantages without the slightest alteration being made in her trim or draft of water. Can this be said of the others, or, more especially, of the one built by the School of Naval Architecture (Espiégle), and on every scientific principle that could be adduced? Has she not had her foremast stepped further aft, the masts raked more, trim altered, and an additional foot of false keel added? The Flying Fish, also, has had several alterations, her masts stayed, &c. The only difference in Daring is that she has had ten tons of the sixty she carries replaced by water. How, then, can it be said that Mr. White is not a scientific shipwright? The proof is the best test of whose science is the greatest. Mr. White has shown that practice is his forte, and, at the same time, that he is not in the least deficient in the theory and science requisite for ship-building.

Our Illustrations are from spirited sketches by Mr. Condy, the marine painter. The first shows the three brigs off the Eddystone. The second scene shows the Daring scudding in a gale, and carrying away her lee fore-topsail sheet.

EXPERIMENTAL BRIGS SCUDDING IN A GALE.

Death of General Sir T. Saumarez.—This officer died at his residence, at the Petit Marche, in the island of Guernsey, on the 4th instant, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. Sir Thomas served in the first American war.

Flag-ship for the Brazils.—We believe that the Vernon, 50, frigate, at Sheerness, will be the flag ship for Rear-Admiral Inglefield, C.B., appointed commander in chief of the Brazils station. She will be fitted with all possible despatch, and will take the flag from the Eagle, 50, on the station; in which latter frigate the gallant admiral proceeds to the river Plate immediately.

Lieut. S. Otway Woolridge, promoted in 1837, when serving in the Buzzard, or capturing, with a boat and five men, a slaver of two guns and 33 men, and who paid off the Spy, 3, brigantine, from the coast of Africa, about six months since, has been appointed to re-commission that vessel.

Letters from Rome state that the Russian Councillor Struor had left that city for St. Petersburgh the day following that on which a courier reached M. de Butenieff, the Russian minister at Rome, with despatches from the Russian capital. Expectations are entertained that the presence of M. Struor at St. Petersburgh, and the verbal explanations which he will be enabled to enter into with the Russian Government relating to the church differences between the two Courts, and which of late have become more and more complicated, will be the means of bringing those important matters to a more speedy settlement.

The Rouen journals state that the following curious notice was lately proclaimed by the town crier of Yvetot (Seine Inférieure): "A considerable number of Englishmen being about to be employed on the railroad, the Mayor enjoins the ladies, both old and young, not to walk in the streets after nine o'clock in the evening."

NEW GOLD MEDAL OF THE ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.

At the recent anniversary festival of this society, the Fothergillian Gold Medal, of the value of fifty guineas, was presented by Lord Morpeth to Mr. John Erichsen, Surgeon, of Welbeck-street, for his work "On the Pathology and Treatment of Asphyxia;" and to Mr. Kay Shuttleworth, of the Privy Council Chamber, for a treatise on the same subject, published some years ago. This is the first award of the above medal, which has just been executed for the society, by Mr. Wyon, of her Majesty's Mint. It is a very beautiful work of art. On the obverse are represented three figures on a raft, one of which, that of a dead child, is partly supported in the arms of the centre figure, which is looking up and watching intently the approach of a boat that appears in the distance; emblematic of the object of the society, that of affording succour to persons in danger. On the reverse is the device of the society, a figure blowing the flame of an expiring torch, with the motto, "Satias scintillula forsan." Our Engraving is of the size of the Medal.

SOLILOQUY OF A DISAPPOINTED MAN.

Spes mihi vana condit.

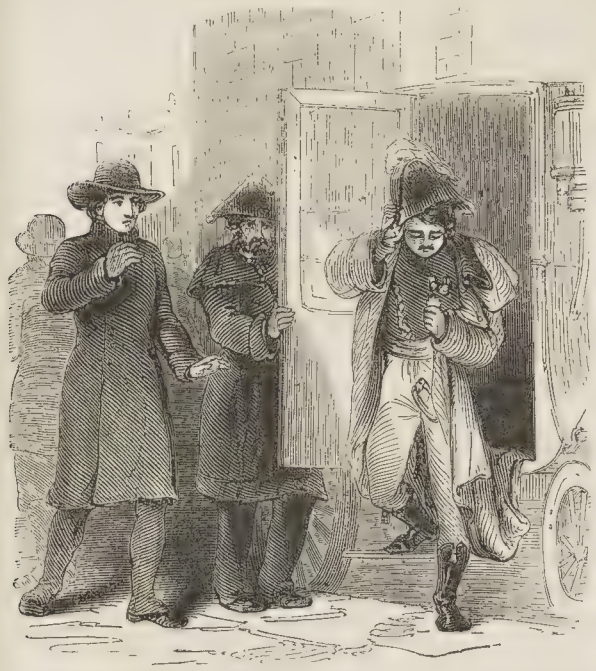
I feel a morbid sensibility
Grow 'round my heart:
And day by day,
As autumn leaves decay
And drop away,
Deciduous hopes depart,
Which in my springtime bloom'd most smilingly!

I bear the remnant of a happy mind,
Which once enjoy'd
Each pleasing sweet
It sought or chanc'd to meet;
Right glad to greet—
For then no pleasure cloy'd,
Nor ever ling'ring left regret behind!

Summers agone, to walk through pleasant vales
At morning time,—
Or, on the hills
Trace up those trickling rills
The dew distils
Above the lark's high chime,
Was joy o'er which my Memory now wails!

For now all lovely happy scenes I shun,
And in the gloom
Of some old wood
Where once a castle stood,—
In solitude
I pore upon its tomb,
And think how Time destroys what man hath done!

And thus I say, unto my early dreams:
"Air Castles all!
(Like this old pile)—
In beauty bright erewhile,
'Neath Hope's false smile
Ye led me to your hall
A trusting guest, then vanish'd like dark streams!"—W



HOPES.

BY FREDERICA BREMER. TRANSLATED BY LEWIS FILMORE.

When I opened my eyes, I was in the midst of a brilliant flood of light and as it dazzled me painfully, I shut them again, and listened to the confused hum of voices I heard around me. I opened them once more, slightly, and strove to distinguish the objects about me, which seemed to me so strange and unaccountable, that I began to fear my mind was wandering. I was lying on a sofa, and—no, I did not deceive myself—the beautiful girl, whom I had been observing so attentively that evening, stood over me, and with an angelic expression of sympathy was bathing my head with vinegar. A young man, whose features seemed to be known to me, was holding my hand between his own. I recognised also the fat gentleman, another more slender—the old lady, the children, and, glancing in the distant twilight, the paradise of the tea table. In short, I found myself, by some indescribable caprice of destiny, in the midst of the very family whom I had, an hour before, watched with such lively interest.

As I regained the clear possession of my faculties, the young man embraced me with true military frankness. "Do you not know me again, then?" said he, with an expression of disappointment, as he saw no signs of recognition in my countenance; "have you so completely forgotten Augustus D———, whose life you but a short time ago saved at the hazard of your own? whom you so boldly dragged out of the peril of remaining for ever in the uncomfortable society of the fishes? See! let me present you to my father, my mother, and my sister Wilhelmina!" I pressed his hand; and now his parents also warmly greeted me. With a hearty slap of the hand on the table, Augustus's father exclaimed, "As he has saved my son's life, and as he is an honourable good-hearted man—hungering himself to give others to eat—he shall have my vacant living of H———; yes, he shall be the new pastor, I say; I have the jus patronatus, you know!"

I was for a long while unable to comprehend, or think, or speak; and till, by means of a thousand explanations all was explained, I had arrived at a distinct knowledge of nothing, except this, that Wilhelmina was not—that she was Augustus's sister.

On the evening of the past summer, when I had the good fortune to rescue him from the peril into which his youthful imprudence and heedlessness had plunged him, he had returned from a journey on which he had been sent on duty. Since this accident, I had not seen him; before that, I had made a slight college acquaintance with him; we had called each other brothers—parted—and since then I had almost forgotten him.

He had now, with all the generous exaggeration of youthful enthusiasm, related this occurrence to his family, and told them, besides, all he did, and did not, know about me. The father, who had a living in his gift, and who, as I afterwards learned, had made from his window sundry commiserating observations on the meagreness of my dinner-table, resolved, in consequence of the entreaties of his son, to take me from the lap of poverty, and place me on the pinnacle of fortune. Augustus, in his delight, would apprise me of my happiness that instant; and, at the same time, in order to indulge his propensity to practical joking, chose a manner of making himself known as he came up the staircase; the consequence of which was to me, a severe, though not a dangerous contusion on the temple, and the unconscious transfer of my person across the street, from the midst of gloom and darkness into the brilliantly-lighted apartment in which my senses returned.

A thousand times did the young man implore my pardon for his thoughtlessness; a thousand times I assured him that so slight an injury was not worth speaking of. And in truth, the living was a balsam that might have healed the smart of a much deeper wound.

Astonished and somewhat confused, I now perceived that the ear and shoulder, whose owner had dealt so fearfully with the biscuit-basket, and and on whom I had poured out my wrath, belonged to no one less than Augustus's father and my patron. The fat gentleman on the sofa was Wilhelmina's uncle.

The goodness and heartiness of my new friends, soon made me feel quite at home, and happy with them. The old people treated me like a son of the house, the young man like a brother, and both the little ones seemed to see in me future prospects of unlimited gingerbread.

After I had received from the small, white hand, of Wilhelmina two cups of tea, in which I almost fear in my distraction, I dipped more biscuit even than my worthy patron, I rose to take leave. They pressed me to remain all night in the house, but I kept stedfast to my resolution of spending my first night of good fortune in my own poor dwelling, in prayers of thankfulness to the guide of my destiny.

They all embraced me again, and I embraced them all round in return, including Whilelmina, her gracious permission first obtained. "I might as well have forgone it, I thought afterwards, if it is to be for the first time—and the last." Augustus accompanied me back.

I found my landlord standing in my room, in the midst of overturned seats and tables, with a face of mingled sunshine and storm. On one side his mouth curled with a grim smile, almost up to his ear; on the other it drooped with mortification down to his double chin; his eyes followed the same direction, and the whole had something the appearance of a fit of the cramp, till the tone in which Augustus ordered him to leave us alone, changed it into the most friendly and simpering mein, as with abundance of low bows he vanished through the door.

At the sight of my chairs, table, bed, and so forth, Augustus was in despair. It was with difficulty I withheld him from following my host; and giving him a hearty cudgelling for demanding money for the use of such a den. I was obliged to pacify him by a solemn assurance that I would certainly leave it the next morning.

"But tell him," said Augustus, "before you pay him, that he is a scoundrel, an extortioner, a cheat, a—or if you like, I will."

"No, no," said I; "do be quiet and leave me to deal with him."

After my young friend had left me, I spent some happy hours in reflecting on the change in my prospects, and inwardly thanking heaven for the change.

My thoughts then dwelt upon my living, and God knows what fat oxen and cows, what fields with flowers, fruits and vegetables, I saw surrounding me in my new paradise, where my Eve, leaning on my arm, was walking by my side. I saw, too, countless crowds of my edified parishioners streaming out of the church where I had preached. In the joy of my heart it seemed to me that I was already christening, catechising, marrying—I forgot nothing—but the funeral service.

The poor curate, without prospect or hope, suddenly presented with a benefice, or indeed any one who sees a long-cherished desire crowned by unexpected fulfilment, may easily imagine the state of my feelings."

At a late hour of the night a sort of mist seemed to gather before my eyes, and my thoughts became mixed up with each other in a chaos of extraordinary things. I was preaching with a loud voice in my parish church, and the congregation were all asleep. After the service, the people came out in the shape of cows and oxen, who bellowed at me when I attempted to admonish them. I approached my wife, and could not separate her from an enormous turnip, that in a moment closed round us both, and grew at last over our heads. I attempted to ascend a ladder that seemed to be raised towards Heaven, whose stars were shining brightly and beautifully over me; but peas, and vetches, and grass, twisted themselves pitilessly round my feet, and clogged every upward step. Finally, I saw myself, in the middle of my new possessions, coolly walking on my head! and while I was sleepily wondering how this was at all possible, I fell into a deep slumber, while yet pondering over my half-waking visions. Yet even then I must, unconsciously to myself, have pursued this train of thought connected with my pastor's life, and passed the greater part of the night in preaching, for I awoke in the morning to the sound of my own voice giving utterance to a loud "amen."

That the events of the preceding night were an actual reality and not a vision, I could scarcely persuade myself, till Augustus called again, and at noon took me with him to his father's.

The living, Whilhelmina, the dinner of that day with my friends, all the bright linked chain of Hopes of the future that now beamed on me so clear from the sun of the present,—all things filled me once more with emotions of joy that may be felt, but can never be described.

From the inmost depths of a thankful heart I greeted the new life that had opened before me, with the firm resolution, whatever might hereafter befall me, to "Do what is right, and to HOPE for the best."

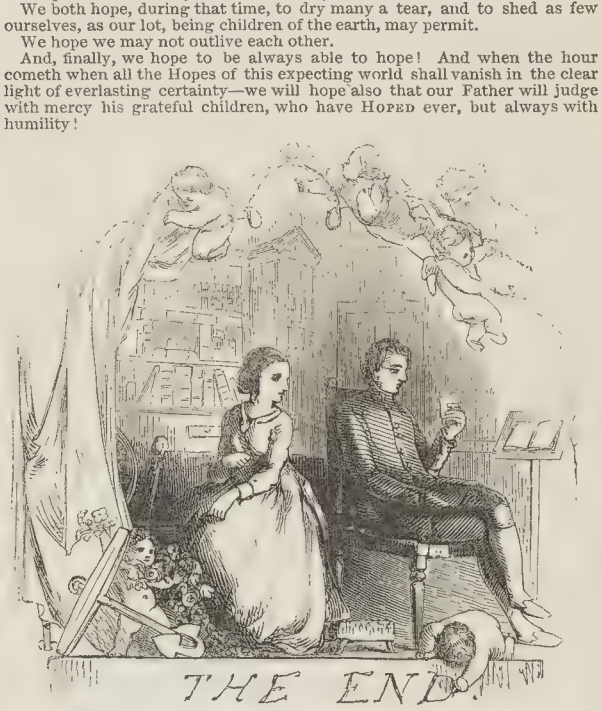
Two years from that day, I sat on an evening of autumn, by my own fireside, in my parsonage-house. Opposite me sat my sweet Whilhelmina—my dearest wife—spinning at her wheel. I was beginning to read to her a sermon I was to preach on the following Sunday, and from which I hoped my parishioners would derive much edification. As I turned over the pages a loose leaf fell from among them. It was the very paper on which, two years before, in very different circumstances, I had recorded my sad and lonely feelings. I showed it to my wife. She read it, smiled—but with tears in her eyes, and with an arch air, that is I believe peculiarly her own, she took up the pen and wrote on the other side of the leaf:—

"The author can now, from his own experience, furnish a description completely contrasting with that which once in a sad hour he gave of one as unhappy as he.

"Now he is lonely no more; no more is he forsaken; his sighs are echoed back, his secret sorrows shared, by a gentle partner. He goes forth, and her heart follows him; he comes, and she meets him with a smile; his tears fall not unnoted—her hand will dry them; and the smiles of his happiness are reflected again in her own. She plucks the flowers of earth to twine a wreath for him, and to strew them along his path. He has his own hearth, and a circle of devoted friends, and counts among his kindred all those who have none. He loves—he is beloved—he can make others happy, and he is happy himself!"

Truly had my Whilhelmina described the happy present, and, animated by feelings as cheerful as the beams of the sun in Spring, I will now, as ever, let my little troop of gladsome hopes dance merrily off into the future.

Thus I hope that my next Sunday's sermon may be of profit to my hearers; and even should some of the more obdurate sleep through it, I will hope that neither this, nor any other of the little disagreeables all must encounter, will affect me so deeply as to disturb my serenity. I know my Wilhelmina, and believe I know myself sufficiently, to hope with confidence, that I shall always be able to make her happy. I have reason to hope that an addition to our circle will bless us both; and I hope, that with time there may come more of them, for I have formed all sorts of hopes for my children. If I have a son, I hope he will be my successor; if a daughter, that—if my friend Augustus would but wait—but I believe he is now on the point of being married.



I hope in time to find a publisher for my sermons!

I hope to live with my wife a hundred years to come!

We both hope, during that time, to dry many a tear, and to shed as few ourselves, as our lot, being children of the earth, may permit.

We hope we may not outlive each other.

And, finally, we hope to be always able to hope! And when the hour cometh when all the Hopes of this expecting world shall vanish in the clear light of everlasting certainty—we will hope also that our Father will judge with mercy his grateful children, who have HOPED ever, but always with humility!

TRIAL OF JOHN TAWELL FOR THE MURDER OF SARAH HART AT SALT HILL.

The trial of John Tawell for the murder of Sarah Hart, at Salt Hill, commenced at Aylesbury, on Wednesday morning. The scene both inside and outside the court is represented as very disorderly, from the excitement that prevailed on the subject. It more resembled the crush and rush at the hustings at a contested election than the opening of a Court of Criminal Justice. After a struggle of more than half an hour's duration, destructive to clothe and almost fatal to life or limb, the reporters fought their way to a miserable little corner of one of the galleries, totally insufficient in space, and destitute of any accommodation. But the scene within the court beggars all description. The opening of a minor London theatre for the first night of a Christmas pantomime is the only scene to which it could be compared. Crushing, yelling, jesting, shouting, and making every sort of noise. At length, about a quarter after nine o'clock, some sort of order was established, and Mr. Baron Parke having taken his seat, a murmur ran through the Court, "He is coming."

Mr. Sergeant Byles and Mr. Prendergast conducted the prosecution; and Mr. F. Kelly, with whom were Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Gunning, the defence.

The prisoner, who was attired in a suit of black, made after the fashion generally adopted by the Society of Friends, of which he is a member, was then placed at the bar. As already known, he is a man about fifty years of age. His appearance is respectable, and the expression of his countenance intelligent, although rendered somewhat disagreeable by a squint. When he approached the bar he was very pale, and looked anxious, but betrayed no timidity or nervousness, and on being asked by the clerk of the assize (after the reading of the indictment, which contained but one count, charging him with causing the death of Sarah Hart, on the 1st of last January, by giving her poison), "How say you, are you guilty with respect to that murder, or not guilty?" he replied in a firm and audible tone "Not guilty.

Having also pleaded "Not Guilty" to the same charge upon the coroner's inquisition,

The jury was sworn, after a challenge by Mr. O'Malley on behalf of the prisoner, of 13 names.

Mr. Sergeant Byles stated the case on the part of the prosecution and then called witnesses in support of it. We subjoin a full report of the evidence. A chair was allowed to the prisoner, at the request of Mr. Kelly. The first witness was

Mary Ann Ashley, examined by Mr. Prendergast.—I live in Bath-place, Salt Hill. On the 1st of January Sarah Hart was living next door to me. I saw the prisoner that day going to her house, between four and five in the evening. He went in. I saw no more until I heard a stifled sort of scream in the house. That was between six and seven o'clock. I was then in my house at the fire in the lower-room. The stifled scream appeared to come from Mrs. Hart's. I took the candle and opened the door. I saw the prisoner coming out of Mrs. Hart's house. There is a little garden in front of each house, seven yards long. The houses are in a small row, consisting of four. My house is nearer to London, and her's next. They have two rooms each on each floor, two storeys high. On opening the door I saw the person I had let out at the gate. I went to Mrs. Hart's gate before the prisoner got out. He appeared agitated and could not open the gate. There was a small button, which was hard to open. I said nothing to him about what I heard when I was opening the gate for him. I had made a remark before. Directly I went out I said "I am afraid my neighbour is ill." I should think I spoke loud enough to be heard by the prisoner. He was in the pathway, coming down, about six or seven yards from me. No reply was made; not a word. When I got to Mrs. Hart's gate I could hear her still, whilst I was opening the gate. It was the same stifle sort of scream still. When I opened the gate, I merely said to the prisoner, "There is a little button, sir; allow me to open it." He made no reply. He appeared hurried in his manner and motions. He was agitated. He tried hurriedly to open the gate, in an agitated manner. He went out first, and I went in.

By Baron Parke.—I saw his face. I had the light in my hand.

I held the candle over. I can say the prisoner is the same man.

By Baron Parke: I had never until the afternoon of that day seen the prisoner. I chanced to go into Mrs. Hart's that day, about two o'clock, and she said to me, "I expect my old master down to-day, but, perhaps, he won't come till to morrow."

Mrs. Hart's door was shut when I got to it. I opened it. I am positive the prisoner is the man who passed me out. I opened the door and went in. I saw Mrs. Hart lying near the door, with her head not a great way from the door. Her dress was disordered. One of her stockings (the left) down and torn, and her left shoe off. Her cap was a little distance from her. She was making a noise, and her eyes were fixed. Her limbs were not moving. I took her hand and raised her, and said, "Oh, Mrs. Hart, what is the matter?" She made no reply. Froth came from the corners of her mouth. Her eyes being fixed, I thought she was dying. I put down my candle and went into the landlady's (Mrs. Wheeler's), the last house of the row. When I first went in I saw on the table in Mrs. Hart's a bottle and a glass with some porter, little more than half full. There was a glass at each side of the table. In one glass there was porter (half full). There was only a little froth in the other. There was a chair beside where Mrs. Hart lay. Another chair was on the other side of the fire. I returned with Mrs. Barrett, a relative of Mrs. Wheeler. We placed a pillow on the child's chair, and put Mrs. Hart's head on it. I saw one of the glasses used by Mrs. Barrett. She used the empty one to get some water from a jug to give to Mrs. Hart. The jug was in Mrs. Hart's kitchen. She could not drink any. I said "Don't give her any, 'twill choke her." Mrs. Barrett rinsed the glass before putting the water in it. I sent one of Mrs. Barrett's apprentices for Dr. Champneys. The deceased's name was Sarah Hart. I saw no phial about as big as a thimble. We searched the whole house carefully for anything, thinking she had taken something that killed her. I found no very small phial at all. Before I went into Mrs. Hart's, I saw the prisoner turn and look at me, and I locked the door for fear. When I first found Mrs. Hart, she was breathing by fits, crying "Oh, oh, oh," convulsively, for three or four minutes after I got into her house. It was the same sort of noise I had heard before I went in. There was no motion of her limbs that I saw.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly, Q.C.: I never saw the prisoner before that day. I think it was near five o'clock when I saw him first go in. Mrs. Hart had not been out. I saw her washing at two o'clock, and she did not go out afterwards, I think. It was about six when I saw Tawell going out. I think it was then past the half hour, and nearer seven o'clock. I remained in Mrs. Hart's house after I found her, and before I went for help, not many seconds. The apprentice was sent for the surgeon directly by Mrs. Barrett, after she saw Mrs. Hart. The apprentice's name is Lovegrove; she is not here. The doctor's is about a quarter of a mile from the house of Mrs. Hart. Dr. Champneys arrived in a few minutes. I cannot say how soon I heard Mrs. Hart speak before the stifled moaning. I heard her voice in rather a loud tone; but only a few words; not for many minutes. I did not think they were quarrelling about money matters; there was not enough said for me to think so; there were only a few words. I thought she might be in hysterics, merely because I knew she was in distress about money matters

THE COURT-HOUSE AT AYLESBURY.—TRIAL OF JOHN TAWELL

She was not hysterical. She was not passionate that I ever saw. I have never said that she was subject to violent fits of passion. I never knew or heard from her that she and Mr. Tawell had had differences about the children. I heard her say she had been advised to put the children out to be taken care of; that was all. It was some time, but not a great while, before I heard the screams that I heard the high voice. I did not think they were quarrelling, because I heard no voice but Mrs. Hart's own. It is not true that I ever said they were first quarrelling about money matters before I heard the scream. The screams were repeated several times before I went in. I did not address the remark about fearing that my neighbour was ill to any one, and I cannot tell whether they first heard it. Mrs. Hart's cap was only about a foot from her, on the floor. When I first entered the house I looked back and saw the prisoner looking at me. When I found Mrs. Hart made no reply to my inquiry, I left her and went for help. When Mr. Champneys came he said he "should try the means, and bleed her." He tried to do so. He felt her heart. I held a basin whilst Mr. Champneys bled her. A little blood came; probably as much as would cover a plate, but I cannot tell how much. She was dead before she was bled. Mr. Champneys said she was gone. I believe she was dead before Mr. Champneys bled her. I always thought so. I never said anything else.

Catherine Whiter, examined by Sergeant Byles: I am barmaid at the Windmill, at Salt Hill. I knew Sarah Hart. She came to our house on Wednesday, the first day of this year, about half-past six, for a bottle of Guinness's stout. She borrowed a corkscrew also. It was rather bent. This is the screw (produced), and this is the sort of bottle, with that sort of label on it. She stayed about ten minutes, and was in conversation with me. Nothing was the matter with her at all. She was neither agitated nor ill. The bottle and screw were to have been returned in the morning.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: It was half-past six when she came. I looked at the clock, and when she had been gone a few moments it wanted 20 minutes to seven.

Mrs. Barrett: I live in Bath-place, Salt Hill. I knew Sarah Hart. She had lived there one year and three-quarters. I remember Mrs. Ashley coming to my house near seven o'clock. I went with her to Sarah Hart's. I saw Mrs. Hart lying on the floor, breathing hard, and her eyes appearing fixed. I fetched some water from a large yellow jug, which stood full in the kitchen. I helped to put her head on the pillow. I fetched the jug. I put some of the water in one of the tumblers on the table. The one that had only froth in it. I rinsed it first, and threw the rinsing into the fire-place. I thought she was too far gone to drink. I put some of the water to her mouth, but I do not think she swallowed any. I applied some vinegar to her face, and sent a young person for Mr. Champneys. He lives on the opposite side of the road, about two hundred yards from Mrs. Hart's. He bled her when he came. On the table I saw, besides the bottle and glasses, a part of the beer. I saw no money. I saw no phial about the size of a thimble.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: My clock was just upon seven when Mrs. Ashley came for me. My clock was about a quarter fast. I returned directly after I had given Mrs. Hart the water, and sent for Mr. Champneys. It may have been about two minutes. I returned to Mrs. Hart's directly after I sent for the doctor. There are gardens behind and before the houses. I went by the back way. The gardens behind are longer than those in front; about twice as long. It was the longer way, but we generally go that way. When I got back a second time to Mrs. Hart's, Dr. Champneys was in the act of bleeding her. I fancied at the time I poured the water down her throat that it made her foam.

By Mr. Baron Parke: I saw no foam until I had tried to pour the water down.

John Kendall: I am waiter at the Jerusalem Coffee-house, Cornhill. Mr. Tawell, the prisoner, is a subscriber to our house. It is a subscription coffee house. On Wednesday, the 1st January, he came to our house about three o'clock, and asked me what time we closed the house at night. I said eight o'clock, and asked him "why?" He said he could not get back till half-past nine, as he was going to the West-end. He had a great coat and a parcel, which he wanted to leave. He said he would call for them, and I made an arrangement that he should have them at half-past nine. I saw him again between half-past nine and a quarter to ten. He called for the coat and parcel, and took them, but left his umbrella with me. I did not see him next day.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: He has frequented our house for seven or eight years.

Henry Gratten: I am one of the clerks at the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railway. On the 1st of January I gave a ticket for the four o'clock train down to Slough to the prisoner. He returned again by the half-past eight o'clock train from Slough.

George Lewis: I am a post-boy at Salt Hill. I know the prisoner these two years or thereabouts, coming down that way. I saw him on the 1st of January, at seven o'clock in the evening, at the Windmill. I was standing at the door, and he was running from the direction of Bath-place. There was light from the house lamp. I have no doubt about his being the man. I said, "How are you, sir?" He turned his head, but made no answer. I saw his face clearly then.

Robert Roberts: I am an innkeeper at Eton. I went from London to Slough on the 1st January. I got there at ten minutes past seven o'clock. There was an omnibus which I went by. The prisoner came up and asked was the driver going to Eton. He replied, "yes." The prisoner got in and sat next me. The driver asked, "Where shall I put you down, sir?" The prisoner replied, "Put me down at Sir John Herschell's house." The driver said, "That is a long way this side of Eton, sir." The prisoner said, "Put me down there." The omnibus stopped there, and the prisoner alighted. There was a man there, a railway guard, with a lamp. The guard said, "Is there any one here for Herschell House?" and he threw his light into the bus. The prisoner got out, paid the money, and went towards the house. I saw no more of him. That was the down omnibus I was in. We met the up omnibus about 20 yards further on. It passed us.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: I never saw the telescope at Herschell House.

Charles Wilmot:—I am one of the guards of the Great Western Railway. I remember the 1st of January. I was in the omnibus from Slough to Eton. A gentleman in the garb of a Quaker got in. I let him out at Herschell House. I cannot swear to him, but I believe he was the prisoner. When I called, "Is there any one for Herschell House?" no one answered, and I had to call again. The Quaker then came out, and gave me the money. We went on to Eton. I merely said to the Quaker, "That is Herschell House, sir."

Ephraim Weymouth: I am a plasterer, and live in the New-road, Marylebone, London. On the 1st of January I was at Slough. Saw a railway omnibus. A person got down at Herschell House. I was standing on the steps. I had rang the bell. I rang a second and a third time. The man stood for a while after getting out of the omnibus, and then followed the same way the omnibus went. I merely noticed that the man had a great coat on.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: I don't know where the telescope is kept. There is no building further or nearer to Eton till you get to the new buildings.

Henry John Howell: I am superintendent of the railway at Slough. I remember on the evening of the 1st of January the prisoner came to me and asked the way to the train. I did not serve him with the ticket. It was forty minutes past seven. I saw him go off by the train. A person coming from Bath-place would be turning his face to the railway if he got into an omnibus going to Eton. The distance of Bath-place from the station is about three quarters of a mile.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: The train started at forty-two minutes past seven.

The prisoner went by a first-class carriage.

Re-examined: After the departure of the train I forwarded some directions by the electric telegraph in consequence of some directions I received.

The Rev. Mr. Champneys: I saw the prisoner getting into a first class carriage. I made an observation to Mr. Howell before the train departed, but the prisoner was not molested. I then gave directions to the persons in charge of the electric telegraph, and information was forwarded to town by it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: Mr. Champneys, the surgeon, is my cousin. I went down in a pony carriage to the railway station in consequence of what I had been told. The prisoner entered the carriage immediately the whistle was blown. Herschell's telescope stood on the grass plat behind the house. It was not beyond the house towards Eton, but directly behind the house. I do not clearly recollect whether it could be seen by going past the house towards Eton.

William Williams, examined by Mr. Prendergast: I was, on the 1st of January, sergeant of police at the railway station, Paddington. In consequence of information I received I watched the up-train passengers, and saw the prisoner get out of a first-class carriage and get into a New-road omnibus. I got up behind, and acted as conductor. It was then twenty minutes past eight o'clock. The prisoner alighted at the corner of Princes-street, and gave me the sixpence. I opened the door on purpose to see him. I saw that he squinted. My attention had not been directed particularly to that peculiarity. The prisoner got out, and went towards Birch's, the confectioner, in Cornhill, went behind the statue, and the prisoner stood looking on it for some time. He then went on, and I traced him to the Jerusalem Coffee-house. I lost sight of him about a minute. I then saw him again, and traced him through Birchin-lane, and on to the Leopard, in the Borough. He stopped there about half an hour, and then returned and went to a lodging-house in Scott's-yard. I waited about for an hour, and then returned to Paddington. Next morning I went again to the lodging-house in Scott's-yard, but he was gone. I then went to the Jerusalem Coffee-house, thence to the Hall of Commerce, and back again to the Jerusalem Coffee-house, where an officer named Wiggins found him, and brought him out to me. Wiggins said to him, "I want you to go to Slough, to the house of a woman found dead." Nothing was said about how she was found dead. The prisoner said, "No, I wasn't at Slough yesterday, I know no one there." I remarked, "Yes you were, sir, you got out of the train, and got into an omnibus, and gave me sixpence." He said something about my being wrong in the identity, and added, "My station in society would be sufficient to rebut any suspicion against me." He was then taken to the station.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: A great many omnibuses stop at Princes-street during the day.

William Wiggins corroborated the evidence of Williams, and added:—I searched the prisoner when I got down to Slough. I found on him £12 10s. in gold, £1 17s in silver, and some halfpence, a gold watch, and a letter addressed to himself. (The letter was handed in.) The prisoner said he had received the letter from his wife. I don't think the prisoner heard the evidence given on the first day of the inquest; but on the second day (Saturday) the evidence was read over to him. Mr. M. Chambers, the barrister, attended for him. The prisoner said to me, "I took thee for a gentleman I knew once." I said, "I told you I was an officer." He said "Yes, but that was afterwards." On the first day he said to me, "Mind, I have disclosed nothing."

Cross-examined.—I told him when I took him into custody that I believed his name was Tawell. He said to me, after some time, that he had come from Berkhampstead. I now believe that he did live there. Everything he had was taken from him when he was searched.

The letter was here read. It has been already published.

Samuel Perkins:—I am an inspector of the Eton police. On the 2nd of January I went to Mrs. Hart's house and got two or three papers. Some others were taken possession of by another officer. I took charge of the prisoner on the first day of the inquest. I took him to Eton to his own house. Mr. Williams, his counsel, saw him on the following day about one o'clock. The inquest was resumed on Saturday. After the interview with Mr. Williams, on Friday, the prisoner spoke to me. He said "This poor unfortunate woman once lived in my service about two years and a half, or nearly so; perhaps you know that." I said "I did not know it, but I had heard so." The other constable then came in, and the prisoner went on to say that she had left his service about five years ago. The other constable told him that whatever he said would be reported to the coroner to-morrow. He said he did not mind that. He then said he had been in the habit of allowing her money, and that she used to pester him writing letters for money; that she had been a very good servant, but a very bad-principled woman; that she had written to him that if he did not send her some she would do something, she would make away with herself. He said he came down to her house, and told her he would not allow her any more money. She then asked him if he would give her a drop of porter. He said he sent her for a bottle of stout, and he had a glass and she had a glass. That she held her hand over a glass, and said, "I will, I will." She poured something into the glass out of a small phial, not much bigger than a thimble. That she drank a part, and the remainder was thrown into the fire. She then began to throw herself about as if in convulsions, and then lay down upon the hearth-rug. He then went out. He did not believe she was in earnest, or he would have called some person. I asked him if he had got those letters? He said, "No; I don't think I have; I never keep such letters as those."

Cross examined by Mr. Kelly: I never said to Mr. Bevan's (the solicitor for the prisoner) clerk that Tawell had made no statement, he was so close.

Thomas Holmas was called and examined by Mr. Prendergast: I am constable at Farnham Royal. I took possession of some things I got at Sarah Hart's house. There was a folio, amongst other things, in which I found this paper. I went out of the room in which the prisoner was for a short time on the Friday, and on my return he was conversing with Perkins. Perkins said to him, "Mind, we are both officers." The prisoner said the woman had got something in a small phial, which she poured into the glass, and drank a portion of, and that the remainder was thrown into the fire. He said the woman then went doing about the house, and she then lay down on the hearth-rug, and he left the house. He added that she used to pester him for money, and he thought not to give her any more. I saw a lady afterwards who came down to have an interview with him on the Sunday. I remained at Perkins's house with him all the time he was there in custody. Mr. Williams, his counsel, had seen him on the Friday. I forgot which day it was that he saw his wife. When she was with him it was some time before she could speak. At length she said, "My dear, what have you been doing?" He said, "Nothing; but I hope you will forgive me." She made some reply, but that was all I heard.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: The lady stayed there about an hour. When the prisoner was conversing with Perkins, and when I came in, the first thing I heard him say was about there being porter, and a bottle, and two glasses. I said nothing to the Coroner about this. I have been an officer in Farnham two years. The death of Mrs. Hart took place in the parish of Farnham, not Slough.

The next witness was Mr. Champneys, the surgeon at Salt Hill. The examination was a very lengthened one, but it related almost exclusively to the tests which he and Mr. Cooper had applied to prove the presence of prussic acid in the intestines of the deceased. The witness gave his decided opinion that she died from the effects of prussic acid. He also said that Mr. Cooper analysed the porter in the bottle, in the glass, and the bun. No prussic acid was discovered. They were not tested for any other poison.

Mr. Kelly cross-examined Mr. Champneys very minutely in regard to the effects of prussic acid, and elicited explanations about cases which had occurred both in London and Paris. In the course of this cross-examination, Mr. Kelly said—Do you, sir, really believe that enough of prussic acid to cause death may be swallowed, diluted in porter or otherwise, without leaving any odour from the mouth?

Witness.—I should certainly always expect to find the odour, but I cannot say that it would be impossible that it would be absent. I smelled the mouth of the deceased woman when I was called to her, and again subsequently, but I perceived no smell of prussic acid. On the subsequent examination by Mr. Norblad, Mr. Pickering, and myself, I remarked the smell of prussic acid. Mr. Norblad said he perceived none, but I was positive that I did. Prussic acid is excessively volatile, and it is this volatility which produces the smell. It has a very peculiar odour.

On further cross-examination Mr. Champneys said, I have never seen a positive case before where death ensued from prussic acid. The analogy between man and the inferior animals is very doubtful. I should say that Sarah Hart's lungs were slightly congested. They were in a natural and healthy state, but they contained more blood than usual. That is not a perfectly healthy state, but there was no symptom of disease productive of death in them. That appearance might arise from many sorts of sudden death.

The witness was re-examined by Mr. Sergeant Byles at very considerable length upon the subject of the qualities, &c.. of prussic acid.

At seven o'clock the Court adjourned till Thursday morning.

Second Day.—Thursday.

The proceedings were resumed this morning at nine o'clock.

The prisoner, when placed in the dock, seemed particularly nervous. He paid marked attention to the evidence, and particularly to the cross-examination of the witnesses by Mr. Fitzroy Kelly.

The first witness was Mr. Cooper, the chemist, of London, who was examined very minutely by Mr. Sergeant Byles, with reference to the experiments he had made to test the presence of prussic acid. He said, he found in the stomach of deceased the pips of some apples. He discovered in the seeds of those apples a quantity of prussic acid. He did not think that any balance could measure the quantity of the poison. There was just as much as would colour the bottom of the phial. To the best of his ability the bottle originally contained more than a grain of prussic acid (the bottle contained the contents of the stomach). The quantity was a grain at the time of the second examination of the bottle—there might have been more at first. The probability was, that it would be so.

Mr. F. Kelly cross-examined the witness very minutely to elucidate his mode of testing the presence of prussic acid. He said the stomach of deceased contained some undigested flesh, the apples he had already mentioned, and a pulpy mass, of which he could make nothing. He did not see the apple pips, but knowing that that tribe would yield prussic acid, he afterwards tested them. He was not aware that sweet almonds would yield prussic acid; the bitter almond certainly would. He made an experiment, on two separate occasions, on different kinds of apples, and extracted a little prussic acid from both.

By Mr. Byles: Before the trial he communicated to the prisoner's solicitor what his evidence would be.

By Mr. Baron Parke: After all the experiments he had made, he had no doubt of the presence of prussic acid in the stomach. The absence of smell might be accounted for by its dilution, or by its odour being covered by that of other substances. It did not follow that the prussic acid should be in the form of salt.

Charlotte Howard: Was servant with Mrs. Gilbert at Streatham. She was at Salt Hill on the 26th December, 1843, and became acquainted with deceased. During the time she remained there (four months) Tawell came there twice. At the end of September in the following year she was there to see her child, and Mr. Tawell came there. Mrs. Hart let him in. She did not see him. She knew his voice. He remained about ten minutes. She was told by Mrs. Hart to go and get a bottle of stout. She brought it and Mrs. Hart afterwards came out of the room and told her to go for a sheet of paper. She went and returned with the sheet of paper. Mrs. Hart was then in the back room, and Mr. Tawell was in the front room. She went then into the room where he was. He went away in about a quarter of an hour afterwards. She saw Mrs. Hart again soon afterwards. She was very ill, and said, "Oh, I'm so ill. I was obliged to tell my master to go, for I can scarce stand." She looked very pale and sick. She looked dreadfully ill. She was very well all day before witness went for the paper. She said "she had drank only a little glass of porter and it made her very sick." Witness then went to the room below and found thirteen sovereigns, which she took care of. She saw on the table some of the porter she had fetched; it was not quite gone. She and the children drank the porter that was left in the bottle, and it did not injure them in the least. She (Mrs. Hart) remained in bed and complained of her head.

Edward Weston Norblad, a surgeon at Stroud, said that on Thursday, the 2nd of January, he went with Mr. Champneys to Mrs. Hart's house. He saw the body of the deceased there. He had heard the evidence of Mr. Champneys, and he would infer the existence of poison if death had suddenly followed the matter taken into the stomach. He would attribute the very sudden death of this person to one of two poisons—either prussic acid or oxalic acid. He was present at the two first examinations of the contents of the stomach. Mr. Cooper had correctly stated the tests he had applied, and he (witness) agreed with him in the inference he drew therefrom. Oxalic acid must have been detected if it contained that acid. He had no doubt that prussic acid was in the stomach, and he attributed the death of deceased to that cause.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly—He had never attended any one who had taken prussic acid. When taken as a medicine, the ordinary quantity was, of Scheele's, five minims, or drops. Prussic acid, he thought, might with advantage be used in varicose affections.

Two witnesses were then examined, but they established no important fact, and added nothing new to the evidence already adduced.

Henry Thomas, chemist, Bishopsgate-street—He remembered Wednesday, the 1st of January, perfectly well He saw the prisoner on that day between twelve and two, at his shop. He asked for two drachms of Scheele's prussic acid. He brought a half-ounce phial, labelled "Scheele's prussic acid." He gave that bottle to put the prussic acid in. The phial had a glass stopper. Witness could not get the stopper out, and was in consequence obliged to give him a stopper of his own. He thought the prisoner said, "You need not put a label on;" but the circumstance was so common that he did not pay any attention to it. He said he wanted to apply the acid externally to a varicose vein. (The book in which the entry was marked was produced.) Witness saw the prisoner on the following day, between the hours of ten and twelve, and he asked for two drachms more. He said he had had a misfortune, he had broken the bottle. He had the same quantity as formerly in the bottle he had originally bought. He had been frequently to the shop before that time.

By Baron Parke: He might have sold him prussic acid before, but did not recollect perfectly. The prisoner said he had been an apothecary and chemist. He was in the habit of covering these phials with leather.

Cross-examined by Mr. Kelly: If he covered the phial at all, it was with leather and not with paper. He had no doubt that the prisoner was at that time affected as he stated with varicose veins. He did not believe that Scheele's prussic acid could be taken into the stomach, and yet not ascertained by the smell.

Mr. — Smythe, clerk to Barnett, Hoare, and Co., examined: The prisoner had been in the habit of banking with them. On Wednesday, the 1st of January, he came between two and three o'clock, and drew a check for £14. Paid him in gold. His account was overdrawn at that date. He believed the paper shown him to be his handwriting. (The paper referred to was a prescription for varicose veins).

Cross-examined: There was not the slightest objection to his overdrawing his account.

A letter was handed to the witness, which he thought was in the handwriting of the prisoner. The letter was addressed to Mrs. Hart, 93, Crawford-street, Portman-square, and was as follows:—

"Dear Friend,—I wish to inform you that I expect to be at home in a fortnight, and therefore you had better not write to me.

"Your friend, "A. Hart."

Mary Ann Moss: Witness lived with Sarah Hart, at 93, Crawford-street, Bryanston-square, about four years since. The only person who used to visit her was the prisoner. He came about once in six weeks, or perhaps oftener. The deceased lived in Crawford-street about twelve months, and then went to Farringdon-green, where she lived twelve months. She then went to Bath-place, at Slough, and witness called on her about eight or nine months before her death. When the prisoner first came to Crawford-street, he asked if a person was living there of the name of Hart. She heard him, and said, "Here I am; it's all right." She had, at first, a back room furnished, but she afterwards bought furniture herself for the front-room. She saw a parcel once come to the deceased, and the prisoner called afterwards, and asked "If it was all right." Witness observed that she had got some blankets. When Mrs. Hart was confined, the prisoner called upon her, and went into her room alone. The last time she saw the deceased was in October last. She had not seen the prisoner for a long time before.

After some further evidence, the case for the prosecution was closed, and Mr. F. Kelly having addressed the jury for the prisoner, called several witnesses to character. The trial was then adjourned till Friday morning.

[We have made arrangements for the transmission of the conclusion of the proceedings, and the verdict, by express, which we shall publish in a later impression as soon as we receive them.]

William Austin, whose name was so often introduced upon the trial of the late Queen Caroline, has arrived in London from Milan, where he has been residing for several years, the inmate of a lunatic asylum. He has been removed to this country through the intervention of the British Government under an authority from the Lord Chancellor, in whose care his person and some considerable property left to him by the late Queen, have been placed by certain proceedings on the part of his relations. Austin is a very good-looking man, apparently about forty years of age. A commission of lunacy was held upon Mr. Austin on Wednesday, and the jury returned a verdict, "That William Austin was of unsound mind, and incapable of managing his affairs, and had been so since the 15th of September, 1841."

"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.

"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the Calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post, Nov. 20.

"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries; and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15.

"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets, as they will be visible in the ensuing year are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.

"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 17.

"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical observations, and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this 'Illustrated Almanack' is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy."—Era, Nov. 24.

"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the foolish almanacks of times that are passing away—and, we may add, one of the most successful. It is filled with illustrations, some of which, representing the signs of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper."—Gardeners' Chronicle.

"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The illustrations are very beautiful. Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

BLOOD to the HEAD—IMPURITY of BLOOD—DERANGEMENT of HEALTH.—An EXTRAORDINARY CURE by HOLLOWAY'S PILLS!—Mr. Willis, a retired publican, living in Penton street, Pentonville, suffered continually from a dangerous determination of blood to the head, with bewildered sensations in his limbs—health much impaired. The blood in a very bad state, often heavy and drowsy, with swimmings in the head. The stomach generally out of order, with little appetite. Every means had failed to restore him to health, but at last, he, like thousands of others, had been completely invigorated and restored to the highest state of health by Holloway's Pills.—Sold (also Holloway's Ointment) at Professor Holloway's Establishment, 244, Strand (where advice may be had gratis), and by all Medicine Venders.

ROWLAND'S UNIQUE PREPARATIONS (under the patronage of the several Sovereigns and Courts of Europe, and universally preferred).—ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for the Growth, Preservation, and for Beautifying the Human Hair. Price 3s. 6d., 7s., Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s. per bottle. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for improving and beautifying the Skin and Complexion. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included. ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, for the Teeth and Gums. Price 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.

IMPORTANT INFORMATION.—Unprincipled individuals, for the sake of gaining a trifle more profit, vend the most spurious compounds under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty); they copy the labels, bills, advertisements, and testimonials (substituting fictitious for the real names and addresses) of the original preparations, and use either a fictitious name, or the word "Genuine," in the place of "Rowland's." It is, therefore, highly necessary to see that the word "Rowland's" is on the Wrapper of each article.— All others are Fraudulent Imitations!!! The Genuine Preparations are sold by the Proprietors as above, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

THE ROBY DAY AND SUNDAY SCHOOLS, MANCHESTER.

NEW SCHOOLS AT MANCHESTER.

This handsome edifice, called "the Roby Day and Sunday Schools," has just been completed at Manchester, in the rear of Grosvenor-street Chapel, in connexion with which this educational provision has been established. The style of the building is Elizabethan of the later period; and it presents a fair specimen of school architecture. The arcade, or ground floor, is to be the playing place for the children; from thence two staircases, one for boys and the other for girls, conduct to the rooms above. On the first floor are a large apartment for a library and reading-room, and a capacious school-room fitted up on the British system, for about four hundred children. The entire cost of the building has not exceeded £3000.

THE LEAMINGTON CUP STEEPLE-CHASE.

Royal Leamington, Thursday.

The affair of yesterday drew together an immense assemblage of the resident and visiting nobility and gentry of the Spa and surrounding counties. The morning was delightful. The locality being generally known, crowds of persons, including the gay equipage of the peer, and the more homely one of his dependents—from a four-in-hand to a "one-horse shay"—were soon on the alert, and the quiet town of Southam presented a most lively appearance. The "gentlemen sportsmen" making host Mash's, of the Craven Arms Hotel, their general rendezvous. It was not, however, till after four o'clock that a signal was given for the start; which had no sooner been responded to by twenty gentlemen, than the most severe snow-storm, propelled by a "stunning" north-easter, burst upon us; and, ere the horses gained the winning flag, the snow was an inch deep as far as the eye could reach.

LEAMINGTON STEEPLE-CHASE.—PRIZE CUP AND WHIP.

To many of the riders the ground had not been previously known, and nearly all of them acknowledge the uncertainty of having correctly traversed the path drawn out by the stewards, owing to the impracticability of seeing the white flags, from the density of the storm; neither could the race, under such circumstances, properly test the merits of the various horses. £120 were added to the splendid cup, which formerly belonged to Captain Lamb, and was won some years back by a horse of his named Shepherd, at Reigate. Had the horses been at the starting-post at the time appointed, all difficulty would have been obviated. The following is a description of

THE GROUND.

The start took place out of a grass field, then they came to a stiff bull finch, with only one gap, which had been made after the ground had been looked over. This caused great confusion, and in the next field they presented a long string. They there met with a stake hedge, which led into a ploughed field; then came another grass field with a slight turn; a small fence, consisting of posts, rails, and hedge; next came a very thick hedge (something like jumping at a house); the next hedge led into the winning field, the first time round, out of which a slight fence led into other lands, which were principally pasture.

The next fence worth notice was one with a hedge and bank on the opposite side; and the one following it consisted of heaps of dirt which had been cleared out of a ditch, with a hedge on the opposite side. The next leap introduced a brook about three yards wide, with a slight take off, and in the ensuing field was the blue (the turning) flag. The brook was then crossed again, though in a less hazardous position, and a slight fence led into a piece of flat, to which two similar fields succeeded. The second field before the winning field, in coming in, was ridge and furrow, and over a stiff bullfinch led into the latter.

The following were the horses entered for the chase:—

Mr. E. Nunn's The Friar (black)	Owner
Col. Wallington's Queen of Trumps (blue and yel.),	H. Madocks
Mr. E. H. Clarke's Whitenose (primrose) ..	C. Brookes
Mr. H. H. Fazakerley's Vixen (scarlet)	Owner
Capt. Windsor's Major A (purple, yel. sl. and cap)..	Owner
Mr. J. Bruce's The Curate (black)	Capt. Peel
Mr. G. Hobson's The Prince (scarlet and black) ..	Owner
Mr. Madocks' Oakstick (pur. and red cap) ..	Capt. Kennedy

Mr. E. H. Clarke's Leo (puce and white stripe) ..	Owner
Mr. Carew's Waverley	Mr. Gage

THE START,

As may be expected, was rather a curious one. A stiff bullfinch, the first test of a steeple-chaser's abilities, was so placed that the "high mettle" had not time to show itself; and, there only being room for one horse at a time to use "the Gap," sent the whole force of the contest into the next field, in the most laughable condition.

The lead was taken up by Mr. Hobson on the Prince to the first fence, which his horse refused and turned round; then came the rush at the gap, all making for the same place, which, of course, caused "a tail." At the hedge before coming into the winning field, Mr. Fazakerly, on Vixen, came down, with another horse upon him, which threw his chance completely aside. Nothing else particularly occurred until reaching the winning field the first time, when Champagne took the lead in earnest, closely followed by Major A. Thus they went on, one after the other, but the snow storm prevents us further particularising at this stage of the proceedings. We may, however, state that Life Guardsman was the last. At the muddy bank we have before described, the Countess fell, and escaped from her rider. The Friar then took up the running, followed by Major A and Whitenose. About six of the riders were immersed in the brook, which the next horse that came up cleared, but fell on the opposite side. Curate came after him, and was pulling double at the time, but in jumping fell over his adversary; then came old Waverley, who sprang right into it, and his rider, over head and ears in sludge, crawled out. Round the blue flag the lead was taken by Mr. Nunn, the Queen of Trumps being second, and Major A third (the rider, Capt. Wyndham, not having seen the ground previously to the race). The latter was about going over the brook the second time the same way as the first, but seeing Mr. Nunn and his companion bearing to the right, he followed them, but lost at least sixty yards by "the move." He, however, soon regained his position, and, in the second field from home, he passed the Friar, and ultimately won easily by four lengths. The following have been placed by the Stewards, Lieut.-Col. Whyte and Capt. Reynolds:—

Capt. Wyndham's Major A	(Owner)	1
Mr. E. Nunn's The Friar	..	2
Col. Wallington's Queen of Trumps ..	(H. Madocks)	3

And all the remainder claimed to be fourth.

BETTING.—The winner had taken £500 to £10 on his horse, which, with £120 added to the Cup (valued at 100 sovs), gave him a stake of upwards of £700. The betting at starting was 6 to 1 agst. Pussey, 8 to 1 agst. Champagne, ditto Oakstick, 10 to 1 agst. The Friar, and 12 to 1 agst The Curate and Whitenose. The stakes were given up by Mr. Ashmore the following morning, he having acted as secretary, and all concerned are unanimous in awarding him their warmest thanks for the spirited, effective, and harmonious manner in which all connected with the affair has been carried out. The handsome whip, valued at 20 sovs, was given to the rider of the second horse.

LONDON AND CROYDON RAILWAY.—The nineteenth half-yearly meeting of the above Company, was held at the London station, on Tuesday, W. A. Wilkinson, Esq., in the chair. The report mentioned that there was an increase of revenue on the half-year, applicable to dividend purposes, of £5,076 9s. 11d., and the increase of passengers 219,004. The atmospheric line between the Dartmouth Arms and Croydon was expected to be in operation in June, though that to Epsom was delayed from pressure of business. The disposable balance in hand was £17,810 8s. 10d., and the Directors recommended a dividend of 8s. per share. The report was adopted.

NEW STREET.—The opening into Leicester-square, from Coventry-street, is to be called St. Anne-street, being the entrance into the parish of St. Anne, Soho.

Letters from St. Petersburg of the 22nd ult. state that the cold had been intense in the extreme there during three weeks (from 23 to 25 degrees of Reaumur), but that it had somewhat abated in consequence of a very heavy fall of snow, which had rendered the streets almost impassable.

A new island has been discovered in the Pacific Ocean by Capt. Simmonds. It is situate in the track from Otaheite to Valparaiso, in south latitude 21 degrees and 10 minutes, and west longitude 138 degrees 54 minutes. He named it the Isle of Faith, from his vessel.

Accounts from Norway to the 21st ult., mention that the British Envoy Sir Thomas Cartwright) and the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires had arrived at Christiania. It appears that the weather there was also more than usually severe. Negociations, it is said, are pending between Sweden and Belgium respecting an extension of certain commercial privileges to the former country, which have been already granted to the Zollverein by the recent treaty. The principal object of Sweden and Norway is to advance the interests of the timber trade.

The Scotch papers contain accounts of the death of Mrs. Cunningham, the mother of Allan Cunningham, the poet, which took place at Dumfries. Great respect was paid at her funeral.

A Berlin letter of the 5th, asserts that the question of a Constitution for Prussia has been again discussed in the Council, and that there is a prospect of some important announcement on this subject being made during the present year.

CHESS.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"R. D.," Louth.—We are unwilling to discourage "R. D." but, in all friendliness, must assure him that the invention of a really fine Chess Problem demands a much greater knowledge of Chess than he at present possesses.

"C. E. O."—The position is ingenious, but it wants the charm of novelty. If we mistake not, it has appeared in two or three works on Chess, both here and abroad. By the way, how is it that correspondents so partial to the game as "C. E. O.," and many others who favour us with their opinions on Chess, do not make themselves conversant with the ordinary English Chess notation? How is it possible an amateur can derive instruction from works on the game who is unacquainted with the signs which denote the pieces and their movements? In attempting to describe the solution of the problem under consideration, "C. E. O." has committed as many errors as there are moves.

"M. R. G.'s" Problem is not very difficult. If it has not been published before, we will insert it shortly.

"Queen's Pawn," Windsor.—We have not time to examine positions which come unaccompanied by their solutions.

"C. Wood," Brighton.—There is not much difference, but we should prefer Black's position.

"An Amateur," Wisbeach, is thanked, but the position presents no points of interest. The poor forlorn King is so jammed in by the adverse forces, that our wonder is not how the mate can be given in so few moves, but how he can possibly survive so many.

GAME, No. 4.—CHESS IN AMERICA.

The following game was lately played by a countryman of ours, Mr. S—y, formerly a promising amateur of the London Chess Cercle, and now Hon. Secretary of the New York Chess Club, against an American amateur—the former giving the odds of the drawn games.

The White king having, what is technically called, the "opposition," Black is unable to queen his pawn; the game was, therefore, abandoned as drawn.

* The leaving his Kt to be attacked by the enemy's pawn, relying upon the counter attack with his own Kt's P is very well conceived.

† This appears to be lost time.

‡ The game having assumed so much the aspect of a draw, which with Black would be equivalent to a lost game, he makes the hazardous attempt to carry it by a coup de main.

§ He might also have played his B to K Kt's sq with safety, we believe.

‖ It looks, at first sight, as if White could save the piece by playing his B to K's sq, and then the Kt to Q's 3rd. In that case, however, Black would still win the Kt or B by moving his Kt to K B's 5th.

THE RECESS.

THE House of Commons adjourned on Thursday for the Easter Recess: this is the first "break" in the session, and by the time it arrives, the course of the Ministry for the year is generally determined by itself, and known to the country. The anxiety that is felt more or less at the opening of every legislative sitting has ceased, and all "interests" know the best and the worst that can happen to them, as far as their welfare can be affected by the measures of the Executive.

The sittings before Easter are, when parties are nearly balanced, occupied by those exclusively party debates, or contests, that have grown rarer and more rare since the accession of Sir Robert Peel to power. But we scarcely remember a session that has been so wholly free from them as the present; and, as we cannot ascribe to the Premier any peculiar secret for depriving party spirit of its virulence, it may not be out of place if we take advantage of the present suspension of business to examine a little into the causes that render the present Government the strongest, the least assailable, and the most able to carry every measure it proposes, that has existed for many years, although there is dissatisfaction and discontent among its own supporters, scarcely concealed at any time, and now openly expressed. Its great reliance at the general election was on the landed interest; and now, among the agricultural members, the willingness to wound is very apparent; it would be dangerous, too, were they not also "afraid to strike." Another section of the party delighting in the name and principles of Toryism, is in open rebellion; their favourite aversion is the head of their own Government, which they attack with talent—persecute with inconvenient allusions to the past—assail with epigrammatic rony that concentrates wit, bitterness, and point—reproach with want of principle and breach of faith—and, as the sum of all, denounce the whole Conservative Ministry as nothing but "an organised hypocrisy."

Thus, with some estranged and doubtful, with some as hot in their hate as the others are cold in their attachment, with an Opposition strong in numbers and powerful at least in talent, how is it the Government stands not only firmly, but almost unshaken; willing and doing as if to will and to do were one; and carrying with unexampled facility measures which the Whigs, in the days of their parliamentary majorities may have wished to originate, but could never carry out, and in their decline and fall dared not even venture to propose?

There are causes why and wherefore, as Fluellen says, and one of the most potent of them, we take to be the fact, that Sir Robert Peel having succeeded, when in opposition, in building up his own party, as soon as he came into power, as effectually succeeded in breaking down and disuniting that of his opponents. This, be it said, was not at all difficult to effect. The Liberal party is, and has long been, divided into sections that do not amalgamate readily. The course taken by Sir Robert Peel has frequently set these knots and parties against each other, but he has rarely united them all against himself. For organic or political changes there is, literally, no agitation whatever; all our energies are directed to social and commercial improvements, and on these the Premier has cut the ground from under the feet of the Opposition, by conceding the principle it contends for, and meeting it only on details. He knows that the battles about the more or less are not likely to be very formidable, and if he goes beyond what his immediate followers approve, he converts opponents into supporters, and triumphs by the votes of his enemies! If these censure him for not going far enough, he has plenty behind him to defend him, even if he did not stir a step in that direction. If he frighten his friends by too rapid, or too great an advance, then there are the free traders to back him, and the result in both cases is a triumphant majority. There is infinite skill and tact in all this. Sir Robert Peel has as perfect a knowledge of all the political affinities and antipathies of the House of Commons, as the chemist has of the affinities of his different compounds, and calculates his effects as nicely. Judged by the test of success, we must call him the most able of modern ministers; we of course leave adherence to principle out of the estimate.

The Session, as far as it has gone, has been wholly occupied by the topic of finance; to the Income-tax there was no effective opposition, and it is now virtually law. The abolition of the Excise of Glass was carried with universal approbation; the sweeping away the import duties from four hundred and thirty articles excited only a few cavils on lard and tanned hides, and thrown silk; and the revision of the Sugar Duties was another question debated mostly on details. One subject only has been brought forward in a manner calculated to excite a little anxiety on the part of the Government—the espionage of the Post-office; and this was a question on which any very determined opposition from the Whigs was staved off by the tu quoque accusation against the late and all former Ministries, that they had been guilty of the same practice, or something like it, themselves. The New Zealand question seems to have resolved itself into a "misunderstanding," and whether the pending debates on Lord Ellenborough's conduct in India will produce anything remains to be seen; from the little alacrity displayed in commencing the movement, we apprehend the Liberals do not expect to make very much of it.

So the Premier dismisses the house for a space with the complacency of a man who has managed them skilfully, and got from them just as much as he wanted. His friends regard him with a surprise not unmingled with fear; his foes with envy and something like admiration, for his dexterity, and his singular success in carrying measures, the mere proposing of which, by them, brought ruin on their party. The people, looking to measures and not men, and seeing commerce prospering and employment abundant, have neither time nor wish to engage in political agitation, and accept changes that are beneficial from whatever side they may come. It may be that there are among them some which could hardly have been expected from such a quarter: but if the grapes are gathered from thorns and the figs from thistles the surprise is not an unwelcome one. The people have learned to attach less importance to the mere opinions of Party, than to the measures of Power

H. M. S. "COLLINGWOOD."

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "COLLINGWOOD."

We feel pleasure in presenting to our readers a portrait of the Collingwood, 80, one of those naval bulwarks of which England has strong reason to feel proud. This vessel, which is sister to the Vanguard, the finest ship of her class, was built at Pembroke, after the design of Sir W. Symonds. She was first commissioned by Captain H. Eden, who, from ill health, was unable to proceed in her to the Pacific. She is now commanded by Captain Smart, and her officers and men number about 800. The Collingwood is called after the brave commander of that name, who, in the Royal Sovereign, broke through the enemy's line at Trafalgar, under the eye of Nelson, from whom he drew forth the exclamation—"See how that brave fellow, Collingwood, takes his ship into action!"

Her sailing qualities appear to realise the most favourable anticipations of naval critics, with whom she has been a constant theme of panegyric. In general appearance she is strikingly beautiful: with her lower deck guns in, she is in draft abaft 23 feet 4 inches.

The following are her main dimensions:—

	Feet.	In.
Length on the Gun Deck	190	0
Length of Keel for Tonnage	155	0
Breadth Extreme	56	3
Breadth Moulded	55	6
Depth in Hold	23	4
Burthen	2609 Tons.

We shall, on a future occasion, illustrate the entire arrangement and economy of this admirable specimen of naval architecture.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

I am happy to announce at last, that the Duke de Broglie has quitted Paris to fulfil his extraordinary and benevolent mission in your country. He is one the most honest men in the world, covering under an exterior of austerity and distance, the soundest heart and the most unswerving integrity. Indeed, he has been the resource of the nation on all difficult occasions, and he goes now, as he has often done before, without fee, without any personal object of interest or ambition, to confirm the existing good relations between England and France, and smooth the difficulties of the right of search. The visit of the Duke should, therefore, be considered as a strong demonstration in favour of the English Cabinet, as his personal friends are among the leaders of the Whig party, and there must be a certain repugnance on his part to negotiate with a Tory Cabinet. I have no doubt that a favourable result will attend his mission, and that the entente cordiale will be made more cordial by his influence.

The literary and political world have been at length gratified by the publication of two volumes of "The History of the Consulate and the Empire," by M. Thiers. Our papers are filled with extracts from it; some detailing what they call the conquest of Egypt, others with descriptions of the Italian campaigns. The volumes contain a great deal of original correspondence—as it appears that Napoleon was in the habit of communicating several times a day, in writing, to his Ministers and Generals. These notes were found in the Tuileries when the Bourbons entered Paris, and were by them thrown aside in lumber rooms, with other waste paper. Chance revealed the secret of this deposit, and M. Thiers has availed himself of it to bring to light some most curious pieces, all of which bear the impress of Napoleon's mind. In one of them, answering an objection made by the Ministers to his commanding in person the proposed invasion of England, Buonaparte says—"The conquest shall be made in fifteen days; and the first tidings the people of Paris shall hear of the sailing of the expedition, will be accompanied with those of its full success."

The grand annual exhibition of modern pictures will be opened in a few days, at the Louvre. I regret to find that the first artists do not exhibit: Scheffer, Ingres, Delaroche, Roqueplan, Winterhalter, and Dupré, have not sent pictures; and the jury have refused a superb subject, by Eugene Delacroix; still, the gallery will not be interior to that of last year, and works worthy of French art will be found among those accepted.

The trial of the Englishmen, Messrs. Baring, Walker, Lambert, Frazer, and their associates Messrs. Peyronnet and Ogleby, for alleged cheating at cards after a dinner party, has commenced before the Cour Royale. It will take some days. Mr. Baring was not present, but his celebrated friend Mdlle. Emma Kaye sat with the other prisoners. The case comes before this court on appeal, and it piques the curiosity of both French and English. It is likely to do the latter much mischief in society here, where national prejudices are ever ready to seize any new pretence for attack. The fact is, that Paris is not only the rendezvous of pleasure of Europe, but the refuge of all the disreputable characters whose private history and identity are forgotten in the vortex of pleasure. They find easier access to society, because so many of its French members have so lately risen with a flying political leap to power, over-vaulting better and more scrupulous men at the great crisis of 1830. These are the most moving, restless members of society; and so constituted, political savoir faire; but, above all, money, are the only things valued; and

Querenda pecunia primum est,
Virtus post memmos!

FRANCE.

The Paris papers contain the details of a frightful event which occurred at Algiers on the 8th inst., namely, the explosion of the powder magazines of the park artillery. The entire building, and several others in its vicinity, were utterly destroyed, with the loss of an immense number of lives. The explosion which caused these disasters had taken place in the two magazines, separated from each other by the ditch at the foot of the old Spanish town upon which the lighthouse stands. Considerable injury was done in the port, and especially on the Bouberak, by numerous stones thrown to a distance of 200 metres. In the buildings there were killed 43 artillery workmen, 10 artillerymen, 31 pontonniers, and 2 workmen of the 2d company; there were, besides, 30 wounded. Sergeant-Major Denot, his wife, and a child perished. The Controleur d'Armes Piron died after undergoing amputation of the leg. Five other non-commissioned officers were crushed to death on the ruins. The Commandant of Artillery Pallard was killed under the ruins of his house, which was almost levelled to the ground by the violence of the explosion. Close to the pavilion occupied by M. Pallard was the house of M. Segrettier, director of the port, who had at the time about 20 persons in his drawing-room. Mme. Segrettier, hearing her child cry, left her guests to go into the room where the child was, and, as she was returning to the salle-à manger to give directions for tea, the explosion took place, and she was buried in the ruins of the house, only one room of which was spared—viz., that which she had quitted, and in which the company was assembled. In that room only one person, Madame Sylvestre, the wife of the admiral's secretary, was injured, and that slightly. When the spectators of this horrible scene had recovered from their first shock, they heard the last words of the unhappy mother—they were "Save my child."

The Algérie states, that the day after the explosion 135 men did not respond when their names were called: of these 48 are wounded. The cause of the dreadful catastrophe was still unknown. Two of the victims, Commander Pallard, the Under Director of the Artillery, and Madame Segrettier, the wife of the Director of the Harbour, were buried on the 10th. The Semaphore de Marseilles, of the 15th instant, quotes a letter from Algiers, stating that the body of a negro or Moor had been found under the ruins of the powder magazine, who had not been recognised by any persons belonging to the naval department. It was thence believed that he might have been induced to commit "an act of fanaticism," of which he fell the first victim, but nothing positive was yet known on the subject.

The Journal des Débats states that a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between France and the Imaum of Muscat, was signed on the 17th November last, at Zanziba. This treaty excites the ridicule of the Opposition journals; but it is defended at great length and very energetically by the Débats.

The Siecle gives an account of the funeral of M. Dujarrier, who, as we stated last week, was killed in a duel with M. Beauvallon. A large concourse of persons, friends of the deceased, including nearly the entire corps of writers and editors of journals and other periodicals of Paris, were present on the melancholy occasion. The pall was held by MM. Emile de Girardin (member of the Chamber of Deputies, and editor in chief of La Presse), Alexandre Dumas, De Balzac, and Mery. The procession moved direct from the residence of the deceased to the cemetery of Montmartre, where M. Emile de Girardin pronounced an affecting discourse over his remains. By M. Dujarrier's will, written after the midnight which preceded his death, M. Dujarrier bequeathed nearly half his fortune (estimated at between £30,000 and £40,000.) to his mother; to his deceased sister's son property worth £15,000 or £16,000; to a godson a share in La Presse, worth £3000 or £4000; besides vases and other tokens of remembrance to sixteen or eighteen friends.

A great banquet was given on Sunday by the merchants of Paris to Marshal Bugeaud, in the Great Hall of the Bourse. The number present was limited to four hundred, among whom were the Dukes de Nemours, Aumale, and Montpensier, and the Prince de Joinville, the Prefect of the Seine, the Prefect of Police, &c. M. Cunin Gridaine, the Minister of Commerce, was the only member of the government who attended. In the course of the evening M. Legentil proposed the health of the Royal Princes, and entered at some length on the eminent services they had rendered to their country. The Duke de Nemours, in returning thanks, said, "Gentlemen, the effusion with which you have drunk the health of the Princes has deeply affected us, and we beg leave, in return, to express the feelings of our hearts. Happy are those who have been able to inscribe their names in the rolls of Africa; more happy those who have there gained for themselves a glorious name. Honour be theirs! But honour is due also to all France, which has submitted to make the sacrifices required for such a glorious task! Honour to the commerce of France, which vivifies and fecundates what victory has gained for us; it is entitled to our thanks for its co operation in the extension of this conquest; for there, as wherever else any great work is to be accomplished, it has taken a prominent place. Algeria will ever be dear to us; for it is there that we have participated in the deeds of our army and our navy; it is there that we have by our actions proved the sentiments of our hearts—the sincere devotion to our country with which we are animated." The Royal Duke's speech was received with immense applause. Marshal Bugeaud's lady and Madame Gasson, her daughter, were in the gallery, and were afterwards conducted round the salle by M. de Richebourg, the Commissary of the Bourse. The whole of the company were dressed in plain clothes. The dinner consisted of 32 pheasants truffés, 64 woodcocks, 258 partridges truffés, rôtis ou en salmis, 16 filets de bœuf, 64 fowls, 16 salmon, 16 turbots, 64 dishes of forced vegetables, such as green peas, asparagus, French beans, artichokes, &c.; 128 sweet dishes, 64 baskets of dessert, 64 compots, 32 plum-pudding diplomates, 32 large fancy pieces in sugar, &c.; 32 jellies, 40 iced creams, 32 fromages glacés, 800 bottles of Bordeaux, Beaune, and Champagne, 100 bottles of Madeira, 500 glasses of Punch à la Romaine, 500 cups of coffee, with brandy and liqueurs.

The salle was lighted by 6000 wax-candles. The attendance was excellent, there having been upwards of 400 waiters employed.

The Minister of Public Works has presented to the Chamber of Deputies the Paris and Lyons Railroad Bill. The Chamber of Deputies having voted in 1842 a sum of 11,000,000f. for the construction of the portion of the line extending between Dijon and Chalon, more than two-thirds of the distance, or 27½ miles, are now nearly terminated, and will, in a few months, admit the laying down of the rails, for which purpose the Minister required an additional credit of 5,000,000f. The entire length of the line from Paris to Lyons is about 322 miles, and its cost is estimated in the bill at £7,210,000. The Minister calculates the gross revenue of the road at £1,030,000, and the net proceeds at £566,000, or nearly 7 per cent. on the capital of the company. The maximum of the duration of the concession is fixed at 45 years, and the amount to be lodged as security in order to be entitled to propose for it, is nearly £1,000,000 sterling.

The Lyons and Avignon railroad, which is to be the continuation of the Paris and Lyons line, is to proceed along the left bank of the Rhone, and unite at Avignon with the Marseilles line. Its length is 142 miles, but, adding three more for its passage through Lyons, the whole will be nearly 144 miles. The costs are estimated at £3,200,000.

PORTUGAL.

Our Lisbon letters of the 12th instant state that some disturbances have taken place in the province of Minho. On the 1st instant the tax-gatherers having gone to the village of St. Martinho to collect the new impost on wine, the people rose upon them and put them to flight. Shortly afterwards, they returned with an escort of 30 infantry; but meanwhile the tocsin had been rung in all the surrounding villages, and a great number of men, headed by the Morgado Magalaes, a country gentleman of the district, had assembled at St. Martinho, armed, some with fowling-pieces, but most with pikes or scythes. The soldiers, seeing this formidable array, retraced their steps, and took up a defensive position on a neighbouring height, from which, however, they were soon dislodged by the people, who pursued them, firing a few shots at them, and abusing them as robbers and oppressors of the poor. Next day a detachment of 80 infantry and some dragoons, under the command of Captain Guedes, attacked the insurgents, who stood their ground for some time, but at last fled and dispersed, leaving ten of their number dead on the field. The soldiers then went into the village and set fire to several cottages, which were burnt to the ground. The Diario do Governo has since officially announced the complete restoration of order.

The law for the abolition of the foreign Conservatorial Courts has passed the Chamber of Peers unanimously. The formation of some railways was talked of in Lisbon.

UNITED STATES.

By the Britannia steamer, which left Boston on the 1st instant, and Halifax on the 3rd, we have New York papers to the end of February. The proceedings in Congress are brought down to the 26th of February, which was the last week of the session. The subject of the annexation was the principal point of discussion in the Senate. A difference of opinion exists as to the ultimate fate of the measure, which had passed the House of Representatives; but the general feeling in Washington was, and the same is expressed by the New York Courier, and other papers opposed to the annexation, that upon those resolutions would be engrafted the spirit of Mr. Benton's Bill, dividing Texas into two territories, abolishing slavery in the one, and retaining it in the other; and that the measure in that shape would pass the Senate. Such was the impression, but the division was expected to be close.

President Tyler, who was on the eve of official extinction, had addressed to Congress no less than three messages. The first relates to the Oregon territory, and announces that the negociations were proceeding satisfactorily, and were likely to terminate amicably. Another is occupied with alleged grievances to which certain American citizens are exposed by the operation of the laws for the suppression of the slave trade: and the third relates to the indemnity due by Mexico to the United States.

Mr. Polk was to take office on the 4th of March, and numerous were the parties paying their adoration to the rising sun. In the meantime he was exercising, in fact, all the duties of the chief magistrate, holding his levees, distributing his offices, and paying marked attention to business. His personal habits are dwelt upon by the news gossippers of the capital, who record his early rising, his temperate habits, close application, and numerous other virtues.

These papers contain later Mexican news, the dates from Vera Cruz being as late as 4th of February. Santa Anna was still a prisoner in the castle of Perote, whence he had written to the Congress, begging abjectly for life and pardon. It had been decided to try him for malpractices in his late capacity of Commander in-Chief, or President, and not as a traitor, which indicates that some milder course will be pursued towards him than what had been predicted from the fury of the people generally. This clemency appears to have emanated from the two Chambers of Congress.

The Government has decided to try by court-martial all the officers who obeyed the orders of Santa Anna after the election of General Herrera as President of the Republic. They have also been displaced from their command.

The effects belonging to Santa Anna, at his residence of Magua de Clavo, have been seized by the authorities of the department of Vera Cruz, and removed to that city for sale.

The city of Mexico was quiet, and everything proceeding in its usual manner. On the morning of the 13th ult. the cannons announced to the inhabitants the raising of the state of siege to which they had been subjected during the late troubles.

The missing packet ships, the England and the United States, respecting the fate of which so much painful anxiety has prevailed, had not been heard of. As the one sailed from Liverpool on the 26th of November, the other on the 1st of December, last year, there is too much reason to apprehend that their fate is sealed. The first-named vessel had on board, including crew and passengers, 90 persons; the other, 74—making the destruction of human life, if the vessels be lost, no fewer than 164!

The following letter from an American correspondent, dated Elleridge, U. S., Feb. 28, gives some interesting particulars in regard to the probable composition of the Cabinet of the new President:—

The President elect, Mr. Polk, has arrived in good health at the seat of government, after a journey of some 1500 miles from his home. The 3rd of March is the last day of the present Congress, and on the 4th the new houses will be organised, and the inauguration take place, the President of the United States taking the following oath agreeably with the Constitution:—"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the United States."

Mr. Polk is the youngest man ever called to the Presidential chair in the Republic, he being but forty-nine years of age. His progress through the country from Tennessee to Washington was attended with great rejoicings by the people. His political principles have been, and are, more conspicuous with the great body of American citizens that are to be found in the interior, and along our river and agricultural districts, than those of Mr. Clay. As soon as the inauguration is over, the President will proceed to form his Cabinet, and to make such appointments as are necessary. For this purpose the new Senate will be retained to act upon and confirm his nominations. The Cabinet consists of Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, Postmaster-General, and Attorney-General. It is understood that men favourable to the immediate annexation of Texas will be called to the Cabinet.

The following States,—four slave-holding and two non-slave-holding—it is likely will be represented in the Cabinet:—South Carolina, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, New York, North Carolina, and Kentucky. Mr. Calhoun, the great Nullifier and present Secretary of State, will probably remain. General Cass, our last Minister to France, who has just been elected United States Senator from Michigan, may possibly be called. But the most likely men, for all is conjecture as yet, are Messrs. Calhoun, Buchanan, Walker, of Tennesse, Saunders, Butler of Kentucky, and Marcey. Our excellent Minister in London, who has endeared himself to all classes of people there with whom he has had intercourse, will be succeeded, probably, (not till the next session of Congress) by Mr. Stevenson, our former Minister to the Court of St. James, if that gentleman is not named for the Cabinet.

You will probably have heard of the capture of Santa Anna. He was taken in a ravine with cork leg in hand. He has been taken to Mexico to be tried by both houses of Congress. He possesses a good deal of money in the English funds. His property in Mexico has been confiscated. You printed a fine likeness of him some months ago.

The people in this country are arqused on the subject of the enormous rate of postage taxed by the Government. The postage at present is nearly as great as in England previous to 1840, when the admirable policy of Mr. Rowland Hill was adopted. The postage here on a single letter to any part of the United States is 25 cents, or an English shilling; and two pieces of paper constitute a double letter, and is charged double postage. Efforts have been made for several years to reduce this tax upon the people, and they have so far succeeded this session as to get a bill through the Senate founded somewhat upon the English mode, though not as good in every particular. It provides that single letters may weigh half an ounce, and shall be charged at a uniform rate of five cents., or twopence halfpenny sterling. Newspapers free, thirty miles or less, or two cents. per ounce for a longer distance. The franking privileges extend to ex-Presidents and their widows, members of Congress, and postmasters. The bill will be adopted.

NEW BELL FOR YORK MINSTER.—The bell lately cast for York Minster is to be exhibited at the Baker-street Bazaar for a short time previous to its removal to York. Some notion may be formed of this bell when it is stated that it weighs nearly thirteen tons, and with stock, sixteen tons, and it will take twelve men to ring it. Its progress along the street attracted great attention, although the precaution was taken to convey it in the night. It was drawn by fifteen horses.

DEATH FROM STARVATION.—On Wednesday Mr. Wakley held an inquest at the Prince Regent, Seymour-street, Edgware-road, on the body of Anne Grubb, aged sixty-nine. The body lay in a miserable garret of the house No 14, Wells-street, Seymour place, and had nothing on but the wretched remains of garments. It appeared that the deceased's husband had formerly been in the navy, and was now an inmate in Greenwich Hospital. The deceased had a pension of £3 10s. per annum allowed her by the Trinity-house, and that, with the sum of 1s. 6d. and a loaf of bread per week from the parish of St. John's, Horsleydown, constituted the entire means of her subsistence. The deceased had complained very much of her condition since the setting in of the recent cold weather, and was last seen alive on the previous Thursday evening by her landlord. On the following morning, as she was not seen about as usual, the landlord became alarmed, and the room door having been forced, the body of the unfortunate woman was found in the position above described. After a protracted inquiry the jury returned a verdict—"That the deceased had died from the want of the common necessaries of life."

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE. March 19.

The nomination of candidates for the office of Librarian in this University is fixed for the 2d of April, and the election will take place on the 3rd.

The name of Mr. John M. Kemble, the celebrated Anglo-Saxon scholar, has been accidentally omitted in the list already published.

THE CHANCELLOR'S MEDALLISTS.—T. Randall and T. K. Knox, both of Trinity College.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.—New Fellows: Robert Bickersteth Mayor and Stephen Parkinson.

OXFORD. March 15

This being the last day of term, the following degrees were conferred:—

Doctor of Divinity, by decree of Convocation.—Rev. John Medley, Wadham College.

Master of Arts.—Frederick Metcalfe, Fellow of Lincoln College.

Bachelor of Arts.—Henry A. Buckmaster, Christ Church, and the Rev. Sidney George Selwyn, Fellow of New College.

DEATH OF THE BISHOP OF ELY.—We regret to announce the death of the Bishop of Ely. His lordship expired on Thursday morning at two o'clock. He had been somewhat better in the middle of last week. On Monday he became worse, and the bad symptoms abated again duriag the night. Another increase of the leading symptoms was observable on Wednesday afternoon, and his lordship's health gradually failed until he expired next morning at the hour above mentioned. His death was tranquil in the extreme, and he was perfectly sensible to the last.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ARRIVAL OF THE DUKE DE BROGLIE.—The Duke de Broglie has arrived in London on a special mission regarding the slave treaties between this country and France. We understand he will remain with Count de St. Aulaire, the French Ambassador, during his sojourn in this country.

THE HUNTERIAN ORATION.—On Wednesday the Hunterian Oration for the present year was read by Dr. Jordan Roche Lynch, in one of the large rooms on the ground floor of Exeter Hall, in the presence of a very strong muster of the members of the General Medical Protection Assembly, over whom Mr. Joseph C. Carpue presided.

FALL IN THE PRICE OF BREAD.—On Wednesday the bakers of Drury-lane, Clare-market, and other places, lowered the price of the 4lb loaf to 5½d., being a reduction of one penny. There is some bread selling as low as 4½d., called country bread, but not weighed. The high-priced bakers still maintain their prices.

FANCY FAIR AND BAZAAR IN THE THAMES TUNNEL.—On Monday there was a fancy fair and bazaar in the Thames Tunnel, which was brilliantly illuminated on the occasion, and the shafts on the Rotherhithe and Wapping shores, decorated with flags, banners, and Chinese lanterns. The stall counters in the recesses between the eastern and western roadway of the tunnel were tastefully laid out with curiosities and works of art, and people were invited in a very pressing manner by several individuals to take tea and coffee under water, while others were as clamorous in their invitations to be electrified for a penny each. In the Wapping shaft a large booth was fitted up for the exhibition of feats of legerdemain by the Wizard of the North, and there wss a splendid cosmorama and a saloon of arts in the Rotherhithe shaft, which appeared to be the leading attraction of the place. When the shafts were illuminated after sunset, the effect was novel and brilliant. There were two bands of music, and various amusements, for the gratification of the visitors.

SOUTH EASTERN (DOVER) RAILWAY.—The half-yearly meeting of the above company was held on Tuesday at the London station, Sir John Kirkland in the chair. He stated that the gross revenue for the half-year was £139,042 11s. 2d.; the expenditure, £69,288 0s. 2d. Of these expenses £28,943 15s. 2d. was disbursed by the joint locomotive committee, the mixed authority of which is found so indesirable that the directors have taken steps for bringing the department under their own direction. The Tunbridge-wells branch is expected to open in September next; the Canterbury in December, and its extension to Margate and Ramsgate early in next year. The lease of the Greenwich line is now completed, and only wants the sanction of the Legislature. No credit has been taken in the present half-year for receipts from that source; but there has been an excess in the first three months of this year over last, of £1924 2s. 2d. The accounts showed a balance of £70,444 17s. 7d., out of which the directors recommend a dividend free of income-tax, of 15s. 4d. on the paid up shares, and 1s. 11d. per share on No. 1 shares, on which £4 was paid previous to the 31st of January, leaving £24,248 4s. 8d. as a reserve fund. The report then referred to the extensions at present before Parliament, and expressed the conviction of the directors of the soundness of the scheme. The report was adopted.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Eight Millions Consolidated Fund Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Property-tax Bill was read a second time, but it was intimated, on the part of the Government, that there should be a full opportunity for discussing it on the third reading.

Some interest was excited by an incidental manifestation between Lord Campbell and the Earl of Ellenborough. Lord Campbell having moved the committal of the Deodands Bill, the Earl of Ellenborough stated some objections to the length of it. To these objections Lord Campbell replied, and hinted that the Earl of Ellenborough, in some of his proclamations in India, had not exhibited any remarkable love of brevity. This remark gave rise to the following retort:—The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: The noble lord has vindicated the length of his bill in a speech, the greater part of which might have been spared, especially that part of it which related to me. (Cheers.) I am here (said his lordship, with great emphasis) to answer him or any man, and I only wish that that had been said in my presence which was said in my absence. (Loud cheers.)—Lord CAMPBELL: If the noble earl is content with one clause, and one clause be enough, I am content also. As to the rest, I am sorry to have aroused the sensitive feelings of the noble earl by an observation which really meant nothing in the way of offence.—The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: Then I beg to give the noble and learned lord a piece of advice—the same advice that was given by the Earl of Chatham to a member of the other house who ventured to arraign his conduct, and then said that he meant nothing—"The next time you mean nothing you had better say nothing." (Loud cheers and laughter.)—Lord BROUGHAM: When my noble friend was absent, if he stood in need of vindication he had it. Nothing, I am sure, will give him greater satisfaction than to be attacked in his presence as he was attacked behind his back. I may add, that as often as anything was said against him, he was zealously, fully, anxiously, and ably defended by the noble and gallant duke (the Duke of Wellington)—and zealously, though God knows not ably, but I am told successfully, defended by the individual who has now the honour of addressing your lordships. (Cheers.)—The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: I know the debt of gratitude I owe to the noble duke on that and on all other occasions. I cannot trust myself to speak upon the subject. (Cheers.)—The house adjourned at an early hour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

There was a morning sitting, at which the report on the Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill was received, after some discussion.

At the evening sitting, several railway bills passed a stage.

The Jewish Disabilities Removal Bill was read a first time.—Sir R. INGLIS announced his intention of opposing its further progress.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.—On the motion that the house should go into committee on the Customs Bill, Mr. W. MILES moved a resolution "that it is the opinion of this house that in the application of surplus revenue towards relieving the burdens of the country, by reduction or remission of taxation, due regard should be had to the necessity of affording relief to the agricultural interest." Mr. Miles supported his proposition by arguing that as there was a surplus of three millions and a half, this was particularly the time when the claims of the agriculturists ought to be considered. He said the agriculturists contributed their full share to the Income-tax, and it was therefore only bare justice that they should derive a corresponding advantage from the reductions of taxation which that Income-tax enabled the Government to effect. Mr. Miles went on to contend that the tariff had depressed the agricultural interest, and said on his own part, and several other agricultural representatives, that if they knew the act of 1843 was to be followed as it had been by the tariff and Canada Corn Bill, it would have been met by an opposition which it would have been impossible for any Minister to resist. (Loud cheers from the agricultural representatives.) He suggested several measures of relief, but the chief was the transference of certain charges from the county rate to the Exchequer, Mr. Miles complained not only of the tariff, but of the poor-rates and county-rates. Mr. Miles went into some statistics, both as to the amount of their collection, and the purposes to which they are applied, which he contended pressed unequally on the agricultural community, as compared with other classes, from which they should be relieved, and urged that the expense of criminal prosecutions should be borne by the State instead of by each separate county. He confessed that in bringing forward his motion, it was not in concurrence with the whole of the agricultural body, but in justice to his own feelings and opinions.—The resolution was seconded by the Earl of MARCH.—Sir J. GRAHAM opposed the motion, and argued generally against any shifting of the burden of county rates. He supported the principle of protection, and denied that the importation of foreign cattle had caused a fall in prices.—Mr. NEWDEGATE concurred in the views of Mr. Miles, as to the depression of the agricultural interest.—Lord J. RUSSELL reiterated his former opinion that protection was the bane of agriculture; and, after alluding to the measures of the present Government, argued in support of the principle of free trade. He said, let them rely upon their energy, upon their enterprise, and upon their capital—let them look to these as the sources of their prosperity, and not rely upon that broken reed, which they might be able to obtain from any legislative protection. (Cheers.) He said, too, that with regard to many articles for which in former days the manufacturers sought protection by legislative means, he was happy now to see that the manufacturers had, by their success in foreign countries, no need for that protection. His uncle and his father had delighted as much as any men to witness the improvement of agriculture, and had done all they could to bring the farmers together with the view to the adoption of improved modes of cultivation; therefore he should be the last man to wish for any unnatural or unfair depression of the agricultural interest. (Hear, hear.) But if they desired to promote the good of agriculture—if they wished the landed interest to continue to hold the high title to the respect of the country it had won for itself in former days, and which it sought to possess now—they should not seek that object by motions like the present, but make a just and a fair arrangement between all parties, and that while all England should see that the landed interest was the most powerful, it was, also, the most generous class of the community. —Mr. B. ESCOTT opposed and Lord WORSLEY supported the motion.—Mr. DISRAELI made another satirical speech, most of which was directed against Sir R. Peel and Sir T. Fremantle, the former of whom he accused of having deserted the agricultural interest. Mr. Disraeli drew a humorous contrast between the conduct of Sir Robert Peel in opposition, and that which he pursued as a Minister. Mr. Disraeli said, I remember his "protection" speeches—the best speeches I ever heard. It was a great thing to hear the right honourable gentleman say, "I would sooner be the leader of the gentlemen of England than possess the confidence of sovereigns." That was a grand thing. (The ironical tone in which this comment was given caused roars of laughter.) We don't hear much of "the gentlemen of England" now. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) But they have the pleasures of memory—the charming reminiscences of a first love (loud laughter); and though their lover may not kneel now as in the hour of passion, still they can recall the past, and nothing is more unwise and unseemly than the toneof recrimination and reproach. What's the use of it? We all know that in this case, as in others, when the beloved object has ceased to charm, it is in vain to appeal to the feelings. (Loud and continued cheers and laughter). The right honourable gentleman does what he can to keep these gentlemen quiet: he sometimes treats them with arrogant silence, and sometimes with haughty frigidity, and if they knew anything of human nature they would take the hint and shut their mouths. Mr. Disraeli concluded his speech with this philippic agains' Conservatism. For myself, I care not what will be the result. Dissolve, if you like, the Parliament you have betrayed, and appeal to the people, who, I believe, mistrust you. For me there remains this, at least—the opportunity of expressing thus publicly my belief that a Conservative government is an organised hypocrisy.—After speeches from Mr. Darby, Sir C. Burrell, Mr. Smythe, and Mr. P. Borthwick, Sir ROBERT PEEL stated his reasons for opposing the motion, and said that to encourage the idea that a mere transference of a portion of the county rate to the consolidated fund would be any benefit, would be to practise a delusion on the agricultural interest. He asked the house to compare the present state of commerce and trade with 1842, and whatever might be said of the effects of good harvest, the influence of commercial reforms could not be denied, which by promoting consumption benefitted agriculture. Thinking extreme protection and prohibition wrong, he defended moderate protection as necessary, not on principles of commercial policy, but as essential to a state of things where great interests had grown up, and whose injury would be that of the community at large.—Sir R. PEEL defended his consistency upon the question of agriculture, and said it was his intention to pursue the course he had hitherto taken, without yielding to the suggestions of the one party or the other. He said he should not enter into personal controversy with Mr. Disraeli, whose panegyrics and attacks he held in the same estimation, and quoted some speeches of that gentleman to show that he (Mr. Disraeli) had defended his (Sir R. Peel's) consistency in regard to free trade.

On a division, the numbers were the following:—

For Mr. Miles's amendment	78
Against it	213
Majority	135

The house then went into committee on the Customs Duties, and disposed of some of the articles. Some votes were also agreed to in Committee of Supply. The house did not adjourn till a quarter past two o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Royal assent was given, by commission, to the Consolidated Fund Bill, the Stamps Assimilation (Ireland) Bill, and the Constables (Scotland) Bill.

The Property-tax Bill went through committee, and it was arranged that the discussion upon it should take place on the 4th of April, when the third reading would be proposed.

Some miscellaneous business was transacted, and the house adjourned till Thursday the 3rd of April.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE WINDOW-TAX.—Lord DUNCAN moved for a select committee to inquire into the present mode of assessing, levying, and collecting the window duties in Great Britain, and to report their opinion thereupon to the house. The noble lord entered into several details to prove the unjust and partial operation of the window-tax, and urged its repeal on the ground that the duty pressed upon the health and comfort of the people, who endeavoured, as it were, by a sort of side wind, to ventilate their dwellings. He wanted the committee to learn how it was that £836,000 out of the million and a half which the tax produced was paid by houses having less than 20 windows each, and that £1,843,000 of the entire sum was paid by houses having under 40 windows each, leaving only an insignificant amount to be levied off the mansions of the wealthy.—Captain ROUS seconded the motion.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER admitted that objections might be urged against every tax, and that cases of inconvenience might arise from the operation of the present one. The Government would remedy all cases of grievance, if possible, but as he could not hold out any hope that the tax would be repealed, it was useless to go into the inquiry, and he must, therefore, oppose the motion.—Captain Pechell, Sir C. Napier, Mr. Hume, and Mr. E. Ellice, jun., spoke in favour of the motion.—Mr. F. BARING opposed it. He said that Lord Spencer had looked into the whole question, and was unable to find any effective remedy for the evils complained of; nor could he (Mr. Baring) discover any either, he confessed. —Mr. WAKLEY suggested the withdrawal of the motion, provided the Government would give a pledge to take the tax into consideration.—Sir R. PEEL said that in order to induce Lord Duncan not to go to a division, he would assure him that, when the next time arrived for determining on a financial scheme, this tax should, along with other taxes, receive from the Government a full, fair, frank consideration. But he could not give any positive assurance of its remission. On a division, the motion was rejected by a majority of 46, the numbers being,

For the motion	47

THE NEW ZEALAND COMPANY AND LORD STANLEY.—Mr. G. W. HOPE moved for the production of papers relative to New Zealand, for the purpose of obtaining an opportunity of defending Lord Stanley from the charges lately made against him in the house, of having broken faith with the New Zealand Company. The hon. Under Secretary entered at some length into the charges made against the noble lord as Colonial Secretary. One of the charges was that the Colonial Secretary had in May, 1843, entered into an arrangement with the company on certain conditions, and had afterwards given a set of secret instructions to Captain Fitzroy at variance with them. To show that this originated in misunderstanding, he quoted copiously from the correspondence between the company and the Colonial-office. The instructions given to Captain Fitzroy respecting the settling of the Company's titles to land had been misunderstood by him; he had supposed that it was necessary the company should prove the validity of their purchases. On this point he was set right, by being referred back to his instructions as his guide. This was the cause of the misunderstanding which had arisen; another was caused by the fact that the letter of instruction to Captain Fitzroy had been prepared while the negotiations between the Colonial-office and the company were in an incomplete state, and when, consequently, they could not be recognised. So far from there being any wish to keep back the correspondence, it had been voluntarily tendered to the company, which, a month after it had been in its possession, expressed, through Mr. Somes, their reliance on the justice and spirit of Lord Stanley.—Mr. C. BULLER apologised for some warm expressions he had used on a previous occasion, relative to Captain Fitzroy, and moved, as an amendment to the motion, for the production of all the correspondence which had passed between Lord Stanley and the New Zealand Company. After a long debate, the papers as amended were ordered, without a division.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL obtained leave to bring in a bill for the protection of property contained in public museums, galleries, cabinets, libraries, and other public repositories, from malicious injury.

The Sugar Duties Bill was read a third time and passed.

ATMOSPHERIC SYSTEM ON RAILWAYS.—On the motion of Mr. SHAW, the undermentioned gentlemen were nominated a select committee to inquire into the merits of the atmospheric system of railway:—Mr. Shaw, Mr. Bingham Baring, Lord Harry Vane, Sir George Clerk, Mr. Francis Baring, Viscount Mahon, Sir C. Lemon, Mr. Hawes, Viscount Howick, Mr. H. Hinde, Mr. Morrison, Mr. Pakington, Mr. Gibson Craig, Mr. Lascelles, and Mr. Wyse.

The house did not adjourn till nearly two o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

There was a morning sitting to-day, at which the Railway Clauses Consolidation Bill, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Bill were read a third time and passed. A general feeling was manifested against morning sittings, and Lord G. SOMERSET intimated that there would be no occasion for them after Easter.

DARTMOUTH ELECTION.—Mr. PAKINGTON, as chairman of the Dartmouth Election Committee, brought up the report of the committee, announcing that they had come to a resolution declaring that Joseph Somes, Esq., was duly elected to serve in Parliament as representative for the borough of Dartmouth.

THE UNITED STATES AND SLAVERY.—In answer to some questions from Mr. Aldam, upon the subject of the Message of Mr. Tyler relative to slavery, Sir ROBERT PEEL expressed his regret that the President of the United States should have made the treatment of slaves captured by British cruisers the subject of specific reference in a message to Congress. If the President would appoint a commission to inquire, he would be met by every disposition on the part of this country to afford information. The message asserted that the captured negroes were subjected to a term of apprenticeship for ten years. This was a mistake, arising out of the treaty with Spain in 1835, which contained provisions by which the captured negro was placed on the same footing as that of an apprentice in the West Indies. Since the system of apprenticeship had ceased, the negro, on being landed in the West Indies, was placed on the same level with the free coloured population. As the Brazils had refused to assent to the request of this country—that negroes taken in Brazilian slave ships by our cruisers should be placed in a free condition—we were obliged—rather than allow them to be enslaved—to land them in the West Indies. It was also alleged in the President's message that British capital and British subjects were employed in the slave trade. That was a serious charge, and he feared it was true, but he hoped that the law would be able to reach the guilty parties.

THE LONG RANGE.—Lord INGESTRE read a letter from Captain Warner in which he said that he had no wish to undergo the ordeal of another inquiry, not expecting any favourable result from it. But he was ready to abide by his challenge of last autumn, to undertake to blow up, at his own expense, a line-of battle-ship, at a distance of five miles, restricting the witnesses of the details of the experiment to certain official individuals, including the Prime Minister and the Commander-in-Chief.—Sir R. PEEL replied that since the last discussion on this matter not a week had elapsed in which he had not received letters from parties offering to discover the means of destroying a vessel of war in a better manner, and more effectually than by Captain Warner, on condition, in some instances, of a reward of £100,000, and in others of £200,000, and in others even larger sums. (Laughter.) He feared if any encouragement was given, that multitudes of people would be devoting their attention to the discovery of the means of more effectually destroying their fellow-creatures. All that he could say was, that if the author of any one of these projects could show a proof of his possessing the means of destruction to a great extent at a distance of five miles, he (Sir R. Peel) would recommend him to make a private communication on the subject to the Board of Ordnance, and he did not despair of leave being given to make a trial.

NEW ZEALAND.—Mr. C. BULLER gave notice that he would, immediately after Easter, call the attention of the house to the general question of the government of New Zealand.

THE TARIFF.—The house having resolved into Committee on the Customs Acts, Mr. BRAMSTON moved that the article "grease" should be omitted from the list of remissions of duty.—Sir G. CLERK, by way of destroying the idea that grease could be introduced as butter, and sold to the poor, said the Customs' officers could mix it with tar. This statement was received with laughter and cheers; and Mr. WARD remarked that it was needless for Sir G. Clerk to take such pains to prove that the poor could get nothing by the remission.—Mr. Bramston's proposal was negatived.—Mr. Sergt. MURPHY endeavoured to procure the omission of "tanned hides" from the reduction, but was unsuccessful on a division, and the item remains in the schedule.—Mr. GROGAN moved the omission of "lard."—This proposal led to a discussion of rather a personal character upon agricultural topics.—Colonel WYNDHAM, in allusion to the Agricultural Protection Society, said that a certain lord duke pulled the strings, and moved all the "little goes." Like Polyphemus, the agriculturists had but one eye, and could see nothing but a turnip field. He begged them to take a larger view of the interests of the country.—Mr. S. O'BRIEN defended that society.—Mr. GROGAN ultimately withdrew his amendment.—Considerable discussion arose on the proposal for the repeal of the duty on thrown silk, and a division ensued, but the repeal of the duty was carried by a majority of 85 to 26.—The remaining resolutions were then agreed to, upon the understanding that after Easter a day should be appointed upon which the house should again go into committee upon the Customs' Acts, in order to allow certain motions for the repeal of the duties on butter, cheese, tallow, pine logs, &c., to be discussed. It was further understood, that if any of those motions should be carried, they should be introduced into the bill.—The resolutions were then agreed to, and a bill founded upon them ordered to be brought in.

The house did not adjourn till past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE EASTER RECESS.—On the motion of Sir R. PEEL, it was agreed that the house, at its rising, should adjourn to Monday, the 31st instant.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS.—The following notices of motions were given:—Mr. T. S. DUNCOMBE, that, on the 8th of April, he should move for leave to bring in a bill for securing the safe conveyance of letters through the General Post-Office. (Hear.)—Mr. WYSE, that on Thursday, the 3rd of April, he should move for extracts of charters granted to the Dublin University, which had the effect of excluding Roman Catholics and Dissenters from that University.—Sir R. PEEL, that on Thursday, the 3rd of April, he should bring forward a motion relating to an increased grant to the College of Maynooth. (Hear.)—Mr. WARD, that on the same day he should submit a motion to the house relating to the burdens on land. (Hear.)—Mr. BARCLAY, that, on the 11th of April, he should move for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the Insolvent Act of last session, and to promote the recovery of small debts.—Mr. VILLIERS, that, on an early day after Easter, he should move for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the influence of the price of provisions on the interest of farmers and farmers' labourers.—Mr. WARD, that, when the increased grant for the College of Maynooth was proposed, he should move that the additional grant be paid out of the funds belonging to the Protestant Established Church in Ireland.

RAILWAYS.—Mr. MORISON moved some resolutions, to the effect that it was the duty of Parliament to ensure the best, safest, and cheapest mode of communication by railway. That in future railway bills means should be adopted to limit the amount of tolls, and that, for this purpose, every committee on a railway bill introduced this session shoud report the lowest fees and charges which they thought consistent, and that every committee should compel promoters of railways to put in statements of proposed rates of charge for passengers and goods, and the amount of accommodation they intend to provide for the public. The hon. member at considerable length entreated the house to give its attention to the resolutions he had proposed, for it could not be denied that the subject of railroads had become a national question. It was the all-engrossing question of the day.—The motion was withdrawn, and the house adjourned at an early hour till Monday, the 31st instant.

THE DARTMOUTH ELECTION COMMITTEE.

This committee sat several days to hear evidence in support of the petition against Mr. Somes. On Wednesday the proceedings closed.

The Chairman said the committee had given the greatest attention both to the law and facts of this important case, and after due deliberation they had come to the following resolution:—"Resolved—That at the time of the last election for the borough of Dartmouth, Joseph Somes, Esq, was not disqualified to sit in Parliament by reason of being engaged in any contracts within the meaning of the Act of 22 George III., cap. 43."

The committee then came to the usual resolution, that Joseph Somes, Esq., was duly elected a burgess to serve in the present Parliament for the borough of Dartmouth.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

RETURN OF THE COURT TO WINDSOR.—The Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Royal Family, and attended by their respective suites, arrived at Windsor Castle, from the Slough station, at four o'clock, on Wednesday afternoon, in three of the Royal carriages and four, escorted by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards, commanded by Lieutenant Bastard. The bells of the church of St. John rang merry peals during the afternoon, in honour of the return of her Majesty to Windsor. The journey from Paddington to Slough was performed in exactly thirty minutes. Her Majesty appeared to be in excellent health.

WINDSOR.—THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, after visiting the Royal aviary, in the Home Park, this morning, drove her Majesty and the Princess Royal in a pony phaeton, in the Great Park. His Royal Highness afterwards rode out on horseback, attended by Major-General Sir Edward Bowater. This afternoon, immediately after luncheon, her Majesty, attended by the Viscountess Canning, Lady in Waiting, took an airing in a pony phaeton and pair, proceeding through the Long Walk, and returning to the Castle, along the King's Road, at four o'clock. Colonel the Hon. Charles Grey was in attendance upon the Queen on horseback. The Royal dinner circle, this evening, will include her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and Lady Anna Maria Dawson, who arrived at Frogmore House yesterday afternoon, and resumed her duties as the Lady in Waiting on the Royal Duchess. Divine service will be performed to-morrow in the Queen's Private Chapel, before her Majesty and Prince Albert and the Members of the Royal Household, by the Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courteney, the Queen's Domestic Chaplain. Capt. Meynell is performing the duties of Master of the Household until the arrival of Col. Bowles from Ireland, who is expected to enter upon his new appointment in about a fortnight.

PRINCE GEORGE OF CAMBRIDGE.—Wednesday next is the birthday of his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, who will then complete his twenty-sixth year.

PRINCE GEORGE OF CUMBERLAND.—A letter from Hanover, of the 9th, informs us that the last malady in the eyes of the Prince Royal of Hanover has been attended with a crisis which inspires the oculists with a hope that they may now perform an operation which may have for result his restoration to sight.

ALMACK'S.—These aristocratic réunions, it is said, will commence on the 9th of the ensuing month. The orchestra, similar to last season, will be under the direction of Tolbecque.

LORD BROUGHAM AND THE DUKE DE BROGLIE.—Lord Brougham had the honour of entertaining the Duc de Broglie at dinner on Tuesday evening, at his mansion in Dover street. His Excellency the French Ambassador, the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Bessborough, Lord and Lady Ashburton, Lady Dufferin, Dr. Lushington, Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, Mr. Luttrell, and Mr. and Mrs. Ord were among his lordship's guests on the occasion.

THE RIBBON OF ST PATRICK.—The Earl of Clare is to have the vacant Ribbon of St. Patrick.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A BRIGHTON MAGISTRATE.—Mr. Strode, one of the Brighton Magistrates, sat on the bench at Brighton on Tuesday morning, and on leaving it he complained of being unwell. In the afternoon his illness increased, and in the evening medical aid was called in. He continued in a distressing state till eleven o'clock at night, when he expired.

DEATH OF JOHN KENNEDY, ESQ.—John Kennedy, Esq., her Majesty's Secretary of Legation to the United States of America, who previously held the same appointment at the Court of Naples, died a few days ago at Brighton. The deceased sunk under a virulent attack of small pox. He was nephew to the Marquis of Ailsa, and has left four sons.

MORE CANDIDATES THAN ELECTORS.—The Boston Herald says, that for the vacant office of Poor-law auditor in that district there are fifty-three candidates and only forty electors.

LAUNCH OF A POLKA SHIP AT SUNDERLAND.—A new ship, of two hundred tons burthen, named "Polka," was a few days ago launched from the north side of the Wear, at Sunderland. The launch was of a remarkable character, the vessel being precipitated from a height of one hundred feet above the level of the river, and having to go between two houses, in its course to the water. The vessel, which for elegance of construction cannot be excelled, and which is well adapted to skim over the surface of the water, is adorned with a neat figure head, representing a lady dressed in character. This launch created more attention than any one almost ever remembered, and upwards of twenty thousand persons assembled on both sides of the river to witness the nautical evolutions of the Polka.

FIRE AT NOTTINGHAM LUNATIC ASYLUM.—A fire, which at first created some alarm, broke out on Monday morning, in the laundry of the Nottingham Lunatic Asylum, which is an immense building, occupying a very prominent position in the outskirts of the town. The laundry was detached from the asylum, and was built about four years since in the most complete manner. It was sixty-one feet long, by twenty-four feet, and contained twenty-four long windows. The fire was discovered early in the morning, and before the engines from Nottingham could arrive, the laundry was nearly destroyed. The flames were, however, prevented from extending either to the adjoining wash-houses or to any part of the asylum. The damage is estimated at several hundred pounds. It is stated that a laundry maid had gone into the laundry about twenty minutes past eight, and found that some chips which she had laid over the steam pipes to dry had ignited and extended to the boarded floor.

INFRINGEMENT OF THE CHIMNEY SWEEPERS' ACT.—A gross infringement of the act took place in Leamington Priors a few days since, and the offending party was adjudged by the local magistrates to pay fines to the amount of £13. The informations were laid by the chief officer of police (Mr. Roby), on the prosecution of Edwin Woodhouse, Esq. It appears that the defendant, a master chimney-sweeper of the Spa, attended, with three of his boys, all under the age of 21, to cleanse some flues at the Royal Baths. A flag-stone was accordingly taken up in the flooring of the boiler-house for that purpose, on which two of the boys were introduced into a horizontal tunnel below, 18 feet in length, where they placed themselves in a recumbent position to collect the soot falling from a long chimney. The other lad, notwithstanding a previous caution had been given by the Superintendent of the Baths of the heated state of the ascending and adjoining flue, was instructed by his master to enter a circular hole; that flue extends round the boiler at least 30 feet, and is in width 20 inches square. Whilst thus engaged the lad put the handle of his brush through the eye-hole, on which the defendant, who was standing by, exclaimed, "See how the little devil pokes his brush through." Presently after a slight groaning was heard from this point, and the other boys at work in the horizontal tunnel were sent by their master after their companion, one up the ascending flue and the other through the mouth of the boiler, to extricate him. In order to effect which it was found necessary to remove a portion of the brick-work between the eye-hole and the furnace mouth, through which the poor lad, who is about 13 years of age, was dragged in a senseless state. The medical testimony of Dr. Lietch went to prove that for some days the boy's life was in danger, and that he was still suffering from burns on various parts of his body. It is worthy of observation, that the horizontal flue might have been thoroughly cleansed by machinery (of which some was on the spot) on opening a trap-door. The injured lad was a grandson of the defendant—[The above is from a correspondent. We may add our belief that the Act is frequently evaded or infringed in the metropolis.]

CALAMITOUS ACCIDENT AT EXETER.—A very serious accident took place at Exeter on Monday last. The committee of the Female Penitentiary, Holloway-street, assembled to transact the usual business, and several tradesmen were in attendance to receive orders. At these times it is customary for the inmates to retire into an apartment provided for the purpose, so as not to see or communicate with any of the male sex. In the midst of the deliberations of the committee they were all at once alarmed by the most awful and heart-rending screams. On following the direction whence they came, they arrived at the door of the room above alluded to, when a frightful scene presented itself. It was at once evident that the floor of the apartment had given way, and the occupants, twenty-one in number, had been precipitated into a tank of water, which extended underneath to the size of the floor, and was at the time at least ten feet deep. In this awful well were the unfortunate beings struggling for life, and it was only by the promptest aid that sixteen could be extricated from their perilous position. The remaining five were soon after taken out, but life was extinct.

DEATH OF A CONVICT'S WIFE.—The unhappy woman, the wife of William Howell, who was lately executed in Ipswich, expired last week at Hulver. Report states that she died of a broken heart.

SUPPOSED MURDER IN DERBYSHIRE.—On Thursday morning week the village of Whittington, two miles from Chesterfield, was the scene of great excitement, in consequence of the rumour that a Mrs. Green, who resides there, had either been murdered, or had committed suicide. It appears that shortly before the hour named, she had been seen by several neighbours to enter the gate of her own premises, leading one of her grandchildren by the one hand, and holding the other hand to her throat. One of the neighbours going to the place, she found Mrs. Green reclining upon a stone in the yard, and bleeding profusely from a frightful wound in the throat. She was unable to speak. The œsophagus and the jugular vein were partially severed, and the carotid artery was laid bare, although not cut. A razor, marked with blood was found lying on the hearth; the deceased appeared to have been cleaning the hearthstone. It is stated that she was seen to run out of her house, holding her hands to her throat, and to go to the door of the Cock and Magpie public house, and then to another neighbouring house, but, it appears that she failed to make any person hear her. She died before medical assistance arrived. Her house adjoins that of her son-in-law, Joseph Hawksley, and it is stated that he was the only person about the premises beside the deceased at the time; Mrs. Hawksley having gone out shortly before, and a boy, aged six years, named Green, a grandson of the deceased, who was staying with her, having been sent away from her house the same morning. The farm belonged to the deceased Mrs. Green, of whom Hawksley holds it as tenant. Many disputes have arisen between Mrs. Green and her son-in-law of late, and it is not long since they appeared before the magistrates, on which occasion Mrs. Green applied for Hawksley to be bound over to keep the peace. Deceased was in good health and spirits at eleven on Wednesday night; previous to which hour Hawksley attempted to force his way into her house, but was prevented by Sydney Green, her son. Hawksley states, that on Thursday morning he was working in one of the fields, when he heard a scream; he immediately went towards the house, thinking that some of his children had set their clothes on fire. As he approached he saw his mother-in-law run out of her house, holding her hands to her throat. In going to his own door he met her, and immediately sent a boy for assistance. The statement of one of the children is very different to this. An inquest has been commenced, but was adjourned.

IRELAND.

ARRIVAL OF THE NEW SECRETARY AT DUBLIN.—Sir Thomas Fremantle arrived at Dublin Castle on Sunday by her Majesty's mail steamer from Liverpool. Sir Thomas's present stay in Ireland will, it is expected, be limited to the termination of the Easter holidays; after which he returns to London to attend to the details of the Irish measures to be submitted to Parliament after the recess.

PROPOSED BANQUET TO O'CONNELL AT KILKENNY.—A letter from Dublin, dated March 18, says that the most active preparations are in progress for rendering the Kilkenny banquet to Mr. O'Connell, on Tuesday next, as attractive as possible. Among the parties invited are the Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, Lord French, the several Repeal Members of Parliament at present in Ireland, and all the Repeal Martyrs. Twenty members of the newly-established '82 Club intend being present, and, their "fashioners" permitting, they purpose sporting the "new uniform" on this occasion. Even the great Repeal Leader himself will appear, for the first time, attired as one of "the Revived Volunteers" of 1845.

A CHILD MURDERED BY ITS FATHER.—At Tullamore, on Monday, Henry Chawner, blacksmith, was indicted for the murder of his own child. It appeared in evidence that the prisoner was married to a woman of bad character, who deserted him, leaving with him two female children, one six and the other seven years old. This last was the one that he murdered. The body was found on the 26th of August last, near Ferbane. It appeared to have been five or six weeks dead. The chief witness against the prisoner was the surviving child, who gave the following testimony:—I had a sister called Mary Anne. She is dead. My father threw her into a bog-hole. I was present. He put a large sod upon her head in the water. He took off his shoes and stockings and went into the water. My father told me not to tell what he did with Mary Anne, or he would be transported. He ran away and I ran after him. He left me at my aunt's door all night. We hid in a ditch in a corn-field until it was dark. I did not see him again until I saw him in Maryborough Gaol. The witness identified the clothes of her sister—an incident which created great sensation in court. She was cross-examined by Mr. Gorman, but did not deviate in any material point from her direct testimony. The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." The wretched culprit was then sentenced to be hanged on the 14th of April next.

GREAT TEXAS MEETING, AT NEW YORK.

GREAT TEXAS MEETING AT NEW YORK.

Another of these Demonstrations in favour of "Annexation," and termed in the news just received from the United States, "a Tremendous Gathering of the New York Democracy," took place in the Park, on Saturday, the 22nd February. The vast assemblage was extremely enthusiastic and orderly. "It was, in fact," says the Daily Plebeian, "the best practical demonstration of the popular enthusiasm in favour of Annexation that we have ever witnessed. It proves the strength of this question in this city. No other question was allowed to be mixed up with it, not even the great questions of the Tariff and Post-office reform. If the object had been to make a demonstration of numbers merely, the call would have embraced the very popular question of reform in our Post-office laws, and thus both parties would have attended. But it was purely and essentially an Annexation meeting. Every countenance at the meeting bespoke an earnestness and a zeal in behalf of this great American measure."

Samuel Osgood having nominated for President Preserved Fish; and the vice-presidents and secretaries being nominated, a string of spirited resolutions were passed, the reading of which was frequently interrupted by loud cheering.

One of these resolutions terminates as follows:—"We rejoice that the majority of the House have evinced a judgment which knows, and a respect which obeys, the will of the people, clearly and emphatically expressed in the election of James K. Polk, to be in favour of the Immediate Annexation of Texas."

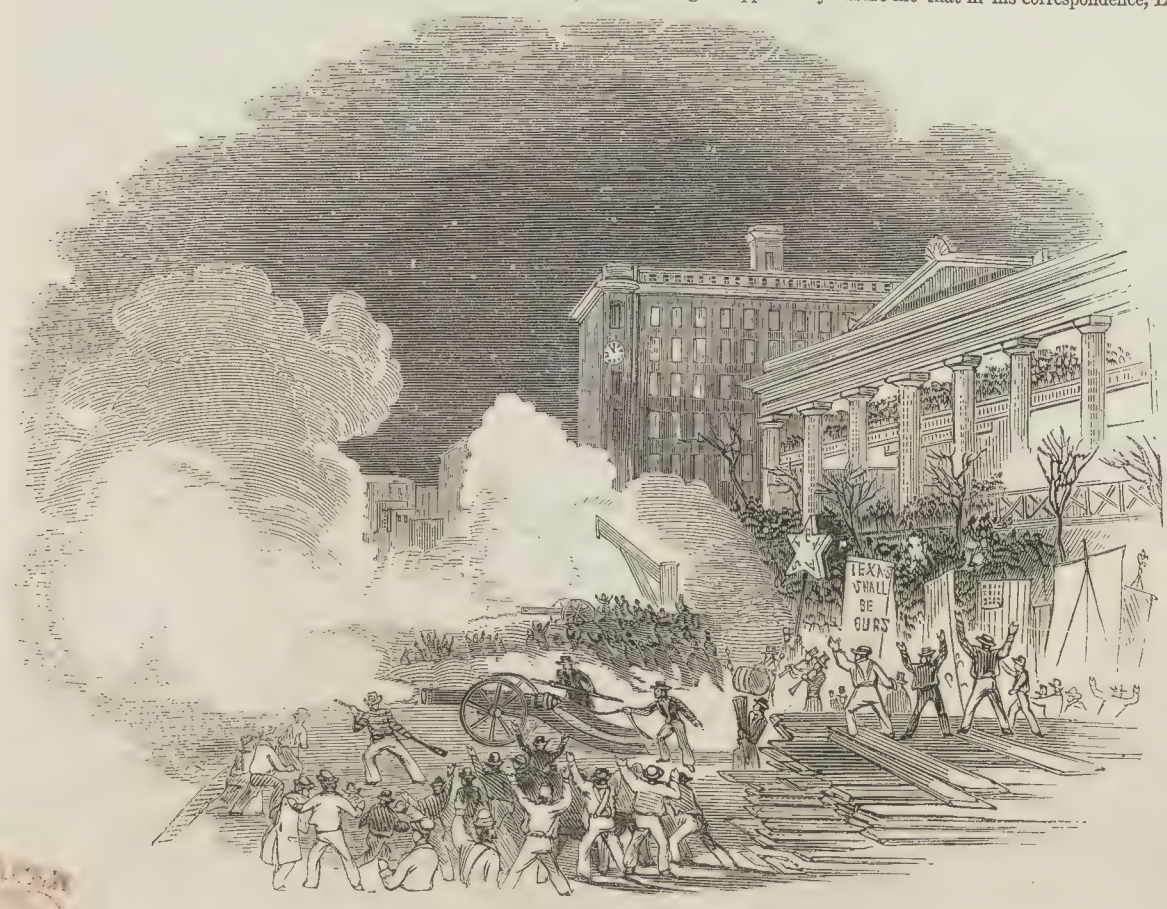
The meeting was then addressed by the Hon. R. Morris, the Hon. J. S. Bosworth, and Mr. Shepherd; and, in the course of their addresses, the speakers indignantly condemned the interference of "the British Press, and the British Ministry."

A motion to adjourn was then put and carried, and the assembled thousands quietly proceeded to their respective homes, after having exhibited a degree of enthusiasm characteristic of the New York Democracy.

Our Engraving is sketched from the noble portico of the City Hall: the evening was rainy and foggy; but the zeal of the actors on the hustings was unabated.

GREAT TEXAS DEMONSTRATION IN JERSEY CITY.

Among the advices received from New York, by the Hibernia, on Monday last, the Texan intelligence is very interesting. The excitement in favour of Annexation continues to increase.



Congress adjourned on the 3rd, after having refused a petition from Brazoria against Annexation, by a vote of 28 to 19, although they had received numerous petitions in favour of Annexation from other parts of the country. The Senate also rejected the nomination of General Terrell as Chargé d'Affaires to England and France, and of Colonel Relly as Chargé to the United States. It is said that the chief cause of opposition to these gentlemen was owing to their hostility to Annexation.

The Nashville Union publishes Texan information, professing to be communicated by Major Donelson, United States Chargé to Texas, representing that not only the President, but the mass of the citizens, are favourable to annexing their country to the United States.

A correspondent of the Mobile Register writes from Galveston, under date of the 8th instant, as follows:—

"The Texan Minister to England (Ashbel Smith) has returned since the Texan Congress adjourned, and I have reason to believe, from what I consider reliable authority, that he bears a general pledge from the British Government for the independence of Texas, against Mexico, without any condition relating to slavery, commmercial advantages, or any other stipulation than the rejection of union with the United States. Texans of good opportunity assure me that in his correspondence, Lord Aberdeen takes occasion expressly to withdraw the expressions with regard to slavery in Texas, which he addressed to the American Secretary of State through Mr. Pakenham, and which roused the resentment of Mr. Calhoun. It seems undeniable that Great Britain stands ready to make any concession, and extend any aid which Texas may need to ask to prevent Annexation."

Our artist has sketched one of these imposing Demonstrations in Jersey City, on Monday evening, 24th February, where, at the instigation of the Polk and Dallas Club, one hundred guns were fired in favour of immediate Annexation of Texas, amid the cheers of a considerable concourse of persons assembled on the occasion. Two or three brief addresses were delivered, and everything went off to the utmost satisfaction of the parties concerned. It seems that his Honour the Mayor prohibited the firing at New York.

TEXAS DEMONSTRATION, JERSEY CITY.

TO THE POET.

(From a Correspondent.)

They are gone to the skies,—they abandon the earth;
To the seraphs, their kindred, our minstrels are flown,
And have left to the land that is proud of their birth,
One ray of their brightness—one Poet alone.

There are many whose numbers are graceful and fair,
Whose thoughts are harmonious, whose melodies please
And some as they listen, can idly compare
With the jewels of old, simple sparkles like these.

But let the great Master once waken the lay—
Once rouse from the sleep that has held him too long,
And as from the sun-burst the clouds troop away,
They will all be o'erwhelmed in his torrent of song.

One lay of his country—all passion and tears,
One wail of her grief, or despair, or disdain,
Is worth all the efforts, the study of years—
Oh, when shall we hear them and hail him again?

Bid the minstrel awaken, and charm us as when
We knew from his verse what the spells were of yore;
The harp is his book, and its chords are his pen—
What darkness enshrouds thee?—return to us, MOORE!

RESTORATION OF LOUTH CHURCH AND SPIRE.

This fine structure, which, for symmetry and beauty, has been pronounced by persons of taste and judgment to be one of the best specimens of its character and style in the kingdom, having been found seriously injured by lightning, and former injudicious alterations, two skilful and experienced architects have been called in to inspect it, and both have pronounced the spire (288 feet in height) to be in a very dangerous state. The clear and full report of Mr. Cottingham, the architect employed (who is well known for his judicious reparation of Armagh and Hereford Cathedrals, the Abbey of St. Alban's, and the celebrated Norman tower of Bury St. Edmund's), pointed out a fissure or rent, extending nearly from the top to the bottom, in some places wide enough to admit a man's arm; and so imminent appeared to be the danger, from any extraordinary vibration upon it, that the richly-toned peal of bells had not been suffered to be raised for above a twelvemonth. Under these circumstances, the parish, by a moderate rate and liberal voluntary contributions, have agreed to meet the expense, under the hope that the entire restoration of so beautiful a specimen of British Ecclesiastical Architecture will be regarded as an object of curiosity and even of national interest. The repairs have proceeded most auspiciously, the spire being finished; and the repairs of the tower are now progressing, with the same care and skill.

The entire height of the spire from the ground, is now 295 feet, instead of 288, the new finial making the addition of 7 feet to the spire. Its figure, like that of the spire, is octangular; its true base is only 14 inches in diameter, but the base-moulding just above, projects 5 inches, and is in circumference 6 feet 2 inches. Above this, are 8 crockets in two rows, on alternate angles; the first row projecting 8½ inches, and the upper row 6½ inches from the sides; above these, is a bulbous termination, 4 feet 2 inches in circumference, crowned by a diminishing calyx or cup (through which, as also through the whole finial, and down the spire, for about 22 feet, is an aperture 3 inches square) filled to receive the rod of the weathercock, which instrument is extended in thickness at the aperture equal to the diameter of the cup, so as to form a neck; the whole presenting the appearance of a continued but exceedingly attenuated portion of the spire, making it most aptly to correspond in gracefulness of form, with the beautiful structure on which it rests. The beautiful cross and weathercock, of which we have received the above sketch, as also the view made by Mr. Brown, of Louth, stands in height above the finial 6 ft. 4 in., the cross being 3 ft. broad and in height a little more: the weather-cock is 2 ft. 2 in. broad, and 2 ft. high from his talons to the top of his crest. The whole is made of copper, gilt, and will probably continue to reflect the rays of Sol to the eyes of future generations, who, like the present, shall gaze on Louth spire, and admire the exquisite symmetry of so beautiful a specimen of British ecclesiastical architecture. The immense scaffolding is now removed from the spire, and is about to be placed round the tower, which, when the weather shall permit, will be repaired; the workmen in the interim being busy cutting and carving a vast quantity of stone in the west end of the church for that purpose.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

ST. AUSTELL'S WELL.

Among the "Nooks and Corners" of Old England, the holy wells dedicated to saints, or set apart for charitable or religious uses, hold a memorable place. Those which mark the course of pilgrim roads, are the best known, but those attached to ancient conventual establishments, or the cells of the recluse, have been but little heeded. They are, nevertheless, the most beautiful and interesting of their kind. The one we have engraved is dedicated to St. Austell, a holy father of much repute in the west country. It was originally attached to an ancient free chapel, subject to the priory of Tywardneth; now it is a ruin, and made to serve the domestic uses of the farm of Menacuddle.

ST. AUSTELL'S WELL.

St. Austell is a market-town, in the Deanery of Pawden, 34 miles from Launceston, and 257 from London. It is a large and populous place, and derives its importance from the neighbourhood of the celebrated Polgooth mines, and the stone-quarries of Port Towan and Pentuan.

A Literary Character from China.—A Chinese "man of letters' has, during the last few days, been inspecting the public establishments in Liverpool. He is a well-made man, very stout (the standard of beauty in China), has fine features of the Tartar cast, and being arrayed in his native habiliments, he is a considerable object of curiosity to all classes. Possessing, unfortunately, very little English, he is approachable only through an interpreter, though to him this seems a slight defect, his natural taciturnity or want of appreciation, prompting him to make few or no remarks. He is from an inland province, and being one of the literati, possesses, according to the constitution of society, considerable rank in his own country. He returns to China in a few weeks.

A letter from Athens, dated Feb. 26, gives a very unfavourable account of the position of the Greek Ministry. It says, M. Coletti's Government has been placed in a minority on the first proposal it brought forward. The ministerial project was, that the formation of the jury lists should be vested in the government instead of in the municipalities.

THE SHIP "LORD ASHBURTON" ON FIRE, CHARLESTON.

BURNING OF THE SHIP "LORD ASHBURTON."

This catastrophe (sketched by an artist of Charleston, for our journal) took place on the 20th ult.; when, at about half-past 1 o'clock, a fire was discovered in the after part of the lower hold of this fine vessel, immediately under the cabin: she lay at the head of Maywood's North Wharf, Charleston, nearly ready for sea, and had about 2,600 bales of cotton on board, about 500 of which were "Sea Islands." Every possible exertion was made to extinguish the fire (the fire companies being, as usual, promptly on the spot) up to 5 o'clock, when, by order of the Mayor, the ship was towed across the river, by a steamer, and grounded on the marsh, opposite the city, and then scuttled.

Two of the fire-engines, the Palmetto and Marion, left the city with the ship, having been placed on board the steamer Charleston. The steamer Beaufort District, and sloop Saul Martin, were also alongside of the Lord Ashburton, for the purpose of rendering any assistance—such as saving part of the cargo, &c.

The fire was at length extinguished, and most of the cargo saved; though a considerable portion, from the great quantity of water thrown into the ship, was in a damaged state. The deck around and in the vicinity of the fire is greatly cut up, and the cabin mostly destroyed.

Feb. 22.—The fire among the cotton has been extinguished; but little, if any, of the Sea Island cotton has been damaged, as it is stowed between decks.

TURKEY.

Letters from Constantinople to the 26th ult., inform us that on the previous day a hatti-sheriffe was promulgated by the Government, which may be considered as a corollary to the celebrated one read a few weeks ago in the Grand Council by the Sultan himself, and in which he roundly rated his Ministers for their gross negligence of improvement in the Government and education of the people throughout his dominions. The Ministers assert their anxiety to promote the improvement of the condition of the people, and in order to obtain the necessary information as to what is to be done, they purpose to summon two deputies from each town or district—the one a Turk, and the other a Rayah—who shall give evidence as to the condition of the places which they are called upon to represent; and upon a digest of this evidence, a plan will be formed for the improvement of the Government, and for its assimilation with the Government of European States.

Dr. Wolff had arrived at Constantinople, and has written the following short letter, addressed to the Turkish and Christian population of Constantinople:—

"To the Turkish and Christian population of Constantinople.

"Constantinople, Feb. 26, 1845.

"Dear Friends!—Having arrived again in this celebrated city, I cannot leave it again without previously thanking you all for the great interest you expressed during my sojourn among you, and even after my departure in my journey to and stay at Bokhara; which deep sympathy and interest was expressed and manifested towards me by personages of high rank, of every creed and sentiment! I leave Constantinople on the 7th of March, with feelings of gratitude and affection, and praying that God may prosper and bless all of you. "Your affectionate servant, Joseph Wolff."

On the 21st ult. the Sultan had born to him another daughter, who has been named Samiyé Sultan (Princess Sublime). The event was celebrated by the usual ceremonies—salutes and illuminations. On that morning the weather was unusually cold. The thermometer was 17¼ Fahrenheit, with half a foot of snow on the ground. The next day, however, the wind came round to the south-west, and all the snow disappeared immediately, the thermometer running up at once to 50 degrees and upwards.

SLEIGH-RIDING IN NEW YORK, AFTER THE LATE SNOW-STORM.

By intelligence just received from New York, we learn that the weather of the past month was of almost unprecedented severity. In the city of New York, at about three on Tuesday morning, February 4, it began to snow, a strong wind blowing from the north-west. The wind and storm continued unabated throughout the day, and by next morning, in nearly all the streets of New York, the snow had drifted to the depth of five or six feet. A row of 20 brick houses, in Twenty-sixth-street, near Seventh Avenue, was partly blown down; the roofs were torn off, and the storm filling the upper stories with snow, and driving with great fury upon the fresh brickwork, completely demolished the third and fourth stories of the whole line.

There are various tales of "snow-bound" expresses and detained mails, and all the incidents connected with so deep a fall of snow; steam-engines unable to work, and carriages unable to get along. A lively Correspondent remarks, that the climate this winter would entitle us to "the freedom of the city in St. Petersburgh."

After the snow-storm had subsided, the Broadway, at New York, immediately opposite Astor House, presented the animated scene depicted in our Illustration; the roadway being crowded with public and private sledges, filled with passengers.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1845.

THE removal of the duty on Glass has drawn more attention than usual to the kindred question of the duty on Windows. There are so many taxes which those who have to pay them consider objectionable, that if a Government listened to all complaints of this kind, it would soon be left without a revenue altogether. The utmost it can do is to take up the most obnoxious burdens, and make some effort to lighten, if they cannot altogether remove them. The tax on Glass is abolished; and it is not from any unreasonable "asking for more" that we could wish to see the tax on Windows follow it. The first remission, to some extent, seems incomplete without the other. The impost on a material can hardly produce its full benefit while there is another impost on the use of that material. To untax Glass, and keep up the tax on Windows, is saying—you have the freedom of applying the material to what purpose you please, except the one for which it is most required. It is something like Figaro's description of the freedom of the press in Madrid; provided it is not employed for the great purposes that make it valuable, the people may have the full enjoyment of it. The poor man may drink his beer out of cut glass instead of pewter, but he must not open a glazed hole in his garret, for which the same material would be equally useful, for fear the Exchequer should come down on him with a demand for a tax which operates as a prohibition on light and ventilation. Glass may be applied freely to purposes of decoration and luxury, but there is a restriction on its use as an absolute necessity in a climate where (almost half the year being Winter) light and warmth in every dwelling are so essential to health and comfort, and where there are so many thousands of abodes of the poor that do not require the additional hardship of a tax to exclude them.

There is not one of the Assessed Taxes that has been so long paid, with such an amount of grumbling and complaint, as the Window Tax. The feeling has lately been aggravated by the unusual severity with which surcharges on former surveys have been made. But now the duty on Glass is taken off, it will be more difficult than ever to maintain this tax. If the present changes work well, and the finances continue prosperous, we may reasonably anticipate the next time the pruning knife of revision is applied to the different branches of the revenue, that the tax on Windows will follow that on the material of which windows are made.

As we seem to be verging towards the time that will see it extinguished—for it will certainly not form one of the items of many more Budgets—a short glance at its history may not be without interest, and this we are enabled to give from Lord Duncan's very able speech in the House of Commons on Tuesday evening. The next triennial review of our taxation will probably make the duty a thing of the past altogether.

The Window Tax (says the noble lord) dated much further back than the American war. It originated in the days of hearth-money, which was vexatious, not so much on account of the amount of the tax as on account of the mode of collecting it. The act of Charles II., c. 13 and 14, imposed 2s. per hearth; and the statute of William and Mary, c. 10, reciting, "Whereas hearth-money is not only a great oppression to the poorer sort, but a badge of slavery upon the whole people, exposing every man's house to be entered into and searched at pleasure by persons wholly unknown to him," abolished the odious duty of hearth-money, "to erect a lasting monument of their Majesties' goodness." But the prospect of this "lasting monument of goodness" was speedily darkened. Eight years later, in 1696, an act passed imposing a duty of 2s. on all dwelling-houses in the kingdom; 4s. additional on all dwellings with 10 windows; and 8s. additional on all dwellings with 20 windows. In Queen Anne's reign these last duties were raised to 20s. and 30s. In the reign of George II., A.D. 1747, the window duties and the house duties were, by Mr. Pelham, separated into different classes, and 14 different acts passed to regulate them in the 18th century. In 1798 Mr. Pitt trebled the assessed taxes, including the window duties. In 1808 Mr. Perceval added about 30 per cent. to the window duties, and passed the act of the 48th of George III., c. 55, under which the assessed taxes were at present collected. In 1812 an act passed imposing an additional 10 per cent. of window duty. The 4th of George IV. reduced the duty on windows one-half, and in 1825 Mr. Robinson exempted houses with less than seven windows. Then a sliding scale was adopted, under which houses with seven windows were exempted; with eight windows the charge was 18s. 1d., or 2s. 3d. per window; nine windows, £1 3s., or 2s. 6¾d. per window; 10 windows, £1 10s. 9d., or 3s. 0¾d. per window; 11 windows, £1 19s. 10d., or 3s. 7½d. per window; 12 windows, £2 9s. 2d., or 4s. 1¾d. per window. The scale continued to mount by 9s. 4d., and occasionally by 9s. 1d. to the magic number 39, when it reached a maximum of 7s. 8d. per window. A house with 39 windows was charged £14 19s. 3d., or 7s. 8d per window.

The operation of this sliding scale is precisely therefore that which, in proportion as the house is the abode of wealth and magnificence, lightens the burden upon it. It has the same objection of inequality that applied so forcibly to the abolished House Tax. In Lambeth and the lower parts of Westminster, the abodes of poverty and toil, the Window Tax is 16, 22, and even 26 per cent. on the rental; pass on to the gorgeous mansions and club-houses of the West-end, the residences or the resorts of rank, wealth, and luxury, and we find the same tax, compared with the rental, is but 2½ per cent. Is there justice here? He would be a bold Chancellor of the Exchequer who would maintain the affirmative. The only obstacle to removing the tax has been for many years the usual one—the money is wanted and cannot be spared; if we abolish this impost it can only be by finding another that would raise an equal amount. But as the Property Tax has already given an answer to this objection with respect to many items of taxation—as it has provided a certain substitute for many minor inflictions—as it bids fair to become in time, and by careful increase of the per centage, the great master tax, which, like the rod of Aaron, is "to swallow all the rest"— it is to be hoped it will free us from the Window Tax among the number.

A MODIFICATION, if we may so call it, of the practical working of the New Poor-law is about to be carried into effect. The immense size of certain Unions, and the small number of the Guardians, compared with the extent of surface and the amount of population upon them, have given rise to abuses, which, we have often contended, were not so much the fault of the law itself as of the mode in which it was carried into operation. Every reader of the public journals must frequently have had his indignation excited by cases in which persons applying for relief, and that of a kind required on the instant, have been compelled to walk a distance of many miles ere the necessary order could be obtained, and then the same distance back before that order could be acted on. "The distances," said the Emperor Nicholas once—"the distances are the curse of Russia." If this was felt by the possessor of Imperial wealth and power, how much more heavily must the curse of "distances" have fallen on the poor, the destitute, and the perishing! To tell a man in the last stage of want, and the suffering and disease want produces, that he can have relief if he can walk twelve or fifteen miles for it, was a cruel mockery; in a statistical return the man would have been returned as having received "relief," but at what a cost of human misery would never appear. The record of that is left to the coroner's jury, and but for this institution, and the publicity such facts receive through the press, many of the most shocking cases of law-made cruelty and hardship, would have escaped observation. Such "relief" as that administered in some of the cases we refer to, was perhaps an adherence to the letter of the law—though we have strong doubts on the point—but it was a flagrant violation of its spirit; imagine a medical man unable to treat an urgent case of disease, without an order from the relieving officer, living perhaps ten miles off! By the time the order was procured, it was probably no longer needed; the sufferer was beyond all Poor-laws, and the blundering mismanagement connected with them. With smaller Unions, more numerous officers, and a more compact machinery, these abuses could not so readily occur; it is a step towards this desirable improvement which we now greet with considerable satisfaction.

An order of the Poor Law Commissioners, dated the 11th inst., declares the Kensington Union is after the 25th, to be dissolved; the parish of Kensington will, in future, have a Board of Guardians of its own. The Union consisted of Kensington, Paddington, Hammersmith and Fulham; it has been found inconvenient and unwieldy, and is now to be broken up into three Unions, each with a Board of eighteen Guardians, or the same number to each separately that had to manage the affairs of all of them together while they composed the Union. We hope to see the principle acted on here still more extensively applied. The smaller the Union and the more numerous the Guardians, the more intimate is the knowledge of local matters brought to bear in its management, while the facility of obtaining relief in urgent cases is increased. Many of the large and comparatively thinly peopled Unions of the country might be divided into smaller ones with advantage; and, now the process has begun, probably will be so.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE MURDER AT HAMPSTEAD.—A few additional particulars have transpired respecting the murder of Mr. Delarue, which possess some interest. From the statement made by Inspector Gray, of the S division, it appears that on Friday week he received information that a young man, named Thibblewaite, whose father keeps a chandler's shop at Finchley, could give some important information about the murder, he (the inspector) instituted a most diligent inquiry, and after endeavouring, but without success, to meet with the young man alluded to, at length found out his uncle, who for some time past has kept a shop in Yorkshire Grey yard, Hampstead, adjacent to where the body of Delarue was taken. The uncle communicated to the inspector all that he had heard from his nephew, the latter of whom made the following statement:—"On the night of the murder I accompanied the constables towards the field with the stretcher, but I ran forward, and, on arriving at the spot where the body was lying, I saw a man in conversation with Baldock, the officer. I said to the man, 'Is he dead?' and he replied, 'Oh, yes, he is quite dead; I have felt his hand, and he has no pulse.' As soon as the stretcher came up the body was removed, and I, with the constables, proceeded up the field. The young man I have spoken of went with us, and he requested that I would allow him to light his cigar, which I permitted him to do from a lamp of one of the constables, who had asked me to carry it for him. I returned the lamp to the officer, and, leaving the party, turned off to the right; the man went off in another direction, towards the Swiss Cottage." Thibblewaite describes the person to whom reference has been made by him, as being about twenty-three years of age, and wearing either a cloak or a cape; he is quite satisfied he should be able to recognise him if he were to see him again, as a strong light was thrown upon his features by the lamp, when he ignited therewith his cigar. An opportunity will be given to this individual to identify Hocker. A writer in a morning paper suggests that the line of defence which will probably be adopted by Hocker on his trial, for the murder of Delarue, seems pointed out by his conduct and by his anxiety to correct the evidence of the policeman who was left in charge of the body in the field whilst the stretcher was brought. He will, most probably, assert that whilst waiting by the body he and the policeman agreed to plunder it, and that that was the whole extent of his criminality Many of the circumstances would bear out such a defence. First the great improbability that a murderer would revisit the spot so soon afterwards for no apparent object; secondly, the withholding by the policeman of the fact that any one had been with him in the field; and thirdly, the buttoned-up pockets of Delarue; as it would not be likely for the murderer to stop and button the pockets of the man he had killed, whose cries, continuing nearly two minutes, would most probably have been heard. Such a line of defence would also account for the blood on Hocker's clothes, and for the silence he observed on the subject. The presence of the three ill-looking men in different parts of Hampstead, on the day of the murder, who were last seen going towards the place, and have not since been heard of, would also afford some countenance to the statement that Delarue had been murdered by them, as originally supposed, and that, becoming alarmed, they had run away before plundering the body. The fact of the supposed murderous weapon having been discovered before the murder was committed, and the absence of proof that the prisoner had possessed any other weapon calculated to inflict the wounds on the head of Delarue, are also in his favour, so far as negative evidence goes. He would, indeed, have some difficulty in explaining other, though minuter, parts of the evidence against him; but the above line of defence would be supported by several of the circumstances that have been adduced against him. In consequence of the attention that has been drawn by the recent murder at Hampstead to the gloomy path by the side of Bellsize-park, leading to the Haverstock field, it is intended to adopt measures for the removal of the high close wooden fence, which was erected within the last six years by Mr. Wright, the late banker. The path is enclosed between the black wooden fence, seven feet high, on one side, and an old brick wall still higher on the other; it is overhung by trees which obstruct the light, and make the pathway disagreeable as well as gloomy. Since the erection of this high and close fence the path has been less frequented, and the enclosure is the more objectionable, from the circumstance that it was formerly one of the pleasantest parts of the field walks to Hampstead.

THE LATE EXPLOSION AT BLACKWALL.—On Monday the adjourned inquest on the bodies of the four men, Grimes, Chapman, Wright, and Smith, who were killed by the explosion of the steam-boiler on the premises of Messrs. Samuda, brothers, at Blackwall, was resumed at the Town-hall, Poplar. The evidence given on the last occasion was read over. It inculpated Mr. Lowe, the foreman and manager of the works in Messrs. Samuda's factory. An engineer, named Burnand, in their employ, swore that the safety valve was fixed by Mr. Lowe's orders, and its action prevented, and that a few minutes afterwards the awful explosion, which caused so much loss of life and destruction of property, took place. Mr. Farey and Mr. Bell, two scientific gentlemen, who were examined on the last day the Coroner and jury met, were of opinion the boiler exploded from the intense pressure of steam, caused by the fixing of the valve. Mr. Ballantine, the barrister, who again attended on the part of Mr. Samuda, the surviving partner of the firm, stated that the person Lowe had borne a very first-rate character as a careful, attentive man, up to the time of this accident. John Barnes, of Wellington-street, Strand, C.E., said—Mr. Lowe must have seen the weakness of the boiler. I examined the safety valve, and think in many respects the boiler was injudiciously constructed. The principal point I complain of is the complexity of the lever, which tended materially to increase the chances of accidents. But more particularly I complain that the lever for lifting the valve is not constructed as is usual in London, as it allows the valve being lifted, but is so constructed that no action of the lever can hold it down. The valve is self-acting as far as the escape of steam is concerned, but no action upon it can keep it down. I am of opinion, however, that if the valve had had fair play the accident would not have happened; and I therefore think that it must have been fastened down. The effect of the piece of wood with the nail in it would be to fasten down the valve. After several witnesses had been examined at great length, the Coroner said he should not put Mr. Lowe in the witness box, but if he chose to make a make a voluntary statement he might. Mr. Lowe: I do not believe that there were two shovelfuls of fire on during the whole morning. I have called no witnesses after hearing the statement made by Mr. Farey, by Mr. Bell, and by Mr. Barnes. He thought these gentlemen were mistaken in their conclusions. He himself had been an engineer for 25 years. He had never had an accident before, and he had never heard of a boiler bursting from a pressure of steam under similar circumstances. After some discussion, the inquest was adjourned to Thursday. The inquiry was terminated on Thursday in the Town-hall, Poplar. Another victim is added to the number of dead which has attended this dreadful accident, by the decease of William Neale, who died on Wednesday night on board the Dreadnought Hospital. The jury having been re-sworn, went to the dead-house to view the body, after which they proceeded to the London Hospital to take the evidence of Thomas Whitcombe, who was unable to leave his bed. This done, they returned to the Town-hall, Poplar, where the jury, after a consultation of nearly three quarters of an hour, returned a verdict of manslaughter against Lowe. The foreman also stated on the part of the jury, that it was with great regret they saw the insufficiency of the machinery in general on Mr. Samuda's works.

SUDDEN DEATH IN THE STREET.—On Tuesday, Mr Higgs held an inquest at St. James's Workhouse, Poland-street, on the body of George Marshall, aged forty-six, of No. 11, Upper Grosvenor street. The deceased on Sunday last was proceeding along Regent street, in company with his wife, when he fell down on to the pavement. He was carried to a neighbouring surgery, when it was found that life was extinct. Verdict—"Natural death, by the visitation of God."

FIRE IN BERMONDSEY-STREET, SOUTHWARK.—The papers of Wednesday contained an account of a fire on the premises of Mr. Opperness, No. 217, in the above street. It was headed—"Dreadful Fire. Supposed Loss of Life;" and the writer proceeded to express his regret that "there was too much ground to conclude that the fire was attended with fatal results to no fewer than from six to nine human beings." On Thursday, however, the reporter had the happiness of stating that "no lives were lost." For this statement he had much better ground than for his conclusion of the preceding day, the proprietor "having come to the spot and informed the reporter that he and all his family were safe, as they had not been on the premises at the time of the fire." Nevertheless, when the reporter left on the Tuesday night, the "firemen were searching the ruins to see whether they could find any of the missing persons," and in the morning the neighbourhood had been "thrown into a state of excitement." What is termed the official account of this "dreadful fire and supposed loss of life" is as follows:—No. 217, Bermondsey-street, Mr. L. Opperness, cabinet maker and valuer, building destroyed, stock-in-trade and furniture burned; insured in the Sun for the stock-in-trade; building insured in the Guardian; cause of fire very doubtful. No. 216, Mr. Benjamin, clothier and salesman; the second and third floor stairs and side front severely damaged by fire; rest of building and contents injured by water and removal.

STRANGE SUICIDE BY A YOUNG WOMAN.—A jury assembled on Tuesday morning before Mr. C. J. Carter, at the Red Lion Tavern, Woolwich, to inquire into the circumstances of the death of a young woman named Esther Peters, who was found suspended, on Sunday forenoon, from the rails of the bed in which she had slept during the previous night. From the evidence of her father (who resides at Chiselhurst, and is a labourer), he had some words with his daughter, but not of a very angry or serious kind, on the previous Tuesday, in consequence of her remaining out too long. On the following day she left her home and came to Woolwich, where she had at one period been in service. On Wednesday and Thursday nights she slept at the King's Arms, and said she had come to Woolwich to endeavour to obtain a situation. On Saturday evening she applied for a bed at the Red Lion, and next morning, Mrs. Lacy, the landlady of the house, told her servants to go and tell her to get up; when they did so, about half past eleven o'clock, the door was fixed from the inside, and they received no answer to their knockings. When Mr. Lacy came home from church, a ladder was procured, and on the waiter going up he saw her hanging to the rails of the bed. She had taken off the hem of her flannel petticoat and attached it firmly by the two ends, forming a swing-like appearance, into which she had put her head, and turning her body round, had thrown herself off the bed. The jury returned a verdict—"That she committed self destruction by hanging herself, while labouring under temporary derangement."

A Child Scalded to Death.—On Sunday morning a child, eleven months old, the daughter of a labouring man named Balls, living on the Platt, Putney, was scalded in the following shocking manner:—The mother had taken a pot of boiling water off the fire and set it upon the hearth, whilst she left the room for a moment, during which time the child crawled towards the pot, and, before the mother's return, fell headlong into the boiling water. The poor infant was extricated almost immediately, but it was so dreadfully scalded, that the medical gentleman who was called in declared its recovery hopeless. After enduring the most dreadful agony, the infant expired on Monday night.

Suicide by a Lady.—On Saturday evening Mr. Wakley held an inquest in the Marylebone workhouse, on the body of Miss Eliza Chace, aged thirty-seven, a lady who lived at 21, High-street, Camden Town. The deceased, who was in independent circumstances, left her residence at five o'clock on the previous Thursday, having ordered her servant to keep up her fire. She proceeded to the suspension bridge over the ornamental water, Regent's Park. Having deposited her bonnet, cloak, reticule, and boa, on the bridge, she leapt over it into the water. The deceased's brother stated that about thirteen years ago she had been in a private lunatic asylum, and that she was always eccentric in her habits. Verdict—"Insanity."

Conduct of Hocker in Newgate.—Since his committal to Newgate, Hocker has manifested the same indifference which he exhibited before the coroner and at the police court. During the day he takes exercise with the other prisoners, in the yard attached to the wing in which he is confined, and enters freely into conversation with them. A great portion of his time, however, is devoted to reading and writing. He regularly attends the chapel, and pays the greatest deference to the rules and regulations of the prison. The cell in which he is confined is immediately above that of the unfortunate Tapping, on the north-west side of the prison. Since his incarceration he has been visited by his father and mother. To the latter he spoke of his innocence of the crime imputed to him, and said that he had no doubt about proving himself not guilty on his trial. The trial, it is expected, will take place on the 11th of April, the judges on the rota being those who are now on the Home Circuit.

The Condemned Convict, Tapping.—Two petitions have been forwarded to Sir James Graham, praying that her Majesty will be pleased to spare the life of this wretched culprit, now lying in Newgate, awaiting the extreme sentence of the law for the murder of Emma Whiter, at Bethnal-green. One has emanated from a few private individuals, well known for their humane efforts; the other is from the relatives of the unhappy man, who do not pray for a remission of the sentence on the ground of the culprit's innocence of the dreadful crime for which he is doomed to suffer, but in order to spare the feelings of the family, which at present is in a very destitute state. That these petitions will be successful there is not the least hope held out. The conduct of the wretched man since his condemnation has been of a character befitting the awful change which he is about to undergo, and he has continued to pay the most devout attention to the religious endeavours of the Rev. Mr. Davis, the chaplain of Newgate. On being made acquainted that his relatives were exerting themselves by petitioning the Queen for a commutation of his sentence, but that he could not hope for the prayer being successful, he remarked, "That as far as regarded his choice, he would sooner suffer death than be transported for life; for," continued he, "if I am hung, they will know the end of me, and where my remains lie, but if I am sent out of the country, I shall be subjected to the greatest torture, and perish unregretted." Though he has expressed himself in a very favourable manner as to the conduct of the judge, jury, witnesses, &c., on his trial, yet he has not confessed to his guilt.

THE MURDER AT SALT HILL.

The execution of John Tawell, for the murder of Sarah Hart, is expected to take place in front of the County Hall, at Aylesbury, on the morning of Friday, the 28th inst.

The whole of the property possessed by the prisoner was assigned over to trustees for the benefit of his unfortunate wife, for some time previously to the trial; but without any provision having been made for the two children (a boy and a girl), borne to him by the murdered woman, and who are now of the ages of four and five years, the boy, an intelligent little fellow, being the eldest. We hear, however, that Mrs. Tawell kindly intends to contribute something for their future support.

The expenses of the prosecution amount to nearly £400.

The expenses incurred by the prisoner for his defence, including his out lay from the period of his apprehension on the 2d of January, are stated to amount to upwards of £700.

Two female members of the Society of Friends, of highly respectable connections, arrived at Aylesbury, from Devonshire, on the night of his conviction. The culprit having been locked up in his cell before they reached the prison, they called upon him early the next morning, and had a lengthened interview with him in the condemned cell.

The miserable culprit (who has two men constantly watching him by night and day) maintains the same taciturnity which he evinced from the first moment of his apprehension. His appetite has greatly failed him; he is now, however, restricted to the prison allowance, and is attired in the prison dress.

On Sunday he seemed to have improved in health and mind, maintaining his accustomed air of tranquillity or indifference. He did not attend divine service in the chapel, but much of his time is said to have been passed in mental prayer—the devotion peculiar to the society to which he once belonged.

Since the murder of Lord William Russell by his valet, Courvoisier, in 1840, no event of a similar kind has produced so deep a feeling in the public mind as the "Salt Hill murder." The early history of the convict, and the more recent events of his life, throw around the affair an air of romance. Transported upwards of a quarter of a century since for having a forged Bank of England note in his possession, he thus escaped the scaffold for a series of forgeries upon a local bank; the remarkable feature in that extraordinary incident of his life being, that, though the Bank of England note found in his possession when taken into custody on the more serious charge, was a forged one, yet he was guiltless of knowing it to be forged. It was, however, employed as the mode of extricating him from the consequences of the capital offence, for which as the law then stood, and the almost invariable execution of its sentence upon all who were brought within its condemnation, he would doubtless have been hanged. Tawell was, therefore, only too glad to plead guilty to a charge which involved transportation, to escape the gallows. In the land of his banishment his good conduct attracted the favourable notice of the authorities, and eventually obtained from them a ticket of leave, enabling him to pursue any avocation he pleased for his own benefit, and finally emancipation. He had some knowledge of chemistry, and opened a shop as a chemist and druggist in the town of Sydney, combining with the sale of drugs advice as to the mode of using them. His trade increased; and, having "made some money," he embarked it in a series of joint-stock trading speculations of a more extensive description, which also succeeded beyond his hopes. He subsequently purchased some shares in a whaler, and speculated in oil, in all which success crowned his exertions. After residing in Sydney about 15 years, John Tawell left the colony—which he entered as an outcast—a wealthy man. He returned home and to the neighbourhood in which he resided previous to his expatriation. His original offences against society, if not wholly forgotten, were well nigh obliterated from the recollection of those who were acquainted with his early history. Those who were young at the time of his departure from England, saw in John Tawell an intelligent, active, and prosperous man; and knowing nothing which ought to deprive him of their respect, they received him to their circles, and co-operated with him in those benevolent exertions to which he was willing to contribute from his purse, and to aid by his personal exertions. One feature in his character at this season is remarkable; and it seems to have been the clue to, and the ruling desire of his life. Before the forgery on the Uxbridge bank was discovered, Tawell was a member of the Society of Friends. He was, as a necessary consequence of his detection as a forger, expelled from that respectable and strictly moral community. Since his return to England, his efforts to obtain a restoration to the Society have been incessant. He subscribed to their schools, and to those benevolent objects in which the members of that sect are known to take a peculiar interest. He dressed in their distinctive garb; attended regularly their meetings for worship; and in every external circumstance sought to be considered as identified with their body. With the characteristic caution of the members of that far-seeing sect, John Tawell was not permitted to be more than an outward-court worshipper.

By his first wife the wretched man had two sons, both of whom are now dead. The eldest, who was married, practised as a surgeon in London, and after his death his widow was chiefly supported by the charity of Tawell; but it is currently reported that lately he has not been so liberal in his allowance, assigning the same reason as it is supposed he did to the unfortunate victim of his cruelty, Sarah Hart—namely, the embarrassed state of his affairs in Australia.

On the death of Tawell's first wife, he took another decided step to evince his ardent desire to be yet more closely associated with the Society of Friends. He had been introduced to a lady, a member of that community, by whom the mental endowments and moral qualities which constitute the excellences of the female character were possessed in a somewhat extraordinary degree. Mrs. Cutforth was then a widow, having a daughter by her deceased husband of about seven years of age. Mr. Cutforth had been extensively engaged in trade, and was for a considerable time successful. The failure of several firms led eventually to his ruin; and although no imputation rested on his integrity, and no reproach was cast on his management, his health and spirits had sustained a shock from which they never recovered, and he gradually sank into illness, which terminated in death. His widow, aided by friends who knew her in prosperity, and respected her in adversity, opened a school in Northampton-square, St. John-street, for the education of a few young ladies, chiefly members of Quaker families. The success which attended Mrs. Cutforth's exertions for the respectable maintenance of herself and daughter, induced her to enter upon a larger establishment at Berkhampstead, which she was conducting with advantage when Tawell selected her as the object of his attentions, and eventually, against the advice and remonstrances of her best and most judicious friends, obtained her for his wife. They were married at the registrar's office, Berkhampstead, in February, 1841, as the Friends refused to grant permission for the marriage to be celebrated in their meeting-house; and the contracting parties not choosing, for obvious reasons, to have recourse to any other religious body. The immediate consequence of Mrs. Cutforth's marriage to Tawell was, as usual in such cases, a "disowning" of her by a formal act of the "quarterly meeting" of "Friends," the rules of that body not tolerating a union which is not first sanctioned by its members. Although excommunicated, the lady (now Mrs. Tawell) continued to attend meetings, and visited, and was visited in return, by her former friends. The school was given up. Tawell's income was sufficient to maintain an establishment of respectability. They lived in considerable comfort, and in some style. He was active in the parish as a participator in its public business, and as a promoter of objects of benevolence.

All this time, while Tawell was endeavouring to earn back for himself reputation and respect, there was a deeply-seated consciousness that he was in hourly danger of being exposed as a hypocrite and deceiver. During his first wife's illness, which terminated in her death, Sarah Hart, a young woman of some attractions, had been her nurse. This was the poor creature whom Tawell murdered. An allowance of £1 a week seems to have been paid for her maintenance by Tawell. At length, wearied with the charge, or more probably prompted by fears of the effect upon his domestic peace and social position, should a discovery be made of his connection with this woman, he planned and perpetrated her murder. This was detected in a manner so surprising, brought home to him by a body of circumstantial evidence so complete, as to leave no doubt of his guilt, the atrocity of which removes all sympathy for his fate.

A letter from Aylesbury, dated Tuesday, mentions that John Tawell continues in the same state of resignation or obduracy which has marked his conduct throughout. It being impossible to regard him as an innocent man, his behaviour does not operate in his favour; yet the lowness of spirits which evidently oppresses him is so great, and his general bearing is so becoming, that some degree of sympathy is felt for him, and hopes are entertained that he will eventually make confession of the crime for which he is about to forfeit his life.

On Monday he was visited by his wife, his step-daughter, Miss Cutforth, and his brother, Mr. William Tawell, who is said to be a draper in London. Mrs. Tawell had not seen her husband since Sunday week last. This meeting was thought likely to be a most painful one, and the prisoner had been heard to declare that he dreaded it more than death itself. It lasted for near two hours, after which they expressed themselves astonished at the manner in which it had been sustained. They evinced great fondness for one another, and Mrs. Tawell, who mentions him in terms of great affection, does not hesitate to express her firm conviction of her husband's innocence. Her daughter is of a similar opinion. Up to the time of the trial Mrs. Tawell spoke hopefully and cheerfully, and at times confidently of her husband's acquittal. Tawell likewise made remarks, from which it appears that he felt certain of escape. After the meeting in question, Mrs. Tawell said she felt more reconciled to the fate of her husband, but his brother was in a state of distraction at the doom which has overtaken one so closely related to him. All alike speak of his kindness as a parent, his affection as a husband, his amiability as a friend, and his constant benevolence and unbounded charity. It is not generally known that he has a child—a boy, 18 months old, by his present wife.

The condemned cell is a long room, called a "day room," about twenty feet by ten. Along one side are five doors, opening into five cells; in one of these he sleeps, but the door is never locked. He has a fire and candle. He writes incessantly—probably answers to the numerous letters which he receives. Much of his time is spent in prayer, particularly at night.

A convict of the gaol remains with Tawell at his request throughout the day, as a sort of attendant, and to this man he is particularly communicative. He received the visiting magistrates on Wednesday with great composure, and expressed his thankfulness for the consideration shown to him. It was intimated that nobody would be allowed to visit him but those whom he expressed a wish to see, upon which he observed that he desired to see nobody but his wife, and he looked forward to another interview with her. One of the magistrates suggested to him the propriety of foregoing such a scene, and sparing the feelings of his wife in particular, of whom he had so lately taken leave. He, however, persisted in the wish, and hope of again seeing her, meekly alluding to the affectionate terms upon which they lived together.

It is remarkable that the culprit has never once complained of the sentence which was passed upon him. When the hope of escape (which had been very great within him) was suddenly crushed, he observed that "The judge was a just judge, but a stern one." He has once remarked, with remote reference to his sentence, "That he could conscientiously acquit himself of cruelty or treachery to anybody." But he rarely, if ever, adverts to his crime.

He continues to receive numerous letters from all quarters of the country. His time is divided between writing and praying; and he occasionally sees the chaplain, Mr. Cox, but no revelation has yet been made by Tawell. Mrs. Tawell is known to have been aware of the existence of such a person as Sarah Hart, and even of Tawell's having children by her; but she was utterly unconscious of his visiting her, and attributes his last visit to purely humane motives.

A petition to Sir James Graham has been set on foot in the town of Aylesbury, praying that Tawell's sentence of death may be commuted to transportation for life. This petition is grounded upon an objection to the punishment of death, and the prayer is set forth in behalf of all who lie under such a sentence. The petition is signed by a few tradesmen of the town, nearly all of whom are dissenters.

Cabinet Council.—A Cabinet Council was held on Thursday afternoon at the Foreign-office. The Ministers present were, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, Lord Granville Somerset, the Earl of Lincoln, and the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert. The council sat two hours.

Death of Lady Gambier.—We have to record the demise, at an advanced age, of Lady Gambier, wife of the late Lord Gambier, Admiral of the Fleet, which took place at Iver, Bucks.

Artists' Benevolent Fund.—The annual meeting of the subscribers to the above fund was held on Thursday at the Freemason's Tavern, B. B. Cabbell, Esq., in the chair. From the report of the council, it appeared that the Institution continued to receive the support of her Majesty, and that his Royal Highness Prince Albert had presented a donation of fifty guineas. During the year 34 females, the widows of artists, had received the sum of £50, and 27 orphans, £5 each. The total receipts, including the balance remaining from last year, amounted to £1472; and the expenditure, of which £200 had been invested, left a balance with the treasurer of £90. The funded capital now amounted to £19,000. After the adoption of the report, Sir J. E. Swinburne, Bart., F.R.S., was appointed president; and B. B. Cabbell, Esq., F.R.S.; John Curteis, Esq.; G. Dodd, Esq., M.P.; James Dorrington, Esq.; Colonel Sir William Herries, K.C.H.; P. Legh, Esq.; the Rev. J. W. Mackie, F.R.S.; J. Noble, Esq., F.S.A.; J. P. Poyer, Esq.; and R. H. Solly, Esq., F.R.S., members of the committee.

Funeral of Professor Daniell.—On Thursday morning the remains of the much-lamented Professor Daniell, of King's College, were removed from the deceased's residence at Norwood, for interment in the family vault beneath Norwood Church. The funeral, at the special request of the deceased's relatives, was strictly private.

The Portland Vase.—It will be interesting to the antiquary and the lover of art to know that the exertions of Mr. Doubleday, in the restoration of this valuable antique, have been so successful, that it will in the course of a short time again be submitted to public inspection very little blemished by the effects of an injury which at first seemed to be irreparable. Edward Lloyd, the author of the mischief, left London immediately on his discharge, and returned to Dublin, and it is understood to be the intention of the Duke of Portland, to institute proceedings against him for the damage done to his property.

The Weather.—There is, at length, a complete change in the weather. The wind shifted to the west yesterday, and this day (Saturday) there has been a good deal of rain, which is likely to continue, as there will be a change in the moon to-morrow. The winter, it is to be hoped, is at last over. The rain continued in the evening.

Holiday Excursions.—Yesterday morning the Brighton and South-Eastern Railway terminus at London-bridge was literally besieged by the holiday folk, the directors having announced their intention of running at half fares. The first trains took to Brighton nearly 2000 persons, and to Dover about 900. The Greenwich Railway also took great numbers down the first thing in the morning, and at 12 o'clock nearly 1000 people were waiting for the starting of the trains at one o'clock. The Greenwich steamers were exceedingly crowded, owing to the fineness of the weather.

The Easter Fairs.—During the Easter holidays, to commence on Monday, there will be three fairs in the neighbourhood of London—the annual one at Greenwich, another in the tunnel under the Thames, and the third at Stepney. This last will be conducted on a most extensive scale.

Death of Dr. Woodhouse.—Doctor Woodhouse, senior fellow of Gonville and Caius, Cambridge, died on Thursday, at his rooms in that college.

Fire on Clapham Common.—On Thursday afternoon, a fire broke out on a portion of Clapham Common known as Battersea Manor. It originated in one of the plantations of furze, the property of Earl Spencer, and nearly two acres of furze, very thick, and some eight feet high, were consumed.

Tragical Occurrence at Chelsea.—On Wednesday evening, Mary Ann Murray, a servant in the establishment of Mr. Blencoe, 14, Whitehead's-grove, Chelsea, entered the shop of Mr. Saunders, and desired to be shown some articles of haberdashery. Shortly afterwards she was observed to take a roll of ribbon from a box, and secrete it about her person, and as she was preparing to leave the shop the proprietor desired her to walk to the other end of the premises whilst he sent for a policeman. The female did so; but on a sudden rushed down stairs, throwing the roll of ribbon away in her progress, and suddenly seizing a table-knife from the dresser, cut her throat in the most frightful manner. Dr. Warner, of Putney, and Mr. Neale, of Sloane street, immediately attended her, but life was extinct. The unfortunate young woman has been for upwards of three years in Mr. Blencoe's service, and has borne an irreproachable character.

Fire at Liverpool.—On Thursday evening, the Apothecary Company's Warehouse, situate in the rear of the Hall, in Back Colquitte-street, where they carried on the manufacture of several of their drugs, caught fire, and was, in the course of half an hour, one mass of flame from top to bottom. The fire first made its appearance on the third floor, but how it originated is, from the confusion that prevailed, mere conjecture. Happily, the building stood almost alone, but was so closely surrounded by other property, that it required the utmost exertions of the police force to confine the fire to its immediate locality. An immense quantity of water was thrown upon the back of the hall (one of the noblest and most costly buildings in the town), in order to prevent ignition, with excellent effect, although the flames opposite raged in its immediate vicinity. Towards six o'clock the fire began gradually to be subdued, and at the moment of writing (six P.M.) we think no further alarm need be apprehended. The warehouse will, of course, be a total ruin, together with its valuable contents, comprising the machinery used for grinding drugs, drysaltery articles of every description, oils, turpentine, &c., which loss we understand will not be covered under £15,000 to £20,000, upon which little or no insurance has been effected, from the nature of the premises and the works carried on.

The Convict Barber.—Letters have been received from Barber, dated from the Cape of Good Hope, Sep. 22, in which he speaks very confidently of his innocence of the will forgeries, and of his soon being allowed to return. The letter concludes thus:—"I have just received a visit from an inhabitant of the Cape, formerly of London, who tells me of a declaration which, he says, appeared a few days after Fletcher's, signed by Saunders, and in exculpation of me. He says that the impression at the Cape is, that I shall soon call there on my return."

Murder and Suicide at Manchester.—A distressing case of murder and suicide took place on Tuesday, in the neighbourhood of Oldham road, Manchester. About half-past four o'clock in the afternoon a neighbour called at the house of the deceased, whose husband is a respectable workingman, named John Fairhurst, and finding the door locked, she peeped through the keyhole and saw Mrs. Fairhurst standing in the middle of the floor with the child in her arms, and a long piece of rope. She opened the door, and then threw the rope into the cupboard. After some conversation the neighbour left her, and in about half an hour afterwards a person who had occasion to call at the house, opened the door and saw Mrs. Fairhurst hanging by a piece of rope attached to a nail which had been driven over the staircase. An alarm was instantly made; she was cut down and carried up stairs, and upon the parties getting into the bed-room the infant daughter of the deceased was seen hanging from the tester rail of the bed. The infant was quite dead, although warm. No cause can be assigned for this shocking act, but it is thought that the circumstance of the husband having threatened to put the child out to nurse had preyed upon the mind of the mother, who, it appears, determined upon putting it to death, and then terminating her own existence. At the inquest the jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

Fratricide.—At the assizes at Stafford, John Brough, a farmer, has been found guilty of the wilful murder of his brother, Thomas Brough, at Biddulph, on the 3rd of January last. It appeared that the deceased, a person of saving habits, but of passionate temper towards his relatives, resided at High Bent, where he had acquired several small estates, one of which was occupied by his mother and her second son, the prisoner. A year's rent, amounting to £26, was due from his mother for these premises, to recover which debt a distress was put in on the 3rd of January, when two boxes of wearing apparel belonging to the prisoner and another brother, James Brough, were seized, and carried away to the residence of the deceased by his bailiff, in spite of the tears and entreaties of the mother for time and forbearance. The two brothers quitted their mother's presence together, after the removal of the boxes, and Thomas was killed, according to the statement of the prisoner, by a blow on the back of the head with a stone hammer, at the distance of 120 yards from the house, where the marks of blood were discovered by several witnesses. The prisoner communicated the fatal consequences of the blow to his brother James, who resided with a farmer at four miles from the place of the murder, and from whom he requested assistance in concealing the body. James Brough refused to comply with this request, and the corpse was found on the Saturday morning in a deep pit, about three quarters of a mile from the residence of the prisoner.—Mr. Baron Platt sentenced the prisoner to death, admonishing him to entertain no hope of mercy.

The Execution of Tapping on Monday.—This (Saturday) morning a number of workmen commenced fitting up the barriers in the Old Bailey, preparatory to the awful scene which will take place on Monday next—the execution of the unhappy man Tapping, for shooting his sweetheart at Bethnal-green. Extraordinary precautions will be taken, in order to prevent accidents.

Preparations for the Execution of Tawell.—An Aylesbury paper contains the following mirth-provoking reference to the execution of Tawell:—It is positively announced that Friday next, the 28th inst., is to be the day of horrors. The usual place of execution, the front of the county gaol, for these 20 years past called the new drop, will of course be used on the present occasion. Two gentlemen (no doubt from London) called upon a respectable maiden lady who occupies a shop and premises in the square of which the county hall forms one side, and made a handsome offer for the occupancy of the windows during the execution. These fellows, however, were disappointed in their hopes of having their thirst for human blood satiated; for they not only got a point blank refusal, but a very sharp lecture for their insolence in making a proposal so distasteful to humanity, and in supposing that the lady in question would make a trade in the blood of her fellow-creatures. The feeling is so strong that it is expected many of the shops will be closed until after all relics of the barbarity are removed. We understand also that a fellow from Great Marlow, an inhabitant of that town, has actually written to the Sheriff of the county, tendering his services as executioner. Mr. Acton Tindal answered the letter as it deserved to be. The inhabitants of Great Marlow are much enraged with the fellow for thus bringing disgrace upon their town.

FOREIGN.

France.—Our latest accounts from Paris state that the proposition of M. Duvergier de Hauranne, to abolish voting by ballot in the Chamber of Deputies, was carried. The vote will, therefore, in future, be by division, unless twenty members of the Chamber should desire it to be taken by ballot. This result, although not exactly to be considered as a defeat of the Ministry, is, nevertheless, somewhat embarrassing, and appears to indicate their weakness in the Chamber.

On the appeal of the Attorney-General and of the accused against the judgment of the Court of Correctional Police, the persons lately tried for cheating at cards in Paris have been brought before the Cour Royale. The proceedings lasted two days, when the Court sentenced Walker, Peyronnet, Lambert, Fraser, and Drummond Baring (who was not in custody), respectively to two years' imprisonment, and Ogleby and Emma Kaye to a similar punishment for one year.

A letter from Paris, dated Wednesday, gives the following dreary account of the annual fête of Longchamps:—"This is the first day of our celebrated fête of Longchamps, at which the public display of the Spring fashions is made by a promenade in the Champs Elysées. In the memory of the oldest Parisian, to use the hackneid phrase, there has never been such a Longchamps. The thermometer in the morning was below freezing point, and the large heaps of snow shovelled up after the last fall are lying at the sides of the streets frozen into a solid mass. You may suppose, therefore, that the promenade of this day was not a very gay one."

Marriage of the Queen of Spain.—Letters from Rome leave no doubt upon the marriage of Count Trapani with the Queen of Spain. The King of Naples was expected in the Roman capital to announce the important fact to his brother, and to prepare for the ceremony.

Arrival of the India Mail.—The half-monthly mail from Calcutta, which was brought to Suez by the Precursor steamer, has arrived. The interval of a fortnight since the departure of the last mail, has not supplied any news of importance. The unsettled state of affairs in the Punjaub has caused a great movement among the troops by way of precaution. General and Lady Sale, after being fêted in Calcutta and the vicinity, had left Calcutta to join the staff of the Commander in-Chief. Prince Waldemar, of Prussia, had proceeded to Nepaul, where everything was quiet again. Sir Henry Hardinge was still at Calcutta, occupied in local improvements. There is no further news from China.

Brazils.—Her Majesty's packet Petrel, Lieut. Cheser, has arrived from the Brazils, after a tedious voyage of upwards of two months, having sailed from Rio de Janeiro on the 16th January. From the Brazils nothing of general interest has been communicated here as having transpired since the dates furnished by a recent mercantile arrival from thence. From the River Plate we have had later dates from Buenos Ayres, those now furnished being only to Dec. 11; but letters from Monte Video of Dec. 24, state that some difference had existed between the Brazilian Chargé d'Affaires and the Monte Videan Government, which obliged this official to repair on board a Brazilian man-of-war, but the matter was looked on as of little importance at Rio. Exchange at Rio, 24⅜ pence to 25. It appeared pretty clear that the Imperial Government had fully resolved on not renewing the commercial treaty with Great Britain.

'ABDU-L-MEDJID—SULTAN OF TURKEY.

The last intelligence from Constantinople brings a copy of the document, which the Turkish Government has addressed to the Sultan, in answer to his instructions, or rather commands, to undertake and carry through a reform of the Administration. To some extent, Abdul Medjid seems to have inherited the love of changes of his father, Mahmoud. But reforms in Turkey seldom prosper; and the endeavour to assimilate the administration of public affairs to the forms that prevail in Europe, will be as futile as the attempts made by the late Sultan to compel the Moslems to abandon their "loose habits," and array themselves in those abominations of the Franks—pantaloons and hats. It is the ordinary mistake of a half-civilised mind to think that forcing a resemblance in outward things, produces an identity of skill and power with the models that are imitated. Mahmoud, the late Sultan, proscribed robes and turbans, ordered his subjects to let their hair grow and not shave their heads—and his soldiers and personal attendants obeyed him. One edict commanded the Turks to carry umbrellas if it rained; another ordered that no Turk should keep pipes in his house for his visitors, but that every man should bring his own. The master of the house was also forbidden to give his guests anything but one cup of coffee! But all these edicts were useless; Mahmoud was no Peter the Great. The Turks, as a people, are worn out, and such external changes merely destroy the traditional forms of old custom and usage, without supplying the new vigour or energy that can alone raise a people to national greatness. The political changes of Abdul Medjid being conceived in the same spirit, will have much the same effect as his father's social reforms; they will prove nullities.

The present Sultan was born on the 20th of April, 1823, and was but sixteen years of age when called to succeed his father, whose death was announced on the 1st of July, 1839, though it is supposed it occurred some days before. The ceremony of installation was performed on the 11th, when he was girded with the sabre of Osman (Takleidi-Seif) with all the ancient formalities. So much has been written on the "Eastern question," that the affairs of Turkey for the last six years are familiar to all, or rather the squabbles of politicians about them, for the "integrity of the Turkish Empire" is preserved far less by the strength of its population, or the extent of its resources, than by the inability of the great European powers to agree among themselves as to which of them shall be allowed to take the lion's share of it as a prey.

Many of the old Turkish officials see the weakness of the empire; and one of them, to whom an European was conversing on the subject, with the true Oriental spirit of fatalism summed up all by a verse from the Koran—"No people can defer its fall, nor escape therefrom; every nation hath its appointed end: Allah alone is eternal." How far all this troubles the young Sultan is uncertain, for he is little more than an instrument in the hands of a host of foreign diplomatists. He is understood to be of weak health. In person he is slight, but his countenance is said to be one of much intelligence. Though so young, he has a numerous family, which is still increasing; for scarcely a month passes without the guns announcing an addition to it from some lady of the harem.

ENDOWMENT OF MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.—On Tuesday a meeting was held in Exeter Hall, J. P. Plumptre, Esq., M.P., in the chair, to petition against the proposed endowment of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth. The speakers were, the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel; the Rev. Charles Prest, a Wesleyan clergyman; the Rev. Mr. Bickersteth; Sir E. C. Wilmot Smith; the Rev. Dr. Chalmers, jun., of the Free Church of Scotland; and the Rev. Jesse Curling. Resolutions and a petition against the endowment were adopted, and thanks voted to the chairman. The police were frequently called to quell the opposition raised against the opinions expressed by the speakers respecting the tenets of the Roman Catholics.

THE DEBATE OF THE WEEK.

MR. AGLIONBY, M.P.

The transactions between the New Zealand Company and the Colonial Office, were brought under the notice of the House of Commons, some days since, by Mr. Somes, the member for Dartmouth. The discussion that ensued, upon his motion for the production of the papers connected with the subject, was by no means favourable to the Colonial Government in general, or Lord Stanley in particular. The motion was seconded by Mr. Aglionby, who may be said to have led the attack, as Mr. Somes merely moved for the papers, without making any observations whatever. The defence of the Colonial Department was, of course, undertaken by Mr. G. W. Hope, the Under Secretary; but whether the case entrusted to him was of itself weak, or the number and ability of his opponents too strong, certain it is that a general impression was created of a failure on the part of the Government to explain away what had too much the appearance of double dealing; that is to say, the fact of making one "agreement," or "undertaking," or "promise," with a company of enterprising men, on which they relied, and then rendering it practically null and void, by means of certain other secret instructions to the Governor of the colony of New Zealand, the selected agent of the Colonial Office, which he could only carry out by setting aside the first understanding. This was the "cause" by which came the "effect defective" of the failure of the attempt to colonise New Zealand; it has been the direful spring "of woes unnumbered," and of quarrels which, though there will be no Homer to sing, have been recorded in the prose of a formidable Blue Book, surpassing in bulk any dozen epics that might be selected from the days of Homer downwards. The case is one that comes entirely within the application of the old proverb showing how invariably the disputes of rulers injure most those who have the least to do with them. Delirant reges—the Company and the Colonial Office have been fighting strenuously; plectuntur achivi, the settlers have been ruined. But the storm that broke first over them, has now forced its way into the House of Commons, with such effect there as to make Lord Stanley feel rather uncomfortable even in the dignified retirement of the House of Lords. The debate of last week gave him such uneasiness, both personally and officially, that during the present week the Government itself has thought it necessary to vindicate the course it took, and on Tuesday evening opened the question again, by moving for certain papers and documents connected with the transaction; and on those papers we presume the justification of Lord Stanley is to rest; but the final discussion will not take place till after the recess.

The two discussions already taken, have given more than usual prominence to the names of the two gentlemen whose portraits we this week present to the reader; Mr. Aglionby, as one of the leaders of the attack on behalf of the New Zealand Company, and Mr. G. W. Hope, the Under-Secretary of the Colonies, who, of course, had to make a defence for his principal—the first task of anything like difficulty he has had to encounter since his accession to his present office, one of no slight importance and responsibility now that the head of the department is no longer a member of the lower house.

Mr. Henry Aglionby is member for Cockermouth, for which borough he has sat since the year 1832. He is the son of the Rev. Samuel Bateman, of Newbiggen Hall, Cumberland, the name of Aglionby having been assumed by him according to the provisions of the will of an aunt. He is a barrister of the Northern Circuit, and practised for some years at the Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Lancashire sessions. His political opinions are those of the extreme section of the Liberals, are in fact those once designated Radical, since there are recorded declarations on his part in favour of Triennial Parliaments, Vote by Ballot, and against the policy of Bishops holding seats in the House of Peers; he prefers direct to indirect taxation, and since the accession of the present Ministry to power he has had the opportunity, on this point at least, of giving his support to the Conservative Premier. He is not one of what may be called the set orators of the House, but when he does speak, he exhibits great fluency of language, and in this New Zealand discussion he appeared to have a perfect acquaintance with the facts of the case. He speaks rapidly, and more in the tone of conversation than declamation. He is an active and useful member, and is frequently placed on committees: attention to this part of the business of the House is by no means a general quality, and those who do possess the industry and application it requires deserve to have due credit for it. In person he is squarely built, not above the middle size, and of somewhat florid complexion. He was born in 1790, and is, therefore, fifty-five years of age.

MR. G. W. HOPE, M.P.

A good defence of official conduct against those who impugn it, is as creditable to a Minister as a skilful retreat to a General. Both have to be accomplished under considerable difficulty, as an opponent seldom ventures such an open attack unless he has, or what amounts to nearly the same thing, thinks he has, the vantage ground of a superior position, or a good case. We have heard Ministerial replies that were models of skill; among the best, perhaps, were those made by Lord Palmerston in other days, to the carpings of Mr. Disraeli at his foreign policy; Peel, too, can put a very good appearance on a case that would appear to be doubtful; he is "cunning of fence," and opponents generally show much discretion in thinking twice "ere they challenge him." But these statesmen are both chiefs in their respective parties, and in all their proceedings comparatively untrammelled in the course they take. If, therefore, the defence made by Mr. Hope for the Government in this New Zealand discussion must be deemed less successful than is to be desired, it may be ascribed, in some degree, to his subordinate official position. He could not state, perhaps, all he might have done; he could not commit his chief, by going beyond his instructions; he could only "speak by the card," and was bound to say no more than was set down for him. In some cases of attack, too, the assailant is in ignorance of a good deal that he ought to know, not being a party immediately concerned, or, what is still worse, is only half informed as to the greater portion of the subject. But in the present case the assailant was the party with whom the "arrangement," or "agreement," or whatever it may hereafter be called, was made, and they were quite as well informed on the whole matter as the Colonial-office could be itself. There was no possibility of falling back upon any exclusive information, or the contents of documents dragged from the secret recesses of the "department." The parties contended on equal terms, and the defendants were not protected by any special and official armour.

MR. G. W. HOPE, M.P.

But as the main reply in the case, and the actual defence of the Colonial Secretary, is deferred until after Easter, we pass from it, merely observing that at the present moment much of its interest evaporated in the discussion of Tuesday evening, and nothing short of a "slashing speech" from Lord Stanley himself will do much to revive it; even that speech will fall flat and ineffectual on the unexcitable auditory of the House of Peers.

Mr. George William Hope is the son of General Sir Alexander Hope, and cousin of the Earl of Hopetoun. He is allied by marriage to the family of the Duke of Buccleuch. He represents the borough of Southampton, and is, of course, returned by the Conservative interest. He belongs, by education, to the legal profession, though he has quitted its toils for those of politics and official life. He is the Under Secretary for the Colonies, but since the elevation of Lord Stanley to the Peers, has had to discharge the duties of chief in the discussions in the House of Commons. He goes through his task in a straightforward, business-like manner; and, without attempting anything ambitious, is content to be as clear and intelligible as frequent reference to, and quotations from, voluminous official correspondence permits him to be. He is about thirty-seven years of age, rather tall, of dark complexion and black hair. He is the ablest, perhaps, of the second class of Ministers, who have been obliged to take a place in the first rank by the secession of Lord Stanley and Mr. Gladstone from the Treasury Banch.

MR. BARON PARKE.

In a recent criminal trial, the accused never expressed a doubt of his acquittal till the conclusion of the summing up of the evidence by the Judge. That Judge was Mr. Baron Parke, and the words attributed to the unhappy prisoner may be taken as a proof that the address to the Jury was distinguished by that clear statement of the facts, deprived of all irrelevant matter, which it is the peculiarity of legal training to produce. This lucidity, and quick perception of the points of a case, are possessed by Mr. Baron Parke, whose portrait we have given to an eminent degree.

Mr. Parke obtained his legal reputation as a barrister on the northern circuit, and was raised to the bench from the ranks of the junior counsel, never having, we believe, worn the silk gown. He was made a Judge of the Court of King's Bench, in 1828, and some years afterwards was removed to the Court of Exchequer; he was at this period also made a Privy Councillor. He is a sound lawyer, an upright judge; and bears in private life an irreproachable character.

MR. BARON PARKE.

THE LATE PROFESSOR DANIELL.

In our late edition of last week, we chronicled the sudden death of this distinguished philosopher, which took place on Thursday afternoon, under the most distressing circumstances. In the evening an inquest was held on the body, in the Council Chamber of the Royal Society; the deceased having died suddenly in the course of the afternoon, immediately after delivering his usual lecture at King's College, and just as he had entered the Royal Society's room for the purpose of attending a meeting of the council of that learned body. It appeared by the evidence of Mr. Bowman, assistant surgeon to King's College Hospital, that the professor was previously in good health; that apoplexy was the cause of death: and that he was a remarkably temperate man, having taken neither wine nor spirits during the last two years. He fell down, breathed hard a few minutes, and expired. The jury returned a verdict, Died of Apoplexy.

The annexed portrait of the deceased is from a Daguerreotype, taken a few months since; and, our acknowledgments are due to an obliging correspondent for the subjoined sketch of the life and labours of this truly estimable man.

Professor Daniell was not originally educated for scientific pursuits, but entered into business as a sugar-refiner. His fondness for scientific investigations, however, was manifested from boyhood; and he used frequently to amuse his young friends, when a lad, by exhibiting to them some of the wonders of pneumatic chemistry, which had then been recently made known to the world, in that burst of chemical discovery which shed lustre on the names of Black, Cavendish, Lavoisier, Priestley, and Scheele. His inclination soon led him to relinquish the business in which he was engaged, and during his leisure time he devoted himself actively to the study of Meteorology, and he contributed to the "Quarterly Journal of Science and Art" several valuable papers on subjects connected with this science. We may particularly specify one, which was published in 1820, on a new hygrometer—still the only accurate means we possess of at once determining the amount of moisture present in the atmosphere. In 1823, appeared his great work, entitled "Meteorological Essays," which was followed, in 1824, by an important

THE LATE PROFESSOR DANIELL.

"Essay on Artificial Climate," published in the "Transactions of the Horticultural Society:" for this he received the Silver Medal of the Society. This is not the place for us to dilate upon the practical importance of this Essay. The opinion of Dr. Lindley on its merits, in completely revolutionizing the methods of horticulture till then adopted, may be seen in an article contained in the Gardener's Chronicle for the 1st of March for the present year. He continued to publish various papers on subjects connected both with chemistry and meteorology; and in 1827 the second edition of his Meteorological Essays made its appearance, much enlarged. On the foundation of King's College, he was appointed Professor of Chemistry in that Institution; and the duties of this post he discharged up to the day of his death, as not half an hour before the fatal event occurred he had been engaged in delivering a lecture to his class In 1830 and 1831 he published a description of his Pyrometer, for measuring the heats of furnaces, the expansion and melting points of metals, &c. For this simple, and perfect invention, the Royal Society, in 1832, awarded him the Rumford Medal, a triennial medal left by Count Rumford to the Royal Society, to be given for the most importaut discovery or invention relative to the philosophy of heat or its applications, that had been made throughout the known world since the time of its last adjudication.

His attention after this was principally directed to Voltaic Electricity: in 1836, he communicated to the Royal Society a paper describing a method of obtaining continuous and powerful currents of Voltaic Electricity from his celebrated constant battery; for this most valuable addition to our resources he, in 1837, received the Copley Medal of the Royal Society—an annual medal, appropriated to the most important scientific discovery made since the last award. As this medal is open to competitors of all countries, and in all branches of science, it is the highest honour that a scientific man can receive in this kingdom.

In 1839, appeared the first edition of his "Introduction to the Study of Chemical Philosophy;" a masterly treatise on the action of molecular forces in general, though modestly professing to give little more than a simple introduction to the discoveries of Faraday, and their applications to chemistry.

He continued his researches in the same field till the time of his decease, publishing the results of his experiments from time to time in the Phil. Trans. For two of these papers, which have a most essential bearing on the general theories of Chemistry, he in 1842 received one of the Royal Medals. In 1843, the University of Oxford conferred upon him the honorary degree of D. C. L.; and in the same year he published the second edition of his "Chemical Philosophy." He had nearly completed correcting the proof sheets of the third edition of his "Meteorological Essays" when he was cut off in his prime, having only the day before his decease attained his 55th year.

To the worth of his private character all who knew him will testify. The nobleness and generosity of his disposition, and the kindness of his heart, have left an indelible impression on the memory of his numerous and sorrowing friends; while the singleness of his aims, and the undeviating rectitude with which he adhered to the principles he had laid down for his guidance, commanded the respect of all. His death will be long and deeply felt. To his many excellences he united a sound and discriminating judgment, which gave singular weight to his advice and opinions. For more than thirty years he was a zealous and active member of the Royal Society, and in the year 1839 was elected to fill the honourable office of Foreign Secretary to that learned body: he further held the post of Examiner in Chemistry to the University of London since the opening of that institution.

It is worthy of remark, as showing the extent and variety of his knowledge, and the importance of his discoveries, that he is the only individual on whom all three of the medals in the gift of the Royal Society were ever bestowed.

ST. PATRICK'S BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

Monday being St. Patrick's Day, the sixty-second anniversary of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick was celebrated by a public dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern, the Right Hon. Sidney Herbert in the chair. There were also present the Earl of Devon, the Earl of Clanwilliam, Sir William Chatterton, Sir Robert Campbell, Sir E. Campbell, Sir Burgess Camac, Sir Ralph Howard, Captain Sir Thomas Herbert, Captain Kennedy, General Caulfield, J. Emerson Tennent, Esq., M.P.; Mr. Sergeant Murphy, M.P.; Right Hon. A. R. Blake, Sir Edward Chester, and the Right Hon. Richard Lalor Sheil, M.P.

After the cloth had been drawn, and the usual loyal toasts disposed of,

The Chairman, in proposing the "Army and Navy," coupled with the toast the names of Sir Burgess Camac and Sir Ralph Howard, both of whom responded to the toast on behalf of their respective service.

The Chairman then proposed the healths of the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Northumberland, and the other ladies subscribers to the Institution; and next

The healths of the Duke of Wellington, a great authority upon all matters, who owed his origin to Ireland (cheers); the Duke of Northumberland, the Duke of Leinster, and the other absent munificent supporters of the Charity, which having been enthusiastically responded to,

The Right Hon. A. Blake returned thanks on the part of the Archbishop of Dublin and other absent friends of his included in the toast.

After toasting the memory of the founders of the Institution,

The Chairman proposed the Irish Bar and Mr. Sheil.

Mr. Sheil, who was received with loud cheers, said that bar was distinguished by great eloquence and intelligence—by deep erudition, and by a chivalrous devotion to the cause of the injured and distressed. (Cheers.)

The charity, whose anniversary festival they were met to celebrate, educated all children without distinction—it inculcated the brotherhood of Christianity—and taught the great precept of the Gospel, that "We should love one another." (Cheers.) In thus relieving the Irish child from intellectual destitution and from all the depravity which is incidental thereto, the society performed one of the noblest offices which could possibly devolve upon it. In this meeting, dedicated to the purposes of benevolence, where men of all parties and opinions were assembled together, he (Mr. Sheil) found an earnest of that period—he trusted not far distant—when Irishmen would at last be reconciled to one another, and all sectarian differences be forgotten. (Cheers.) It would make their island one of the most fortunate on the sea, if there could be once secured therein an oblivion of their common wrongs and their common injuries; and he made it his prayer to Heaven, that before the green earth of his country was heaped over him, he might be happy enough to behold the glorious spectacle of its felicity and power.

The following subscriptions were announced, together with many others:—The Queen, £105; the Queen Dowager, £25; Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, £50; the Archbishop of Dublin, £20; the Duke of Northumberland, £30; the Marquis of Anglesey, £25; the Marquis of Lansdowne, £20; Earl of Errol, £20; Earl of Shelburne, £10; Earl of Portarlington, £10; Viscount Ebrington, £20; Lord Morpeth, £5 5s.

During the ceremony the children were introduced and were paraded round the tables. They all looked remarkably healthy, and seemed all very well pleased.

The Chairman shortly after retired with most of those around him, but the conviviality of the evening was kept up to an advanced hour; Major-Gen. Caulfield being the second chairman.

The singing arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Hobbs, assisted by the Misses Williams, Master Stephens, Master Sullivan, Messrs. Hawkins, Roe, Chapman, Bradbury, and Hatton. The Misses Williams were honoured with an encore in the duet, "We are two merry, gay, laughing fairies," composed expressly for them by Mr. Hatton. The Coldstream band was in attendance, and contributed, by playing the national airs, greatly to the evening's enjoyment.

THE LATE MISS LINWOOD.

We recorded the death of this ingenious lady in our ournal of the 8th instant.

Miss Mary Linwood was one of the most gifted and remarkable women of her time: she was born at Leicester, in the year 1756, and was in the 90th year of her age at her decease. When only 13 years old, she commenced her exquisite productions of needlework; her last piece she completed at the age of 78. "The works of this accomplished artist," says Miss Lambert, in her "Hand-Book of Needlework," "are executed with fine crewels, dyed under her own superintendence, on a thick kind of tammy, woven expressly for her use; they were entirely drawn and embroidered by herself, no background, or other important parts, being put in by a less skilful hand—the only assistance she received, if, indeed, it may be called such, was in the threading of her needles. No needlework, either of ancient or modern times, has ever surpassed the celebrated productions of Miss Linwood."

The famed Collection in Leicester-square originated as follows. It appears that in 1785 Miss Linwood's pictures had acquired such celebrity, that the artist exhibited them to the Royal Family, at Windsor; afterwards to the nobility, in the metropolis; in 1798 they were first exhibited publicly in the Hanover-square Rooms; whence they were removed to Leicester-square.

The whole Collection consists of 64 pieces, including a portrait of Miss Linwood herself, in about her 19th year, from a painting by Russell: here is, also, her first piece, the "Head of St. Peter," a copy from Guido. The "Salvator Mundi," after Carlo Dolci, has generally been considered the finest production of her needle, for which, it is reported, she refused the sum of three thousand guineas. "The Woodman in a Storm," after Gainsborough, and "Jephtha's Rash Vow," after Opie, also rank amongst her best works. Her last production was the "Judgment upon Cain," one of the largest pictures in the gallery; it occupied her ten years.

The circumstances of Miss Linwood's death are thus related in the Leicester Mercury:—

"She was taken ill last year, while on her annual visit to her inimitable Exhibition of Needlework in London, and was brought to Leicester in an invalid carriage on the 27th of September last. Although she did not rally again to any considerable extent, hopes were entertained until about New Year's Day that she would recover strength, but an attack of influenza seizing her at that time, it became evident that debility would gain the mastery, and since which period she gradually k until the hour of death. Her affliction was borne with the utmost tude, and her end was approached with exemplary resignation and patience. By her death many poor families will miss the hand of succour, her benevolence of disposition having led her to minister of her substance to the necessities of the poor and destitute in her neighbourhood."

To her position in the year 1828 the late Sir Richard Phillips thus refers:—

"Leicester and Miss Linwood, and Miss Linwood and Leicester, have been associated for nearly half a century. Genius, virtue, and unparalleled industry render the affinity a trophy to Leicester, more splendid than many towns can boast. She still conducts a boarding-school for young ladies, and, arrogating nothing, is content with the moderate terms of the vicinity."

GAIETIES AND GRAVITIES OF THE WEEK.

The first act of the Parliamentary farce has closed with a little general skirmishing of a very lively kind—in which Mr. Disraeli and the Prime Minister have figured anew. A gentleman of the name of Miles—having gone out of his way—miles out of his way, we may say, to put in a claim for the agricultural interest to that surplus which smiles so benevolently upon the Administration; and Lord March (who may, in this instance, be designated a march of miles), having seconded his motion, there ensued what may not inappropriately be called a debate of crimination, of which the Premier got the best of the voting and the worst of the speaking. The fact is, that a similar motion had been made in the house by the Marquis of Chandos when the Conservatives were in Opposition, and when they voted so strongly for it as to have very nearly turned out the Whigs. We are not going into the merits of the question, but we cannot get over the fact that two occasions precisely similar produced results distinctly opposite from one and the same party, and that there a decided inconsistency was apparent, upon which Mr. Disraeli had a perfect right to twit the house. We may possibly not go the whole hog with Mr. Disraeli's sentiments upon the subject of agriculture, but do coincide with him heartily in the bitter and satirical philippic which he launched against a clear tergiversation, as well as in the truth of the taunt that the Minister thought a great deal more about the "Gentlemen of England" upon the hustings than he thinks of them in the house. Perhaps they were made too much of in one place and too little in the other. Whether so or not, there was a laughter-moving humour about the cutting sarcasms of the intelligent member for Shrewsbury; his reproaches bore the sting of truth—the eloquence of undeniable independence and power—he carried the justice of the house with him in continued bursts of applause; and when, in a tone of indignant fervour, he told the Premier—without caring for the consequences—"To dissolve the Parliament he had betrayed and appeal to the people who mistrusted him," but that he (Mr. Disraeli) "would still publicly express his opinion that a conservative administration was an organised hypocrisy!" the halls of old St. Stephen's rung with reiterrated cheers, which lasted long after the honourable gentleman had resumed his seat.

In Paris, public affairs progress slowly, and it does appear to us that the Ministers are frittering away their reputations. The Chemins de fer are making all the stir, and railway shares keep the Bourse in a ferment of speculation. By the way, Thiers' new History of the Empire has sprung into an amazing circulation, no less than sixteen thousand copies having been disposed of.

In America, the expiring Mr. Tyler has taken farewell of his Presidency, with a last dying epistle to Congress about the negroes captured by our slavers. Sir Robert Peel, however, destroyed the influence both of the letter and Message in the short debate of Wednesday night. Congress is dissolved, and the Legislature, like the President, is for the moment dead. Pity that Sydney Smith were not living to write an epitaph upon its defunct anatomy. However, its pranks with the Annexation and Oregon questions are over for the nonce. Polk has polked into the Presidency; and we have now only to wait in patience for the proofs of his genius and the evidences of his wisdom in the art of that contradictory power which we call republican sway. Mr. Dallas is elected Vice-President.

We always like a little row about the taxes. There is never much harm done in a gentle money disturbance, and the agitation of the question of the window duties is one of the duties by which we do win. We, therefore, by no means disapprove of the debate in the house, nor of the vote of Captain Rous, who thought we had a right to make holes in our walls without having to pay for the light which chooses to peep through them; and although it was too much to expect that the present session would bring the public so abundant a relief, yet there ought to be a reasonable expectation of the early abolition of the tax upon light, which is, to a certain extent, also a tax upon health.

The Directors of the "Great Western Railway" have been playing their pranks before high Heaven, in a way that demands public protest and rebuke. They have added two more delinquencies to the thousand they have committed before. The first of these is an upsetting of the arrangements of the public, by postponing the departure of the early train from six to seven o'clock, creating thereby a large amount of personal inconvenience, and delaying the arrival of public intelligence to the inhabitants of the country towns, and of the country all along the line. Their second offence to society is a direct insult. Public agitation—satire—almost uproar—have forced from the directors a promise to alter those infamously-appointed vehicles yclept second and third class carriages, which, during this long season of inclemency, have led to so much suffering, disease, and, perhaps it is not too much to say, death. The carriages were, as soon as possible, to be rendered not only tenantable, but comfortable; but it is now coolly announced that the alterations will not be effected till June; so that we may still endure the frost and cold of the present season—the winds of March, and the rains of April; and when summer's heat comes upon us with sultry June, the carriages, which would be then all the better for being a little open and airy will be closed up, as if to defy the rigidity of the previous December. Oh ye Great Western Solons! how do you differ from the wise men of the East!

Two or three investigations have been in course of conduct during the present week which are likely to throw a scandal upon the clergy. We cannot too strongly, under the impressions which these exposures create, urge upon Bishops and spiritual superiors a rigid and discreet watching over the moral conduct and character of those whom they have appointed to sacred trusts.

* * * * * * *

There has been a dash of aquatics during the week, and the Cambridge Club has reversed its luck, and beat the Oxford Club in a very spirited rowing match. We were glad to find Commodore Harrison, of the Yacht Club, acting as umpire with his usual good judgment and gentlemanly impartiality. It was an honour, to the members of the Yacht Club itself, that it did not permit his retirement on an occasion when a spirit of bad taste in a few impugned his correctness some time past, but rather made the occasion an opportunity for giving him a good dinner and a handsome testimonial. He has been, and is, one of our best and most sincere patrons of aquatic sport.

As the Easter holidays will soon be here to bring us more gaiety than we should have thought of seeking amid the more solemn memories of the present week, we commend our readers to the enjoyment of their rejoiceful festivity, and say au plaisir to all of them until we meet again.

THE THEATRES.

During the past week the theatres have remained closed: en attendant, every department has been actively busy in getting ready for Easter Monday, and at all of the houses novelties will be produced.

The OPERA closed for the week's recess on Saturday, under the most brilliant auspices. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort attended the performances. The new opera, which, in some quarters, met with that tacit resistance, which all new works and new composers of high merits, must encounter at the first outset, received the decisive stamp of vogue from the august party, themselves distinguished and practical dilettanti; for his Royal Highness Prince Albert is himself a composer of no mean merit; and her Majesty, a pupil of the great Lablache, reads musical scores and interprets them with the truth and facility which is hereditary in the illustrious house of Brunswick. Her Majesty's satisfaction was not only visible throughout, but openly expressed to some of the high official personages attendant upon her Majesty. On the other hand, the Duke of Cambridge, an able dilettante, and his illustrious consort, had previously warmly applauded the opera, which they graced with their presence every night of its performance. The Queen, whose visit at this early season was so unexpected, appeared no less to enjoy the ballet. Her Majesty remained till it was nearly terminated. Thus have definitively triumphed the unprecedented efforts to produce at the Italian Opera a new lyrical score and a new ballet on the unpropitious "first nights" before Easter. On account of the absence of so many of the nobility, high gentry, and leading votaries of fashion, formerly the most wretched works and singers were produced at this season; but the audiences which can always be found in a metropolis like London, which contains two millions of inhabitants, merited greater respect; and however fashion-ridden, they have not failed to respond to an honester policy, whilst the most illustrious and august personages of the realm have at once issued their fiat of approbation.

We will, we regret to say, only hear "Ernani" once more for some time to come. Novelty will follow novelty—each new virtuoso as he arrives must appear in his appropriate medium of habitual triumph. On Thursday will be produced "Le Desert," the work which has created so much curiosity and elicited so much discussion on the Continent. On Saturday Madame Castellan, who has been so successful at our Philharmonic Concerts, will come and solicit from the English public, a confirmation of the renown she has acquired on her first début on the lyrical stage at St. Petersburgh. After next week the novelties will succeed each other in overwhelming numbers. In addition to the troupe we possess, will arrive the great artists from Paris—Grisi, Mario, Lablache, &c.; the very next day the thirty-six danseuses Viennoises, who have filled the Grand Opera of Paris every night from pit to gallery, and saved the declining institution from immediate ruin. Nearly at the same time will land on our shores, Cerito and her new partner for life, St. Leon; and likewise the fairy-footed Andalusian dancer, the celebrated beauty of Spain "La Nina," to behold whose performances at Seville, more than one of our opera votaries has braved the uneasy lurches in the Bay of Biscay. Madame Rossi Caccia, the new prima donna assoluta, will be amongst the first comers. Carlotta Grisi is negotiating her immediate coné with the Paris lessee, so loath to part with her; and Taglioni is studying new choregraphic feats, by means of which she hopes to fire a last Parthian and ineradicable dart at her old admirer—John Bull, to whom and to the stage she is to bid adieu for ever, during the present season. Independent of the great barytone Baroilhet, there are several other stars expected this season at her Majesty's Teeatre; but the list is as long as Leporello's catalogue of the beauties of Don Giovanni adored, and we have already filled our allotted space.

At DRURY LANE the opera of "Robert the Devil" will be repeated. Mr. Harrison is announced to appear in it; but, we regret to say, that gentleman still continues too seriously indisposed. He was a little better on Wednesday, but certainly will not be sufficiently recovered to sing. The entertainment will be a comic ballet called "Robert and Bertrand," in which two dancers, new to the London stage, M. Polni and M. Gaperini, will appear, from the Grand Opera at Berlin. Mdlle. Adéle and Mdlle. Louise, whom our readers may recollect at the Lyceum last season, are added to the corps de ballet. Various novelties are announced, including Nicolai's opera "Il Templario," which created a great sensation at Milan four or five years since. Madame Thillon is also shortly expected, and M. Duprez.

The HAYMARKET puts forward Mr. Peake's pleasant three-act piece, "The Sheriff of the County," and Mr. Maddison Morton's farce of "Young England;" but between them will be presented the feature of the evening, a new classical burlesque by Mr. Planché, called "The Golden Fleece," which promises to recal all the palmy days of the Olympic management. Mr. Charles Matthews is entrusted with the "Chorus;" Madame Vestris plays Medea; and the monarch of burlesque kings, Mr. James Bland, has a suitable character; Miss P. Horton also appears in it. Green-room whisper says that this is to be one of the happiest productions of Mr. Planché's elegant and ever-pointed pen.

The LYCEUM comes out with Farquhar's comedy of the "Recruiting Officer," in which the entire force of the company will appear, including Mr. and Mrs. Keeley. Next there will be a new farce, called "The Lowther Arcade;" and lastly, a new burlesque, by Messrs. Albert Smith and Taylor, entitled "Whittington and his Cat," which will be produced on a scale of great splendour. One of the novel effects will be the departure of Master Fitzwarren's argosy, "The Alice," from his wharf at Queenhythe; and the battue of the rats in the Harem is to rival the feats of the celebrated Billy. Miss Villars, a young lady new to the London Theatres, will play Alice Fitzwarren; Mrs. Keeley, Dick Whittington; Mr. Keeley, Muley Moloch, the lion-tamer of the desert, a sort of Moorish Van Amburgh; Mr. Collyer, the renowned Puss; and the cast also includes Messrs. F. Mathews and Wigan; Misses Farebrother, Arden, Howard, &c.

The ADELPHI opens with Mr. Buckstone's "Green Bushes," which still proves attractive; and it is to be followed by a chivalric burlesque, from the indefatigable pens of Messrs. aBeckett and Mark Lemon, to be called "St. George and the Dragon." Mr. Paul Bedford as the latter monster will be the great feature of the piece. He will not, however, be a common conventional dragon, but wear a cut-away coat of scales, and a smart stock; and be altogether the drollest dragon ever introduced to a metropolitan audience, always excepting our old friend who got tipsy in "Fortunio." The renowned Champion of England will be represented by Miss Woolgar; and Mr. Wright and Miss Ellen Chaplin have also characters in the burlesque. The names of the authors are sufficient to ensure a ceaseless fire of jokes, puns, and allusions.

The PRINCESS' will commence the season with the play of "The Stranger," for Miss Cushman and Mr. Graham. Then a Mr. Sands and his infant brother will appear in an Entr'acte, called the "Freaks of Fancy," which we presume to be an entertainment in the Risley school; and, lastly, a new grand burlesque will be performed, called "Timour, the Cream of all the Tartars," from the pen, as we hear, of Mr. Medex. The fierce and bloodthirsty Tartar will be represented in the person of Mr. Oxberry; and Miss Emma Stanley will enact Zorilda. Of course, the desperate combat between Kerim and Sanballat, which every juvenile knows at "a penny plain, and twopence coloured," will not be omitted: but it is whispered that no danger need be apprehended from their untamed steeds, which will be of harmless basket-work.

At the OLYMPIC, Mr. Stoquelar, the author of "Polkomania" and the "Handbook to India," has written a piece, called "The Seven Champions of Christendom," taking nearly the same subject as the Adelphi authors. We doubt not but that it will be equally successful with the rest, although there is a fierce tilting match in anticipation amongst the comic writers. Miss Davenport, we believe, appears in it; and every pains will be taken to do it justice in placing it properly upon the stage.

The STRAND will not reopen. In spite of the success of the burlesque "Antigone," the season has been far from profitable to Mr. Roberts. We believe that the limited size of the house has a great deal to do with the losses sustained by the managers of it from time to time. Let it be as full as it will nold, it is impossible to make it do much more than pay its expenses. We understand that Mr. Marble, the clever American comedian, who was engaged at this theatre, will transfer his services to the Olympic.

ROYAL ADELPHI.

MR. C. H. ADAMS'S ORRERY.—The astronomical lectures of Mr. Adams are in the highest degree interesting, particularly to the young student, on whose mind, however intelligent or inquiring, precept cannot make such forcible impression as example. Mr. Adams justly remarks that this is a year particularly interesting to the Astronomer—"the approaching transit of the Planet Mercury over the Sun's disc, together with an eclipse of both luminaries" rendering it so. All this was beautifully and satisfactorily explained by means of some brilliant transparencies and ingenious illustrations, which while they amused or delighted the ignorant or uninitiated, confirmed the experienced "in the wonders which the Omnipotent Architect doeth for the children of men." Part III. of the lecture in which the various systems of Astronomy are considered, was the most interesting portion of the discourse: the controversy respecting Easter Sunday requires a different kind of treatment from that bestowed upon it by Mr. Adams—a vast deal of philological learning is necessary.

MUSIC.

COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

On Monday evening last, Mr. Lavenu (step-son to poor Mori) gave a miscellaneous concert at this house, which was brilliantly and numerously attended. The opening of the first part consisted of a selection from a manuscript opera by the beneficiaire, which reflects the greatest credit upon his genius and science. In the overture, the solo by Herr König was delicious—full of soul-breathing melody: the allegro movement, though no copy, put us in mind of the energy of Weber, and had it been performed under other circumstances must have created a furore as great as anything written by that great composer. As it was, it was all but read at sight by a kind and willing band (a circumstance which proves in what high estimation the composer is held by his musical brethren), and produced a most excellent and brilliant effect. The terzetto, "Oh! what a lovely night," is full of dramatic beauty, and we were sorry to hear it for the first time in a concert salon; nevertheless, it was charmingly executed by Miss Rainforth, Mr. D. W. King, and Mr. Burdini. The ballad of "The Harmless Dews" was very beautifully sung by Mr. King, a vocalist of sweet voice and exquisite feeling. The scena and aria, "My Home was an Island," was given by Miss Lucombe with indescribable sweetness and expression. It was a subject of general regret with all with whom we conversed, that this charming music was not heard in its proper situation, namely, on the stage in conjunction with its libretto, and the scenic effects which it could so splendidly illustrate.

The other items of the programme call for no further notice than they do upon other frequent occasions. Mdme. Dulcken was delightful on the pianoforte in a pretty fantasia by Bertini, on themes from "L'Elisir d'Amore;" Baumann also on the bassoon; Richardson on the flute; Herr König on the cornet; Lazarus on the clarionet; and, though last not least, we must make honourable mention of M. Tolbecque, whose ability and good nature as chef d'orchestre made everybody feel happy.

The concert was a most agreeable one, and was fully and fashionably attended

THE GOTHICS' BALL.

The Gothics' Annual Costume Ball was held at the Hanover-square Rooms, on the evening of Thursday, the 13th inst., when one of the most brilliant meetings took place that we have witnessed since the assembly was first established. Within the last few years a marked change has taken place in the costumes of the fancy balls held in London. Instead of a crowd of unmeaning dresses, on which conventional and theatrical notions of what was supposed to be characteristic, were mixed up together without any propriety or authority, we notice costumes, in the disposition and arrangement of which, the highest degree of taste and knowledge of effect is apparent. Dancing commenced about 10 o'clock, and was continued with unabated spirit until the good old-fashioned "Sir Roger de Coverley" concluded the programme of twenty-six dances, of which polkas and waltzes formed an important feature. The dresses were, without an exception, costly and striking. Amongst those we more particularly observed worn by the gentlemen, were, a magnificent suit of chain-mail, of the time of King John; two Jesters of the middle ages, that recalled the times of "Old Maie Daie," and a capital party in old English court suits; a mousquetaire in white regimentals; a crowd of joyous debardeurs, a picturesque costume long known at the French Carnival, but only just beginning to make its way in England; a French postillion, not yet become so popular, and several moyen age dresses, especially striking. It is difficult to pick out the more remarkable costumes amongst the ladies, where all were so good. Possibly, the most elegant were those of a "Vivandière," and the "Queen of Spades," which derived additional effect from the personal charms of the fair wearers. The powdered head-dresses of the Marie Antoinette style were abundant; and one or two "Marquises" of the ancien regime were admirably arranged. The music was under the able direction of Mr. Adams. Nothing could exceed the unflinching energy of his band to the last; but we think more popular music might have been chosen for several of the dances. With the exception of some old favourites, few of the reigning sets at the evening parties of the present season were performed. We are certain, however, that all the company, which was chiefly composed of the literary and musical circles of the metropolis, departed highly delighted with the festivity of the evening.

ENGLISH VOCALISTS IN ITALY.—It cannot be denied that our Italian friends are liberal to the fair chanteuses who quit this, their own land, for the sunny south. Miss Bassano has had an extraordinary success at Venice, and Miss Birch (now in Paris) is engaged at Milan, where she is esteemed "La prima donna del Mondo."

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

THE OPERA AT MALTA.—The Malta Times, received per last mail, contains a well-written account of the appearance of Miss Emma Bingly in Rossini's opera of "La Cenerentola." The success of this young lady in "La Sonnambula," although perfect, scarcely promised that in a character so different in its dramatic expression she should attain as decided a triumph. The patrons of the opera in Malta consist principally of the elite of the English residents, and the higher class of Maltese. The latter possess all that refined taste and love for music which is so characteristic of their near neighbours of "the land of song." To attain moderate success, then, with such an audience, would in itself be a proof of talent; Miss Bingly has, however, exceeded this; repeated plaudits appear to have rewarded her efforts during the performance, and at the termination a shower of bouquets welcomed her reappearance. These demonstrations abundantly evidence that, with study and perseverance, she may ultimately attain the highest limits of the musical profession.

SIR HENRY BISHOP.—This distinguished composer is once more a candidate for the musical professorship of Edinburgh. It is strange he should like to fill the chair which he so recently vacated.

A NEW VOCALIST.—A gentleman who has long delighted us, an instrumentalist, is about to make his debut as a vocalist. Mr. Grattan Cook, the celebrated oboist, will sing a composition of his own at the meeting of the Royal Society of Musicians on the 4th of April.

SENORA LOLA MENTEZ.—This danseuse, whose appearance a season or two ago at Her Majesty's Theatre created some merriment in the omnibus box, has made a decided hit at the Porte St. Martin, at Paris. "De gustibus," &c.

NEW MUSIC.

LE DESERT. Symphonic Ode, by M. FELICIEN DAVID

The object of the composer in this extraordinary work, which has excited so unprecedented a sensation at Paris, is to pourtray, by harmonic combinations, the impressions made on him, during a journey in the East, by the immensity and the solitude of the desert. For this purpose he avails himself of all the varied powers which harmony and melody, guided by the profoundest science and the purest taste, are capable of producing.

The Symphhonic Ode commences with a ritornello of the stringed instruments, sustained by a pedal, and prolonged for thirty bars, representing the confused murmur and monotonous grandeur of the Desert. The introductory strophes are declaimed to this accompaniment. The "Glorification of Allah" follows. In this splendid hymn the combination of instruments is excellent, and produces a sonorous and imposing effect. The distant approach of the caravan is then announced by a gentle movement of the orchestra, which gradually swells into a superb crescendo as the caravan draws near; the rhythm of this morceau is striking and appropriate, giving admirably the effect of the tramp of footsteps in the heavy sand; the chorus of the travellers is heard. But the fatal simoun soon interrupts their march, and the tempest rages in the desert. This is the triumph of descriptive music; above the howling of the wind is heard the prayer of the affrighted travellers—"Allah! pitie pour les croyans. All the solemnity and fearfulness of such a scene is depicted with wondrous force. But the raging of the storm grdually abates, and the caravan resumes its march. Thus ends the first part.

A charming contrast to the preceding confusion and clamour is offered by the lovely air, "Hymne à la Nuit," which begins the second part. The "Fantasia Arabe" is full of spirit and local colouring; then follows the light and graceful "Danse des Almées, which possesses a wild and primitive character; and the "Liberté au Desert," a fine chorus, with accompaniment of orchestra. The beautiful air, "La Reverie du Loir" then breaks in upon these wild and joyous sounds. It possesses a pensive languor, which is in beautiful keeping with the stillness and solemnity of the night.

The third part begins with the "Lever du Soleil," the morceau which has created such unbounded enthusiasm at every place of its performance. A gentle tremolo of violins announces the break of day; the second is then taken up by another set of violins, the wind instruments soon join in, increasing the sound at every moment, and the rising of the sun to its zenith, the full glare of daylight, is announced by the "harmonious thunder" of the whole orchestra in wondrous combination. The characteristic "Chant du Muezzein" follows, and after that the caravan again resumes its march. The footsteps die away in the distance, the desert raises its hymn again to Allah, and this extraordinary composition ends.

On Thursday next this novel work will be performed at her Majesty's Theatre; and in our journal of next week, we shall present to our readers a portrait of the gifted composer, &c.

MR. FITZWILLIAM'S "STABAT MATER."

Rossini, ay! the great Rossini, was a bold man to attempt a new "Stabat Mater" with Pergolesi before his eyes, or rather in his ears; but Mr. Fitzwilliam is a bolder one still, for he comes into the field indifferent to the pretensions of his two great predecessors. Yet he is not without pretension himself. His style, though based upon the freedom of modern writing, possesses some original traits: many portions of his work we prefer to the much talked of "Stabat" of Rossini, particularly the trio "Sancta Mater" (encored), which is a truly beautiful inspiration of the art. He is, certainly, a composer of considerable genius, and, with a little more learning (for he does not yet know how to develop the resources of a fugue subject), he will do well.

MR. C. E. HORN'S "FALL OF SATAN," Melophonic Society, Music Hall, Store-street.

The popular composer of "Cherry Ripe," "The Deep, Deep Sea," and fifty other cavatinas and ballads, soared a loftier flight on Tuesday evening, and produced an Oratorio entitled "The Fall of Satan," the words from "Milton's Paradise Lost," which was decidedly successful. The music is light and graceful; but, with the exception of one chorus, "The Towers of Heaven," lacks the sublimity which is due to the subject. There were two pieces deservedly honoured with encores, and the ensemble went off most effectively. The composer conducted, Mr. Blagrove led, and Mr. T. Tully presided at the Organ.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Woodcraft, under which head comes hunting, coursing, and shooting, has terminated for the present season to all legitimate intents and purposes—for though hounds continue to be brought out in some districts, even during the month of April, hunting by no means follows as matter of course. Indeed some think, and these disciples of the chase contend, that there is no fox-hunting to be had after Christmas; but these are the ultra-fastidious. Steeple-chasing, a hybrid between the turf and the chase, still goes on—or is supposed to do so, and there is no reason why it should not all the year round, provided the appliances and means are to be had. But it is not sport, and anything but pleasure for those engaged in it. Thus we are, at the present crisis of the year, dependant upon anticipation for our rural recreations, and with this vein turn somewhat anxiously to such sources as furnish materials for hope. A few days ago, produced No. 2 of the Racing Calendar, and it was a sorry sight to read such a notice as this of a race meeting, fixed for the 13th of March, in 50 degrees of north latitude: "In consequence of the severe frost, Warwick Spring Meeting has been postponed till Monday the 7th of April." The sheet from which this is copied contains a great deal of excellent promise—among the rest, in these days of chicken handicaps and curiously economical sweepstakes, the following good old style of match:—"First day of Goodwood Races—Mr. Irwin's Foigh-a-Ballagh, 4 yrs old, 8 st 5 lbs, against Mr. W. Scott's Cataract, 5 yrs old, 6 st 10 lbs—Drawing-room Stakes Course, £1000 each: half forfeit." Of these weights it may be observed that Cataract's is the same at which he is handicapped for the Chester Cup: Foigh-a-Ballagh's 11 lbs less. Were the Irish horse weighted at 6 st 5 lbs for his Chester engagement he would be first favourite—beyond all doubt. Before passing from the subject of the Chester Cup, it may be proper to state that the first of its customary features has already manifested itself in the matter of Zanoni's qualification. According to rumour—for no official announcement relative to it has been made—Mr. Parry, his present proprietor, proposed to enter him for that race as "a horse that came in first for the Derby of 1844, pedigree unknown," which would have been a good entry. This was, it is asserted, objected to by the Messrs. Weatherby, and the nomination was made as it appears—"Zanoni, late Maccabeus;" now, if the evidence adduced on the Running Rein trial is to effect this entry, it seems difficult to anticipate any satisfactory objection being sustained against Zanoni, late Maccabeus. It is true, the animal called Maccabeus, which ran at the Epsom Spring Meeting, 1843, was not "a colt by Gladiator, dam foaled in 1823, by Capsicum, out of Acklam Lass," but a four-year-old, hired of Mr. Ferguson in Ireland as its representative. But if the Zanoni entered for the Chester Cup be the false Running Rein of the late Derby, there should be no difficulty in proving his identity with Maccabeus. It was proved on the part of Colonel Peel, before Mr. Baron Alderson, in the Court of Exchequer, on the first of July last, that the colt which came in first for the Derby, was a bay colt by Gladiator, dam by Capsicum, bred by Sir Charles Ibbotson in 1840, purchased by Mr. Goodman at Doncaster races in 1841, sent from thence to Northampton; thence to the paddock of Mr. Worley, at Siwell, near that town, where it was frequently seen both by Mr. Worley and by Mr. Odell, and where he remained till after Christmas, 1841, and that he continued at Northampton, or in the neighbourhood, till the 21st of September, 1842, when he was led to London, stopping the first night at Woburn, the second at St. Alban's, and the third at Barnet, and that it was this Gladiator colt, and not the Saddler colt, which was delivered at Haynes's stables in Langham-place, on the 24th September, 1842. The identity of the colt which went from Haynes's stables to Smith's, at Epsom, to be trained, and the horse which came first in for the Derby, was not disputed. This is pretty clear evidence that Zanoni—if the Running Rein of last year, is the true Simon Pure named for the forthcoming handicap at Chester, where the family of the Capsicums seem fated to play conspicuous parts.

We have been thus particular in having the identity of this horse, because we hold him remarkably well in for the Chester Cup, and because, seeing how clearly his pedigree has been already brought home to him, we consider him a safe investment—so far as regards any objection that may be urged against qualification. In the betting department it will be seen that anticipation has been set aside for certainty. Both the Chester Cup and the Derby have been the best speculations the book-makers have known for many a year. Manufactures flourish at this particular period—hardly an article of consumption bears a more remunerating price than the odds. Both wholesale dealers and the retail trade are carrying on a roaring business in them.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A full attendance, and business, if not quite up to the mark, more lively than we have known it this side Christmas. Of changes, however, we have not much to say; an improvement in Semiseria, The Era, Obscurity, and Queen of the Tyne, and a decline in Cataract, having been all the noticeable movements in the Chester Cup; and a liberal outlay on Clear-the-Way (at an improved quotation), Cobweb colt, Mentor, and a few outsiders, the only really important features in the speculations on the Derby. The single bet quoted in the Oaks is ominous of the weakness of the Danebury stable.

THURSDAY.—Some small bets were laid on the Chester Cup, but without producing any noticeable effect on the prices, except in the instance of the Queen of Tyne, who quietly receded to 40 to 1. The Derby transactions were of more importance, Pam, Idas, Clear-the-Way, Mentor, Pantasa, Newsmonger, Young Eclipse, Cabin Boy, Old England, and Annandale having been backed with considerable spirit; we ought to add, however, that Clear-the-Way was not so strongly fancied as on Monday, and that the opponents of the Cobweb colt were too powerful to be resisted. THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE ROWING MATCH.

Five times previous to the present issue, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had sent forth their picked crews to contend for glory on the Thames—an Alma Mater struggle for honours, wherein oars were substituted for skulls. In the years 1836, 39, 40, and 41, the men of Granta were victorious. In 1842 the Oxonians won, whereupon the champions of Cam sent defiance to their conquerors, and the 15th of March, 1845, was named for settling differences. The day was one which promised to settle the rival candidates as well as their pretensions, for the wind was as sharp as a Damascus blade, and the temperature as cold as Poor-law charity. The match created furore in the aquatic circles, as it is written in the broad sheets—and every man with a taste for the water beyond a tailor's goose, resolved to see Young England's jolly young watermen essay their devoir. To this intent vast multitudes in pilot coats and the bluest of noses made rendezvous at Searle's, the eminent boat contrivers of Lambeth, to embark on board the Mystery steamer, chartered by the firm to attend the race. She had been, however, early taken possession of by river pirates, disorderly and discourteous Cockneys, who vowed to stick by the ship as long as she swam—a tenure the captain seemed to think would be a short one, for she heeled awfully, and exposed her nether extremity in a way that was quite shocking. Still perhaps it was as well as it fell out: for our own part, we felt it was quite as comfortable, and infinitely more in keeping, to undertake, as we did, a metropolitan water party in one of Hansom's patent cabs. Thus, in company with some hundreds similarly conveyed, we reached the Bells, at Putney, soon after four—five P.M. being the hour named for the start. The house was as thronged as a bee-hive, and cut a most amphibious appearance, for while one moiety of its guests was fitted out with drab Chesterfields, slap-up bird's-eye fogles and hunting whips, as if bound for the uncarting of a Royal stag, the other was got up, to all seeming, for the first business of a melodrama of the sea, as Sweet Williams, Long Tom Coffins, Poll and my Partner Joes, and the like. The scions of Oxford were distinguished by rosettes of light blue on their sinister breasts; those of Cambridge by bows of purple in the same spots, and all by the azure—the intensity of blue of their probosces—as aforesaid. If there was any betting we heard none of it, but were assured that Oxford had gone back to 6 to 4 discount, from having been at that amount of premium. It was now past six, and the night was setting in fast, and the champions of Isis and Cam appeared in their wager boats and shirt sleeves

At the scurry to pick up their boats, it struck us that the stroke-oar of Cambridge caught a "crab," and thus they got the worst of the start. Both crews went to work as if they meant mischief, and finer rowing was never seen—Oxford to keep the lead, and Cambridge to overhaul them. But woe is us! for we are of Oxford—Oxonian—short-lived are our hopes:—

'Tis all in vain; the glory of the Isis
By Granta's might demolished in a trice is!

Abreast Finch's cricket ground the Cambridge crew were alongside their antagonists—passed, and then drew clear of them a good boat's length ahead. Then rose a shout such as Themis never heard—a cry that affrighted Echo:

Never such a sound before
To the Indian waves she bore:
A pilot asleep on the howling sea
Leap'd up from the deep in agony,
And heard, and cried "Ah, woe is me!"
And died as mad as the wild waves be.

At Hammersmith the Cantabs were three lengths before Oxford, and with a beautiful stroke oar mingled with oar like notes in harmony, they continued to improve their distance to the goal—Mortlake Church—which they passed some eight or nine boats lengths first. Perhaps, for so it appeared to us, the Oxonians were below the mark; at all events they rowed under a great disadvantage; regard being had to the nature of the craft. They weighed upwards of three stone more than the Cambridge crew, a damper which must have sunk the Nautilus shell in which they navigated, inches deeper than the water-line of their adversaries. Nevertheless it was a manly meeting, and when the return match comes off at the Thames Regatta in the summer, no doubt a treat will be afforded those who are "there to see."

GALLOPPING MATCH AGAINST TIME.—EXTRAORDINARY PERFORMANCE.—An event, which created considerable interest in sporting circles, many persons being present from the metropolis, came off on Monday afternoon on the Bath-road, between Slough and Colnbrook, a match having been made by the proprietor of one of the principal hotels at Windsor, to ride his horse, an animal not more than 14 hands and one inch in height, 24 miles in one hour and a half. Time was backed to a considerable amount. In consequence of the unfavourable state of the road, the odds, at starting, were 4 to 3 and 3 to 2 against the horse. At the start, which took place between two and three o'clock, the horse went away in beautiful style, and won the match, with upwards of eight minutes to spare, without showing symptoms of the least distress. The horse had just fifteen minutes to perform the last mile and a half in. It was most admirably ridden; and there is no doubt, with a lighter weight on its back (its rider weighing nearly 14 stone), it would get over 26 miles of ground in the same time, with the greatest ease. Considerable sums of money changed hands upon the occasion.

THAMES REGATTA.—A meeting of the subscribers to the Thames Regatta was held on Wednesday evening, at the British Coffee-house, Cockspur-street, for the purpose of electing officers for the ensuing year. Mr. J. D. Bishop took the chair, and after congratulating the gentlemen on the success that had hitherto attended their labours, acknowledged, with warmth, the distinguished patronage with which they had been honoured, and communicated with much pleasure the increased support of Alderman Lucas and Alderman Johnson; the latter of whom had consented to be treasurer for a purse about to be given by the ladies for competition at the next Thames Regatta. After some further observations, in which he alluded to the gallant University race of Saturday, the chairman proposed that the committee should for the future consist of eight instead of six gentlemen. The gentlemen having unanimously assented to this suggestion, Mr. J. D. Bishop, vice president; Mr. E. Antrobus, treasurer; Mr. T. L. Jenkins, hon. sec.; Messrs. C. J. Selwyn, E. Maberley, A. Julius, A. Shaden, M. H. Morris, and T. Mersam (Captain of the R. T. Y. C.), were re-elected; and Mr. Wood and Mr. D. Howard added to the number. The result was received with evident satisfaction by the assemblage. The necessity of continued support in order to give the 100 guineas prize for four-oared boats, open to all the world, this season, with an earnest request that subscribers would not delay their contributions, was insisted on.

IMPROMPTU TO EOLINE!

Sweet Eoline!
In thee is seen
The form of Dryad as of old:—
Ne'er was fairer woodland daughter
Mirror'd in the glassy water.
By the moonbeam cold!
Thy bound is like the fawn's
Across the silver'd lawns
Scarce brushing off the dew—
Thy smile is what the roses wear
When shaking off the morning's tear,
Thy cheek as lovely too!
Who would not dwell
In sylvan cell,
If to his leafy home,
On summer nights
Such gentle sprites
In fairy dance would come!

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Augsburg Gazette states, on the authority of letters from Rome, that Queen Christina of Spain has written to the King of Naples, urging him to send the Count de Trapani, who is now at Rome, to Madrid, in order that he may be at hand to profit by any arrangement that might be made for a marriage with the young Queen.

A new colliery has been opened at Byer's-green, near Durham, on which occasion great rejoicings took place in the village. The event was celebrated by a small party of the neighbouring coal owners dining at the Granby Arms, Mr. T. C. Gibson, of Newcastle, presiding.

Rodwell, the musical composer, and dramatic author, who wrote "Teddy the Tiler," "My Wife's Out," and other successful dramas, will shortly appear in a new character, that of a novelist. He has just concluded the third volume of a new work on a very original construction.

A few nights ago, says the Mémorial of Rouen, an English workman in that city turned his wife out of doors, and in the morning she was found dead of cold.

According to a Vienna letter of the 10th, the convulsed state of Switzerland has induced the Austrian government to send a force of between 3500 and 4000 men, under the command of Count Lechnowsky, to reinforce the Austrian garrisons on the Swiss frontiers.

A letter from Altona, dated March 12, says, the directors of our railway intend to form a junction with the Elbe, by an atmospheric line branch. They have already entered into negotiations with Mr. Samuda.

The Courrier du Bas Rhin of March 15, states that during the preceding 24 hours a more abundant snow had fallen than during the whole winter. The roads were encumbered, and communication difficult. The Strasburgh and Basle Railroad was almost impassable. The trains arrived three hours after their time.

In consequence of the repeal of the duty on glass, the bottle manufacturers have determined to reduce the price from 42s. the gross of twelve dozen bottles to 26s. the gross. This will make bottles cheap enough, and it will, no doubt, have some effect on the price of the cheaper kinds of liquor sold in bottles, such as ale, porter, cider, soda water, and so forth; and it will, no doubt, lead to a great increase in the manufacture.

According to accounts from Naples, dated March 1, great injury has been caused in Italy during the last few weeks from rainfloods, thunderstorms, and hurricanes. The province of Calabria has suffered most considerably, the torrents from the mountains tearing with them trees, masses of rock, houses and gardens. In Sicily, between Messina and Catania, the lately begun repairs of the roads were entirely destroyed by the floods. Conflagrations have been caused in many places by the lightning. On the other side however, this wet winter gives well grounded hopes of a plentiful harvest.

The Grand Dukes of Saxe Coburg and Gotha, Saxe Weimar, and Saxe Meiningen, have come to an understanding relative to having a railroad constructed through their dominions which is to join the Main and Weser lines, with a branch towards Bamberg, in Bavaria. A railroad is in contemplation from Leghorn to Grosseto and Pontrimonti, which is to be extended towards the Lombardo-Venetian States. The projects for railroads in Tuscany are very numerous.

CHELSEA BUNS were first made early in the last century: they are mentioned by Swift in 1712. George II., III., and their families frequented the Bun-house, and Queen Charlotte presented the proprietor with a silver mug and fifty guineas. On Good Fridays, upwards of 50,000 persons congregated here before eight o'clock in the morning. The old Bun-house was pulled down, and its curiosities sold, in 1839.

In the recently published work of M. Thiers, mention is made of the voluminous correspondence of Napoleon. It is computed that 40,000 letters or notes were dictated by him in the course of his public life. There were days on which he dictated as many as a hundred letters. At Osterode, in 1807, in the heart of Poland, and amidst the snows of winter, he wrote, on the same day, to Fouché respecting individuals placed under his surveillance; to Cambaceres on all the affairs and documents connected with the Council of State; to Joseph, King of Naples, to Louis, King of Holland, on the art of reigning in new countries; to Madame Campan, on female education; to Murat, on the organization of the cavalry; to the generals of the engineering department on the fortress of Alessandria; and to Berthollet, for whom he professed the greatest affection, sending him 150,000 francs to assist him in his difficulties.

At the Central Criminal Court last week a lad, named Singleton, was indicted for stealing a loaf, value 5d., the property of his master, a baker. The Common Sergeant observed that the indictment would not do. It stated that "a loaf" had been stolen, without setting forth whether it was a loaf of bread or a loaf of sugar. The prisoner must be acquitted.——In a case of sheep-stealing which was tried at the last Maidstone assizes, it was urged that a lamb is not a sheep, and, though a verdict of guilty was recorded that the prisoner had stolen a lamb, the learned Judge reserved the point for the opinion of the Judges.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our report on this day se'nnight, only a moderate arrival of English wheat has taken place for our market; hence the show of samples has been by no means large. Although the attendance of both town and country dealers has been only scanty, the demand for nearly every description of wheat of home produce has ruled firm, and previous rates have been readily supported; indeed, in some few instances, rather more money has been paid for selected parcels of both red and white. In foreign wheat, free of duty, a good business is doing, but we can notice no alteration in value. Bonded grain almost nominal. The best malting barley in request, at full currencies; but grinding and distilling sorts are heavy. Malt, oats, beans, peas, and flour have sold slowly, at about late rates. The advices received from the Baltic ports since our last, state that the trade with all kinds of grain still continues extremely dull, notwithstanding that prices rule very low. In consequence of the unremunerative quotations here, the shipments of oats from the various Irish ports have been trifling of late.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 46s to 48s; ditto, white, 46s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 38s to 43s; ditto, white, 40s to 47s; rye, 30s to 36s; grinding barley, 27s to 30s; distilling, 26s to 30s; malting ditto, 33s to 35s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 58s to 63s; brown ditto, 56s to 60s; Kingston and Ware, 52s to 60s; Chevalier, 65s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 22s to 23s; potatoe ditto, 23s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s to 22s; ditto, white, 21s to 23s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 38s to 40s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 35s to 36s; white, 33s to 35s; boilers, 36s to 38s, per quarter. Town made flour, 42s to —; Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire, 33s to 35s, per 28 lb. Foreign.—Fine wheat, —s to —s; Dantzig, red, 38s to 43s; white, 50s to 54s. In Bond.—Barley, 20s to 24s; oats, 17s to 18s; ditto, feed, 16s to 17s; beans, 24s to 29s; peas, 28s to 32s, per quarter. Flour, American, 19s to —; Baltic, 18s to—, per barrel

Seed Market.—Canary seed is in very heavy request, and prices are with difficulty supported. In all other kinds of seeds comparatively little is doing, at late rates.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed English, sowing, 52s to 58s; Baltic, crushing, 40s to 45s; Mediterranean and Odessa —s to —s. Hempseed, 35s to 38s, per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 18s, per cwt. Brown Mustard seed, 8s to 14s; white ditto, 10s to 13s. Tares, 6s to 7s 6d, per bushel. English Rapeseed, new, £24 to £26, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £13 to £13 5s. per 1000: Rapeseed cakes £6 15s to £7, per ton. Canary, 42s to 48s, per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the Metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 45s 1d; barley, 32s 2d oats, 21s 4d; rye, 31s 1d; beans, 34s 7d; peas, 35s 8d.

Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 45s 2d; barley, 32s 4d; oats, 21s 6d; rye, 30s 8d; beans, 34s 10d; peas, 35s 5d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 6s; oats, 6s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 8s 6d; peas, 7s 6d.

Tea.—During the week public sales of about 8000 packages of tea have been brought forward About 1800 packages have found buyers—Canton-made Imperials and Gunpowders at a decline of 2d; middling and fair Hysons, 1d to 2d; and Souchongs, 1d per lb. Privately, only a limited business is doing, and prices have a downward tendency.

Sugar.—This market has been in a somewhat excited state since our last, owing to the new duties coming into operation. Privately, as well as at auction, a large business has been doing in nearly every description, at full prices, making allowance for the difference in the duties. Brown lumps have sold at 65s to 66s, and standard ditto 67s per cwt.

Coffee.—Although rather more coffee has been brought forward since our last, a better feeling has prevailed in the demand, and prices have been generally supported. Good ordinary Ceylon has sold at 46s to 47s per cwt.

Rice.—Madras is in brisk request, and prices have improved 6d per cwt. All other kinds of rice have an upward movement.

Fruit.—There is more business doing in currants, at 50s to 52s per cwt—being rather dearer. In other kinds of fruit comparatively little is passing.

Provisions.—The supply of Irish butter being small, arising from the continuance of easterly winds, the demand for that article has somewhat improved, and prices must be quoted 1s to 2s per cwt dearer. Cork, Carlow, and Clonmel have sold at 90s to 100s; Limerick, 95s to 98s; and Sligo, 90s to 98s per cwt, landed. Nearly the whole of the late imports of foreign butter have been disposed of, at an advance of 2s to 3s per cwt. The best qualities of bacon have sold at 1s per cwt more money; but other kinds have ruled dull, at barely late rates. Small Waterford, landed, has sold at 40s to 45s; heavy, 40s to 42s; and prime Limerick, sizeable, 40s to 43s per cwt. A few forward contracts have been made at 44s to 45s for small Waterford this and next month. Lard and all other provisions rule about stationary.

Oils.—We have to report a very limited inquiry for linseed oil, on easier terms. All other oils are unaltered in value.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; useful ditto, £4 12s to £5 4s; fine upland ditto, £5 5s to £5 10s; clover hay, £4 10s to £6 0s; oat straw, £1 16s to £1 19s; wheat straw, £2 0s to £2 2s, per load.

Coals.—Adair's, 15s 6d; Carr's Hartley, 16s 6d; Old Pontop, 15s; Ord's Redheugh, 15s; Tanfield Moor, 19s; Townley, 16s; Stewart's, 21s 3d; Gosforth, 18s 9d per ton.

Tallow.—This market is still in a very depressed state, and prices are with difficulty supported. P.Y.C., on the spot, is selling at 38s 6d to 38s 9d; town tallow, 39s to 40s per cwt—the latter net cash.

Hops.—Fine parcels of hops continue in fair request, at extreme rates; but all other qualities are inactive, at barely previous quotations.

Wool.—The best foreign and colonial parcels, including English, move off freely, and prices are supported without difficulty.

Potatoes.—The best Scotch and York reds command a ready inquiry, at from 60s to 80s per ton, but all other kinds of potatoes are extremely inactive.

Smithfield (Friday).—This being what is termed the Great Lamb Market, there was rather a numerous attendance of both London and country buyers at an early hour; but the result of the trade was such as to disappoint the expectations of the graziers. Prime down qualities were, however, in steady request at from 5s 10d to 6s per 8lb; but all other descriptions of lamb were extremely dull at from 5s to 5s 8d, and a clearance was not effected without much difficulty. The numbers, per railway, from the Isle of Wight, embraced 200; from other quarters about 5000 head. The general quality of the lambs was by no means first-rate The numbers of beasts—amongst which were 30 oxen and cows from Holland, and 70 Scots from Aberdeen—were more than adequate to meet the wants of the butchers; however the beef trade, notwithstanding the coldness of the weather, was heavy, at a decline of 2d per 8lbs. Sheep, the supply of which was seasonably extensive, commanded a steady, though not to say brisk, inquiry, at Monday's currencies. The veal trade, from the number of calves being good, was very dull, yet prices were mostly supported. In pigs, only a limited business was doing, at previous quotations. Milch cows moved off slowly, at from £15 to £19 each.

Per 8lbs. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 4d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 2d; prime large oxen, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 8d to 3s 10d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 6d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; large coarse calves, 3s 10d to 4s 6d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; large hogs, 3s 0d to 3s 8d; neat small porkers, 3s 10d to 4s 4d; suckling calves, 18s 0d to 30s 0d; and quarter old store pigs, 16s 0d to 20s 0d each; lambs, 5s 0d to 6s 0d. Beasts, 550; cows, 150; sheep and lambs, 8100; calves, 176; pigs, 315.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had fair average supplies of meat on sale here today, while the demand was heavy, at our quotations:—Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d; prime large ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime small ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; large pork, 2s 10d to 3s 6d; inferior mutton, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; prime ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 10d to 4s 10d; small pork, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; lamb, 5s to 6s—per 8lbs, by the carcass.

ROBERT HERBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Yesterday being Good Friday was observed as a close holiday at the Bank of England, Stock Exchange, and all banking establishments.

The English Market during the week has scarcely varied; in fact, such an absence of business has been scarcely ever remembered. It has now continued nearly a month, and unless a fall in prices takes place, there seems no probability of any revival. The only transactions of any consequence are done in the Railway Market, to which the speculators have had recourse, from the total impossibility of acting on the English Market, while the present range of prices exist. Consols on Monday closed at 99⅜ ⅞ for money, and this is the final quotation for the week. India Stock is about 284 for money. Bank Stock for the opening quotes 216 to 217; India Bonds, 73s premium; and Exchequer Bills have fallen from 65 to 67 (Monday's price), to 60, 59, 62. Consols for account, 100.

The settlement on Tuesday ended satisfactorily, and Spanish, Mexican, and Portuguese, maintained their prices with tolerable firmness. Speculation, however, to any extent, is regarded now as quite an unusual occurrence in this market, the dealers generally operating with great caution. There was a slight decline in the prices of Spanish on Wednesday, from parties taking advantage of the state of the market to realise. Towards the close of the week, however, prices rallied, and the closing quotations stood, for the Actives, 30½; Passives, 7¼; Three per Cents, 40⅝. Mexican supports its advance, and closes at 37 to 36⅝; Portuguese is firm at 68¾; and Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents are 63⅝; Four per Cent Certificates, 99½ to ¼.

The absence of business in the English and Foreign Funds has been more than counterbalanced in the Railway Market. Settling commenced on Saturday last, but so great was the number of transactions, in the various lines, that it was only concluded on Wednesday. Prices upon the whole have since been better; money becoming easier towards the close of the account, which while in progress tends to limit business, and thus render the market flat. Caledonians do not maintain their advance; Rugby, Worcester, and Tring, on the contrary, are in better demnad at improved quotations. London and York shares have declined to 3¼ ⅜. Direct Northern, on the contrary, continue to improve. Dovers are flat. The Directors of the Diss, Beccles, and Yarmouth projected lines have allied themselves to the Eastern Union Railway, subject, of course, to the passing of their bill. The business during the week (excepting the settlement) has not been large, many of the principal jobbers and brokers having left town for the holidays. The closing quotations mark as follows:—Birmingham and Gloucester, 133; Bristol and Exeter, 83; Caledonian, 9⅞; Cambridge and Lincoln, 6⅞; Churnet Valley, 7; Direct Northern, 4⅜; Diss, Beccles, and Yarmouth, 1⅞; Dublin and Galway, 3; Eastern Counties, 21⅞; Eastern Union, 10; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 63; Great North of England, 195; Great Western (half-shares), 101½; Guilford, Farnham and Portsmouth, 5½; Lancaster and Carlisle, 35½; Birmingham Stock, 135; Brighton, 63½; Croydon, 17⅞; Greenwich, 10⅜; South Western, 80; Midlands, 139¾; Manchester and Leeds, 148; Newcastle and Berwick, 14⅜; North British, 17; Richmond and West End Junction, 3½; Rugby, Worcester, and Tring, 4¼; Scottish Midland, 2⅜; Shrewsbury, Wolverhampton, &c., 4½; Dover, 43⅜; South Wales, 6¼; Trent Valley, 17¼; York and North Midland, 103; Boulogne and Amiens, 12; Bordeaux and Toulouse, 2¾; Ditto and Cette, 2⅜; Great Northern of France, 6; Lyons and Avignon, 3½; Orleans and Bordeaux, 10⅝; Orleans and Vierzon, 18⅜; Paris and Lyons (Lafitte's), 4⅝; Ditto (Ganneron's), 2⅜; Rouen and Havre, 32; Tours and Nantes, 2⅝; Strasburg and Bale, 14.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. LIII.

CHRIST-CHURCH, NEWGATE-STREET.—SPITAL SERMONS AT EASTER.

This Illustration will be interesting as the locality of a seasonable observance—for, in this church, the "Spital Sermons," as they are called, are now delivered annually on the Monday and Tuesday in Easter week.

Before we describe the church, let us glance at the origin of the Spital Sermons," of which the Rev. Mr. Trollope, in his valuable "History of Christ's Hospital," gives a very minute account. It appears that a custom had long prevailed, according to which some learned person was appointed yearly by the Bishop of London to preach at St. Paul's Cross on Good Friday, on the subject of "Christ's Passion:" on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday following, three other divines were, in like manner, appointed to uphold the doctrine of the "Resurrection" at the pulpit-cross in the "Spital." On the Sunday following, a fifth preached at Paul's Cross, passed judgment upon the merits of those who had preceded him, and concluded the solemnity with an exhortation. At these sermons the Lord Mayor and Alderman attended; the ladies, also, on the Monday, forming part of the cavalcade: and at the close of each day's solemnity his Lordship and the Sheriffs gave a private dinner to such of their friends among the Aldermen as attended the sermon. From this practice the civic festivities at Easter were, at length, extended to the scale of expensive magnificence on which they are now conducted.

The children of Christ's Hospital formed an integral part of the above solemnities; so that, in the year 1594, when it became necessary to rebuild the pulpit-cross at the Spital, a gallery was also erected for their accommodation. In the Great Rebellion, the pulpit was destroyed, and the sermons were discontinued till the Restoration; after which the three Spital Sermons, as they were still called, were revived at St. Bride's Church, in Fleet-street. They have since been reduced to two, which, from the year 1797, have been delivered in Christ-Church, Newgate-street; though it is known that their object is materially altered from that for which they were originally designed. It was at their first appearance at the Spital, that the children of Christ's Hospital were clad in the blue costume by which they have since been distinguished.

Instead of the subjects which were wont to be discussed from the pulpit-cross of St. Mary Spital, discourses are now delivered, commemorative of the objects of the five sister hospitals, and a report is read of the number of children maintained and educated, and of sick, disorderly, and lunatic persons, for whom provision is made in each respectively. On each day, the boys of Christ's Hospital, with the legend, attached to their left shoulders, form part of the civic procession; walking, on the first day, in the order of their schools, the King's boys bearing their nautical instruments; and, on the second, according to their several wards, headed by their nurses. They formerly assembled on the Monday, in the square of the Royal Exchange; their subsequent visit to the Mansion House was engraved in No. 101 of our journal.

"He is Risen,"

CHRIST-CHURCH, NEWGATE-STREET.

It is usual for a junior Bishop to preach on the Monday, and a Clergyman, selected by the Mayor, on the Tuesday; and, on both occasions, an anthem, composed by the head-master, and set to music by the organist, is sung by the children. This anthem is also sung in the hall, at the public supper, on Easter Sunday. In the year 1799, the Spital Sermon, on Easter Tuesday, was preached by the celebrated Dr. Parr, who is said to have been occupied nearly three hours in its delivery.

The present Christ-Church was built by Wren, between the years 1687 and 1704; and occupies part of the site of the ancient Grey Friars Church, which was destroyed by the fire of 1666. The dimensions of Wren's church are 114 feet in length, 81 feet in breadth, and 38 feet in height; the altitude of the steeple being 153 feet: it has the appearance rather of a succession of parts, piled one upon the other, than of one harmonious and well-agreeing whole. Nevertheless, the tower is well proportioned, and rises, as all Wren's towers do rise, and as all towers should rise, directly from the ground, giving to the mind of the beholder that assurance of stability, which, under other circumstances, is wanting. The tower likewise displays considerable inventive power; the basement story is open on three sides, and forms a porch to the church. The remainder of the exterior presents no remarkable features.

The interior consists of a nave and two aisles, divided by small Corinthian columns: the ceiling of the nave is arched or wagon-headed, and has groined openings to admit twelve clere-story windows, adorned with cherubims, scrolls, &c. There are galleries in the aisles; and at the west end is a large gallery, which is appropriated for the Christ-Church boys, and contains a large organ. The pulpit is carved in panels, and the font of marble, richly sculptured. In the church lie the remains of Baxter, the Non-Conformist divine, and a few other persons of note.

The Rhine, on which there had several times been floating ice, was at length fairly frozen over on the night of the 8th instant near Mayence. The weather continued to be extremely severe in all this part of the continent.

THE WEATHER.—A favourable change in the weather took place on Tuesday. Throughout the day there was a gentle thaw, the sky being clear and the sun shining with gre at power, until about four o'clock in the afternoon, when it again became cloudy, and, the wind veering more to the N., the temperature became much colder. In the evening, at six o'clock, there was a cloudy sky, with the wind N.N.W., and the thermometer at 32 degrees (freezing point). In the parks and Kensington-gardens there was very little skating, owing to the progress of the thaw. There is no authentic account of such severe frost at so late a period of the year. In 1434 there was a very early frost, said to have commenced on the 24th of November, which lasted until the 10th of February following; and others in the years 1515, 1606, 1739, 1766, and 1768—all of which were so severe as to freeze the Thames, yet none of them lasted beyond the month of January or February; but this frost commenced on the night of December 4, and continued, with but a trifling variation, during the night, below the freezing point till Tuesday last. The temperature on the 13th inst. 3½ degrees below the freezing point, although the "Sun" thermometer indicated 42. So remarkable a circumstance at this advanced period is unprecedented. The weather indicates a continuance of cold north-easterly winds, which may be expected to be very severe as the sun approaches the line.

LIBRARY OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

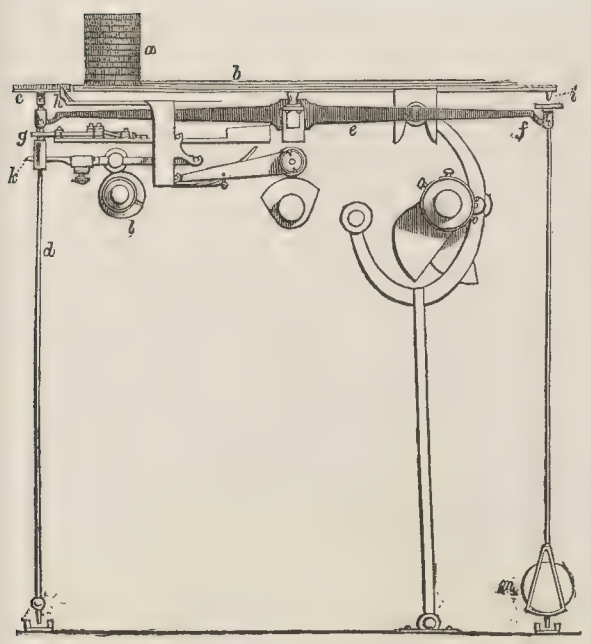
The great increase which has recently taken place in the publication of Parliamentary Reports, has made the Libraries of the Houses of Lords and Commons, places of considerable resort and importance. There the multitudinous "Blue Books" of each session may be consulted, along with those legal documents and historic precedents which give to written evidence a constitutional value unknown in other countries. The want of such establishments was first felt during the Chancellorship of Lord Eldon, when it was considered that the judicial business of the House of Lords suffered many delays from the want of a Parliamentary Library of Reference; and it was therefore determined to establish one which should contain copies of all the papers of the Houses of Parliament for the use of the Peers—both spiritual, law, and lay lords. A similar one was formed for the Commons.

The Library of the House of Lords—to which we shall restrict our description—was erected in 1826, after designs by Mr. Soane; and it bears everywhere, unmistakeable marks of his impoverished genius.

The building consists of two rooms, the Library, a nobly proportioned apartment, and the Small Library which joins it: the former is nearly square in its plan, of lofty height, recessed at the end, and lighted chiefly from the coves of the ceiling. The walls are filled with book-shelves, arranged with due regard to economy of space and convenience of access—conditions which are too often violated in similar structures. Between the upper and lower tiers, a fine series of maps on rollers are placed for reference. Beside the reports which constitute so important a feature in the collection of works, the books are chiefly those on legal subjects, journals of debates, commissions &c. &c. A few standard publications of the general history of the three kingdoms, the colonies, colonial dependencies, biographies, and the like, complete the English collection; but, in addition to these, a very perfect series of the recent papers and parliamentary documents of the French Chambers, printed by order of the Government, and presented by it to this country, enriches the Library, and adds greatly to its store of modern information. Along with these, some of the noblest productions of the French press—as the "Description de L'Egypte," also the gifts of the French Governments—aid the general objects of the establishment, and contribute, not a little, to the beauty of its shelves.

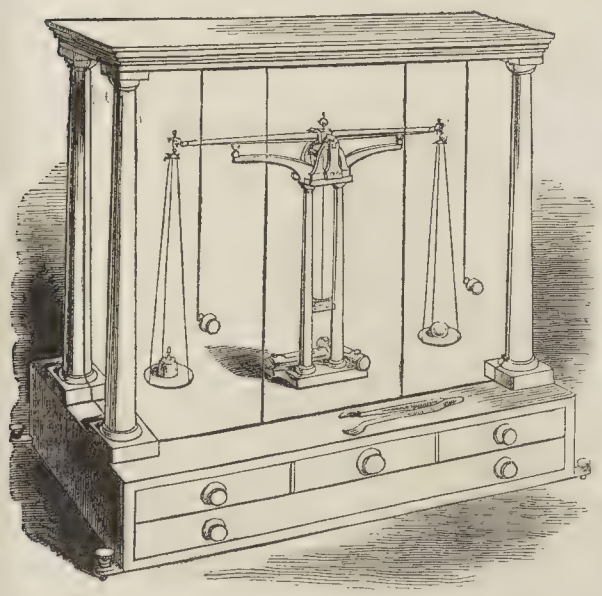
LIBRARY OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Library is open during the recess as well as through the session; and it is so situated in the Grand Corridor, as to be easily approached from the house, committee rooms, and offices.



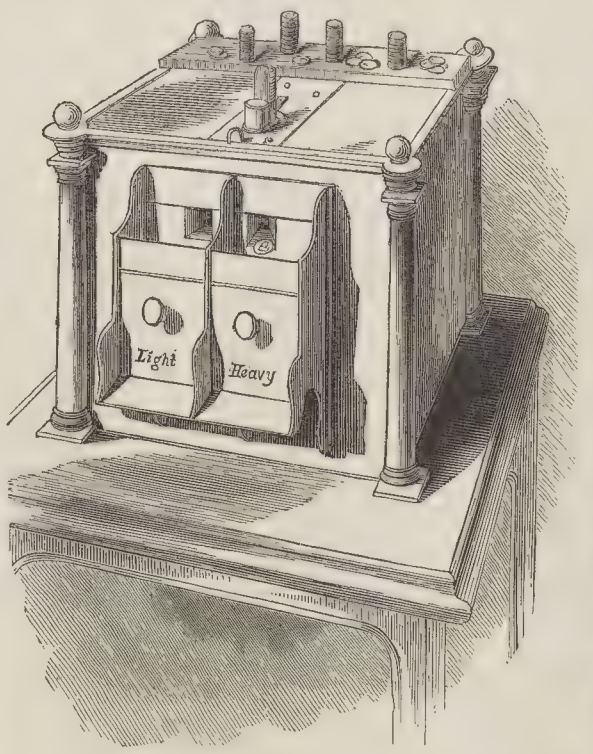
Our engraving presents a fine view of the larger of the two Library Rooms.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS. — The new line of road from Oxford-street to Holborn is named, by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, Oxford-street, of which it is a continuation. For the sake of distinction, and to prevent the necessity of altering the numbers of the houses in the former, it will be called Oxford-street East. The last house in Leicester-square, to be removed in the formation of Cranbourn-street, which connects Coventry-street with Long Acre, will soon be levelled with the ground, and it is expected that the road will be open for traffic in about a month.



THE WEIGHING OFFICE, AT THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

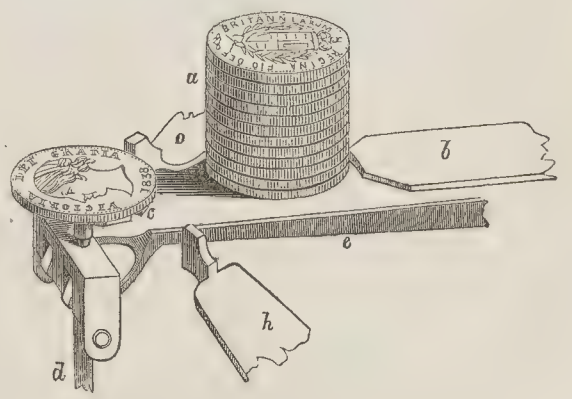
SOVEREIGN WEIGHING MACHINE, BANK OF ENGLAND.



SECTION OF THE WORKS OF THE BALANCE.

BATE'S SCALES FOR TESTING SOVEREIGN WEIGHTS.

We resume our Illustrations of this most important establishment, with the details of the machines by which the coinage is weighed at the Bank, and which present some inventions of rare mechanical skill.



Before we describe the Weighing Office, it will be necessary to mention some of the causes which led to its establishment. There are, and always have been, great difficulties attendant upon the operation of weighing; and these, of course, increase as the nearest approach to accuracy becomes more and more desirable—we say the nearest approach to accuracy, because perfect accuracy in weighing is an object not to be attained. The perfect weight, and the just balance, do not belong to man. The balance possessed by the Royal Society, with 1000 grains in each scale, will be sensibly affected by the 1000th of a grain—that is to say, with one millionth of the mass to be weighed; but within that amount it is liable to error. The balance made by Mr. Bate, now in use at the Bank for testing weights, with 120 grains in each scale, is sensibly affected by the 10,000th of a grain or one million two hundred thousandth part of the whole mass to be weighed; yet it would be liable to error within that amount. An approach to accuracy is, therefore all that can be hoped for.

In June, 1842, a proclamation was issued, premising that a great portion of the gold coinage had become depreciated by wear below the current weight of 5 pennyweights, 2½ grains, and commanding all persons to cut and deface such sovereigns as were found to be below that weight. This, as might be imagined, produced a great commotion in the trading community. Shopkeepers provided themselves with weights and scales; but as no weights could be procured alike, and as every balance gave a slightly different result, nobody was satisfied, and there was almost sure to be a wrong sustained either by the buyer or the seller. The Bank for its own protection had always weighed singly all gold coins presented at its counters; but, except in a time similar to that of 1842,

ENLARGED VIEW OF THE END OF THE BALANCE.

very minute accuracy was not sought for. But at that time, from the general discrepancy of weights and scales, the Bank was naturally looked to by the public for the ultimate decision, and sovereigns of doubtful weight were poured in from all parts to be exchanged for notes. The daily papers teemed with complaints that sovereigns were issued at some of the counters of the Bank which were refused at others. These complaints were in some instances not without foundation, although the MACHINE FOR CUTTING SOVEREIGNS.

Governors of the Bank did all in their power to prevent it, by procuring new weights from the Mint, and the best scales the scalemakers could provide.

At this time the Bank had nearly 8,000,000 of sovereigns in the coffers; and that no light ones might be issued to the public, the Governors caused their whole stock to be re-weighed singly—an immense amount of labour; and a large quantity of light, and sovereigns of a doubtful character, separated from the stock, were sold as bullion; and the loss, which was very considerable, was sustained by the Bank. It was then that the present Governor of the Bank, Mr. Cotton, a gentleman of great scientific attainments, devoted much time and attention to this subject—first, to discover the causes of the error; and secondly, to provide a remedy. The causes he found to be currents of air acting unequally upon the scale-pans; a constant diminution of the weight of one of the pans by the act of placing and displacing the sovereigns to be weighed, by which the equipoise was every moment destroyed; adhesion of the scale-pans to the counter; difference in the rate of vibration of the beams of the scales; difference in the judgment of the weighers; failing of the eyesight; flagging of the attention, from the monotony of the employment; defects of principle inherent in the construction of the common scales, such as could be used for the purpose; difference in the weights, notwithstanding the Mint stamp, of no small amount, considering the degree of accuracy required.

These, and many other sources of error, not easy to describe here, which seemed at first irremediable, are all effectually overcome by a machine which was the result of Mr. Cotton's labour and ingenuity. When we remember the loud outcry made against the Bank on this account, we think it but fair to state some of the difficulties under which it laboured, and but just to Mr. Cotton, for without it many of our readers would not be able to appreciate the value of his invention.

The machine appears to be a square brass box, in the inside of which, secure from currents of air, is the machinery. On the top of the box is a small cylindrical hopper, which will hold about forty sovereigns, and in front of the box are two small apertures, to which are fitted two receivers, one for the soverigns of full weight, and the other for the light. Besides the driving wheel this is all that appears on the outside.

In the inside, very near to the upper plate, is the beam, or balance, of very delicate and beautiful construction. At one end of the beam, and above it, upon a very fine edge, is poised a small platform (c), which receives the sovereign to be weighed. This platform, which is, in fact, one of the scales, is kept in its position by means of a small pendulum (d). In this pendulum, about an inch below the platform, is an oblong perforation, about half an inch long, technically called a slot, in which works freely, up and down, without touching the sides, a small ivory rod (k).

Between the slot and the platform is placed a pair of forceps (g). On the other end of the beam, suspended upon a fine edge, similar to that upon which the platform rides, is a very small round polished plate, and at the bottom of this pendulum, which keeps it poised in its place, is the scale (m) to hold the weights. Above the small round plate, under the top of the box, is fixed an agate (i), with a blunt point. When the machine is set in motion, the small ivory rod is depressed; this touching the bottom of the slot, or opening in the pendulum, in which it works, brings down the beam on that side, and raises it of course on the other, the weight side, until the small round plate on that side touches the blunt agate point. The beam is then in a horizontal position. As soon as this is effected, the forceps catch hold of the pendulum between the platform and the slot, and hold it firmly. The balance is then in a condition to receive the sovereign, which is shifted from the bottom of the pile (a) in the hopper, and brought by means of a slide (b) along a channel, just large enough for a sovereign of the proper standard gold to pass, but not large enough to admit a counterfeit, and deposited upon the platform. The forceps then let go their hold, and the ivory rod is gently raised, and if the sovereign happen to be light, that end of the beam rises, and the other end leaves the agate point; but if the sovereign be full weight, the beam remains stationary, and the small plate on the weight end in contact with the agate point. Supposing the sovereign to be weighed, then comes the operation of removing it. This is effected by a very curious contrivance. There are two bolts (h o) placed at right angles to each other, and on each side of the platform or scale there is a part cut away so as to admit of the bolts striking so far into the area of the platform as to remove anything that would nearly fill it. These bolts are made to strike at different elevations, the lower striking a little before the upper one. If the sovereign be full weight, the scale remains down, and then the lower bolt (o), which strikes a little before the upper, knocks it off into the full weight box. If the sovereign be light it rises up, and the first bolt strikes under it, and misses it, and the higher bolt (h) then strikes and knocks it off in the light box.

This operation, which takes a long time to describe, is performed in about two seconds, as the machine weighs at the rate of 33 per minute.

The weights used in the machine are made of glass, and are nicely adjusted by the trial balance before mentioned.

The advantages thus obtained are the greatest accuracy, great dispatch, with very little expense of manual labour.

The Sovereign Cutting Machine is a simply-constructed apparatus, but remarkable for the nicety and accuracy of its movements, and the rapidity with which its operations are accomplished. It consists of an enclosed inclined plane, at the upper end of which is a tube, open at the sides, used as a receptacle for the sovereigns; and at the other end or mouth of the inclined plane a cutter is attached, which is worked by a handle. The sovereigns, thirty or forty at a time, are placed in the tube, and the slope of the plane is so managed, that the lower one of the heap slips down to the mouth; the cutter being then raised, it moves forward to the lower part or bed of the cutter, and the knife, descending instantaneously, cuts it partially asunder. In the meanwhile another sovereign has arrived at the mouth, and in like manner it comes under the knife. A small tin box is placed beneath the cutter, to receive the defaced coins. In this way a constant stream of sovereigns arrive at the cutter, and then, one by one, with corresponding regularity, they are moved forward to the receptacle prepared for them. The mutilation proceeds at the rate of two hundred in one minute.

An ingenious and novel mode of marking those coins which are cut at the Bank of England is attached to this machine, and has been found of great advantage in preventing disputes respecting the value and weight of defaced money. It consists of a very minute side notch which is given to the coin with every stroke of the cutter, and by this indentation, peculiar to this office, the Bank is at all times able to detect any of its own defacing. The sovereigns are cut through, but not divided, the portions still being attached to each other by one edge.

Letters from Lubeck, of the 8th, state that at a recent meeting of several influential inhabitants, it was resolved to form a committee for the purpose of constructing a railway from that city to Buchen by Möln, with the view of effecting a junction with the Hamburg and Berlin line.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE EXHIBITION of the SOCIETY of BRITISH ARTISTS, SUFFOLK-STREET, PALL MALL EAST, WILL OPEN on MONDAY NEXT, the 24th inst. Admission, One Shilling. Catalogue, One Shilling.

EXPEDITION ROUND THE WORLD, with PASSENGERS ONLY, under the Patronage of distinguished Men of Science in Germany.—The undersigned intends to dispatch from HAMBURG, on 15th AUGUST next, a first-class fast sailing Ship, of about 350 tons register, on an Expedition Round the World, touching and making stays at the following places, viz.:—Portsmouth, Lisbon, Madeira, Teneriffe, Cape Verds or Gambia, Rio de Janeiro, Rio de la Plata, Falkland Islands, Valparaiso, and all the intermediate ports up to Guayaquil, Galapagos, Marquesas, Society, Friendly, and other Islands in the Pacific, on the way to China, Chusan, Hong-Kong, Macao, Whampoa, Canton, Manilla, Singapore, Ceylon, Isle de France or Madagascar, Cape of Good Hope, St. Helena, Ascension Island, Western Islands, and so back to Hamburg. The object of this Expedition is the promotion of Science, the acquirement of knowledge generally, or the gratification which results to enlightened and enquiring minds from distant travel. Respectable Passengers only, and such as are not afflicted with disease, will be received on board. The Ship will not in any way be used for trading purposes, and will be fitted up in the most convenient and comfortable manner for the accommodation of the passengers, with one large Saloon, two apartments for Study, and State Rooms for Sleeping. The Voyage will require about two years, and the Passage Money is fixed at Two Hundred and Seventy Pounds (£270), including Provisions and Wine at Sea and in Port. The Ship will carry an experienced Medical Man. For further particulars apply to Messrs. E. SIEVEKING and SON, 12, Size-lane, City, or to ROBERT M. SLOMAN, in Hamburg.

CAUTION.—MECHI'S MAGIC STROP.—"The real Magic Strop," "The Double Magic Strop," "The Magic Strop," are all base imitations of Mechi's Magic Strop. None are genuine without Mechi's name, which they dare not use; yet, strange to say, many perfumers, calling themselves respectable, endeavour to palm this rubbish (they cost from 3d. to 5d. each in Sheffield) on the public as Mechi's genuine Strop, although they possess no sharpening properties whatever, but the very reverse The well-known Magic Paste is an invaluable auxiliary to Mechi's Strop; its renovating properties are astonishing. Mechi's Razors stand pre-eminent.

SMITH'S UNIQUE and ESTABLISHED PREPARATIONS.—POTOSIAN LIQUID SILVER, 1s. per bottle, restores and perpetuates the beauty of plated articles, by depositing a body of pure silver upon the coppery edges.—GOLD REVIVER, 2s. 6d., restores tarnished gilding.—GOLD VARNISH, 1s. 6d., replaces the gilding, where off.—The METALLIC REVIVER, 1s. 6d., produces the most exquisite brilliancy upon gold and silver plate, removing stains and spots, without labour and without abrasion.—LACKER REVIVER, 1s. 6d., renews or-molu, lacker, and bronze.—SMITH and Co., 231, Strand, opposite Norfolk-street. Wholesale Agents: SUTTON, Bow Churchyard; BELL, York; BIRD, Liverpool; WOOLFIELD, Glasgow; and COLLIE, Aberdeen.

COD LIVER OIL.—This natural Remedy, and certain Cure for GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCROFULA, &c. &c., is, without exception, one of the most valuable discoveries of the present age; it is prepared, by a peculiar process, from the liver of the cod fish, and its efficacy in curing the above complaints, when all other remedies have failed, is attested by the highest medical authorities; so many cases of complete cure have now been published, and so many are daily occurring, that they are now considered as the result of every day practice. Prospectuses, containing a few only of the most remarkable Cures effected, are given with each genuine bottle of this remedy, and bear the signature of the only mercantile Agents, JONES and Co., 20L Strand. Sold by all Medicine Vendors, in bottles, at 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. each.

THE EARL OF ALDBOROUGH AND HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—An astounding cure by this miraculous Medicine after every other means had failed. See Extract of his Lordship's Letter, dated "Villa Messina, Leghorn, February 21st, 1845. To Professor HOLLOWAY—Sir, I beg to acquaint you that your Pills have effected a cure of a disorder in my liver and stomach, which all the most eminent of the Faculty, at home and all over the Continent, had not been able to effect; nay, not even the waters of Carlsbad or Marienbad. Signed, Aldborough."—These wonderful Pills will cure any disease of the liver and stomach. Sold (also HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT) at Professor Holloway's Establishment, 244, Strand (where advice may be had gratis), and by all Medicine Venders throughout the civilised World.

FELTED CARPETS, MANUFACTURED WITHOUT SPINNING AND WEAVING.
CAUTION TO THE TRADE.—THE PATENT WOOLLEN CLOTH COMPANY think it right to inform the trade and the public that an action was brought against Mr. Henry Rawson of Leeds, for manufacturing Felted Cloth and Carpets upon the principle of the Invention under which the Company's Goods are manufactured, and for which a Patent was granted. This Action was tried on Saturday and Monday, the 22nd and 24th of February last, when a Verdict was returned in favour of the plaintiffs, thus establishing the validity of the Patent and its infringement by Mr. Rawson. The Judge having certified that the validity of the Patent came in question, any person now infringing by manufacturing or selling goods so made, will be liable to treble Costs in the event of an action being brought against him, and it is the determination of the Patentees to proceed against all parties who may infringe, either by manufacturing or selling these Goods after this caution.

PATENT BELMONT SPERM CANDLES, One Shilling per lb. PATENT BELMONT SPERM OIL, Four Shillings per Gallon; burning more brilliantly than the ordinary Sperm Candles and Oil, and differing from them in being principally prepared from a pure vegetable material, instead of an impure animal one.—PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES, 10½d per lb. VAUXHALL COMPOSITE CANDLES, 8½d per lb. PATENT BELMONT WAX CANDLES, 1s. per lb.—Families wishing to try any of the above are recommended to order them through their own tradesmen, taking notice, however, that these being the London Cash Prices, the Country Dealer must charge higher to cover his expenses of carriage Where no dealer can be found willing to sell them, EDWARD PRICE & Co. will supply quantities of not less than £5 worth, direct from their manufactory, at Belmont, Vauxhall. On receiving a Post-office Order for this amount, they will forward Candles and Oil in the proportions that may be directed; or, to parties wishing for samples and unable to obtain them, they will, on receiving a £1 Post-office Order, forward a box containing three pounds of each of the four sorts of Candles, and a gallon of the Oil. They fix the price of the sample box so high, to avoid all suspicion of their wishing to interfere with the retail trade of the country dealers.—The Trade may obtain the above Candles and Oil wholesale, in London, from Edward Price & Co., Belmont, Vauxhall; Palmer & Co., Sutton-street, Clerkenwell; and Wm. Marchant, 253, Regent Circus, Oxford-street: in Manchester, from Richardson & Roebuck, Market Place: in Bath, from T. & G. Butcher, No. 4, Saw Close: and in Cheltenham, from Mathews & Co., 400 High-street.

MUSIC.
On 1st April will be published, part I., price 1s., of HAMILTON'S CABINET of MUSIC for the PIANOFORTE and ORGAN.—The "Cabinet of Music" will embrace within its pages the best productions of our native composers, together with those of the master minds of Germany, France, and Italy. It will consist of a selection of popular Airs, arranged for the Pianoforte; Dance Music, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Mazurkas, Polkas, &c.; Songs and Duets, with Piano accompaniments; Rondos, Sonatas, &c., &c., and Sacred Compositions. The high musical standing of the gentleman who has undertaken the duties of Editor of the work, enables the Publisher to have confidence in stating that the selections will not only be made with taste and judgment, but that the original accompaniments and arrangements will be scientific and accurate. The work will be engraved, printed, and published on fine toned paper, with a new music type cast for the purpose, combining elegance of appearance with extreme distinctness; the greatest care will be taken in the correction of the press; and in the whole getting up of the work it will be the aim of the Publisher to enable it to vie in character and appearance with the finest and most expensive music of the present day.
A Part, price One Shilling, will be published with the Magazines on the 1st of each month, consisting of 16 pages of the full music size, 4 pages of which will be devoted to Sacred Music, arranged for Organ or Pianoforte, and separately paged, so that at the conclusion of a volume it may be classed by itself. At the end of a year the requisite Title-pages and Indexes will be supplied for binding the work.
Glasgow: W. Hamilton, Music Printer and Publisher; J. Menzies and N. Bowack, Edinburgh; T. Le Mesurier, Dublin; and Simpkin, Marshall and Co., London.
. A Catalogue of W. Hamilton's Musical Publications may be had of any Bookseller

THE BEST ALMANACK FOR 1845.
Now Publishing, 64 pages, handsome quarto, gilt edges (no Advertisements), with
EIGHTY ENGRAVINGS!
Price One Shilling, the
ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK, and PICTURESQUE CALENDAR FOR 1845.
It contains a greater variety of Information and seasonable entertainment than is to be found in any other Almanack. The Wrapper is beautifully printed in colours; and the artistical execution of the entire Almanack entitles it to a place upon every drawing-room table in the empire.
The Press is universal in praise of this beautiful Almanack.
EXTRACTS FROM OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.
"This is certainly one of the cheapest shilling's-worth that we have seen, even in this age of cheap publication. It contains some of the best Illustrations, for any common observer, of astronomical phenomena that have appeared for some years. From past recollections, we are satisfied that a few years ago a similar publication to this would not have remunerated its producers, even if sold at ten times its price."—Morning Chronicle.
"One of its features is an accurate representation of the principal astronomical phenomena of each month, accompanied with an intelligible description. The pages of the Calendar are illustrated with highly fanciful designs of the signs of the zodiac, by Mr. Kenny Meadows; there are also scenes of the sports of each month, birds, and other illustrations. The literary matter is quite as good as the pictorial, and the quarto pages on which the Almanack is printed afford more room for explanation than can be obtained in the ordinary forms. One shilling for such a mass of information and amusement is wonderfully cheap."—Morning Post, Nov. 20.
"This is a new annual, the purpose of which is to blend illustrations with the customary information contained in an almanack. Its letter-press contents are as copious and varied as any of its contemporaries: and the illustrations, which are from the rich fancy of Mr. Kenny Meadows's pencil, comprise allegorical compositions applicable to each month, scenes of the sports of the month, &c. It is, upon the whole, not only a useful, but a most pleasing work."—Morning Advertiser, Nov. 15.
"A cheap year-book of astronomical phenomena and natural history, country sports and town amusements, chronology, and legislation. Of the numerous engravings, those representing the telescopic appearances of the planets, as they will be visible in the ensuing year, are the most interesting, and are peculiar to this almanack."—Examiner.
"Is exceedingly well done, and full of information and good wood-cut adornments and illustrations. Its intrinsic merits, as well as its extrinsic attractions, are sufficient to insure for it a very general demand."—Literary Gazette, Nov. 15.
"It unites with calendarial information, astronomical and recreations incident to each month, embracing as well, notes on natural history, and a mass of miscellanies, as useful as it is entertaining. We repeat that this "Illustrated Almanack" is a happy idea, beautifully executed, and preferring its claims to purchase even by a modern 'Elwes' in economy."—Era, Nov. 24.
"This is one of the many attempts to substitute something rational for the usual trash of packs of lies that are passing away—and we say, all credit to every successful. It is filled with illustrations, several of which, indeed, possess much merit—as of the Zodiac, are executed with considerable artistical taste. As it is chiefly devoted to the natural history of the months, it is just what the readers of the 'Gardeners' Chronicle' are most likely to find useful. It is difficult to imagine anything cheaper."—Gardeners' Chronicle.
"This is, beyond all doubt, the most extraordinary production of the British press. The illustrations are very beautiful Kenny Meadows revels in the exuberance of his rich fancy, and Linton has done him ample justice in the engraving."—Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper.

TO THE LADIES.—The high and universal celebrity which ROWLAND'S KALYDOR continues to maintain, as an active, yet mild and soothing exturpator of all impurities of the skin, is, during the present period, most pleasingly evinced. This preparation, eminently balsamic, restorative, and invigorating, is equally celebrated for safety in application, as for unfailing efficacy in removing all impurities and discolorations; and imparting a healthy freshness and transparency to the Skin and Complexion. Its universally great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled shopkeepers, who give the title of "Genuine" Kalydor to compounds of their own manufacture, of the most deleterious character, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the Complexion, and, by their repellent action, endangering health. It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the words "Rowland's Kalydor" are on the wrapper. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included. Sold by the Proprietors, A. ROWLAND and SON, 20, Hatton-garden, and by Chemists and Perfumers. . All others are Fraudulent Imitations!!!

ROWLAND'S UNIQUE PREPARATIONS (under the patronage of the several Sovereigns and Courts of Europe, and universally preferred).—ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, for the Growth, Preservation, and for Beautifying the Human Hair. Price 3s. 6d., 7s., Family Bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s. per bottle. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR, for improving and beautifying the Skin and Complexion. Price 4s. 6d. and 8s. 6d. per bottle, duty included. ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, for the Teeth and Gums. Price 2s. 9d. per box, duty included.
IMPORTANT INFORMATION.—Unprincipled individuals, for the sake of gaining a trifle more profit, vend the most spurious compounds under the same names (some under the implied sanction of Royalty); they copy the labels, bills, advertisements, and testimonials (substituting fictitious for the real names and addresses) of the original preparations, and use either a fictitious name, or the word "Genuine," in the place of "Rowland's." It is, therefore, highly necessary to see that the word "Rowland's" is on the Wrapper of each article.—. All others are Fraudulent Imitations!!! The Genuine Preparations are sold by the Proprietors as above, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

WATCHES by WEBSTER and SON, Chronometer Makers to the Lords of the Admiralty.—W. and Son's establishment for the manufacture of watches and clocks is the oldest in London, having continued in Cornhill 134 years. They have REMOVED to 74. The extent of the premises will enable them personally to superintend their workmen in the respective departments. LAW INTELLIGENCE.

MISS WARD, THE ACTRESS.—In the Bankruptcy Court on Tuesday, Miss Prescott Ward, the well-known comedian at the metropolitan and provincial theatres, applied for her interim order. She described herself as Eugenie Bass, commonly called Eugenie Prescott Ward, formerly of Ash Cottage, Old Brompton, and late of 36, Half Moon street, Piccadilly, comedian, out of an engagement. The insolvent was opposed by a fashionable milliner for having obtained a dress in the name of Miss Johnson, the creditor swearing that if he had known that she was Miss Ward, the actress, he would not have trusted her. Her debts in the whole amounted to £217 10s. 2d., and she claims excepted articles of the estimated value of £19 18s. She has no assets. Her insolvency is ascribed to her having been for a lengthened time out of an engagement, during which time she states that she was supported by gifts from her brother-in-law, Mr. Elderton, secretary to the commissioners of police, and other members of the family. The Court granted her an order, but intimated that her petition would be dismissed when she came up for her final order if it was proved that she had obtained goods by fraudulent representations from the opposing creditor.

POLICE.

MORE COMPLAINTS ABOUT THE SPAFIELDS BURIAL GROUND.—At CLERKENWELL Police office, on Wednesday, a poor woman came up in a state of great affliction, and in an earnest manner besought the assistance of the magistrate. She said her name was Harriette Jesse Nelson, that she lived in 3, Cross-court, Vinegar yard, Drury-lane, that she was a widow, earned her bread by working as a laundress, had three children, and was in very destitute circumstances. Having read an account of the revolting occurrences alleged to have taken place in Spafields burial ground in the newspapers, she became greatly alarmed lest the remains of her poor husband, which had been interred there on the 23rd of March, 1842, should have been removed from the grave in which she had seen them placed. She further learned from the newspapers, that Mr. Bird, one of the managers of the grave yard, had publicly offered to open any grave, and show the relations of deceased persons interred there, that their remains had not been disturbed. She accordingly went to the burial-ground on Monday week, saw Mr. Bird, and asked him to open her husband's grave; he declined, saying that ground had not been opened for 15 years. She went over, pointed out the spot, and begged of him to open it, but he replied, "it shall not be opened," and then walked away.—Mr. Combe: Were you at the funeral?—The woman (crying): Oh, yes, I was at the funeral, with my three children. It was a wet, wintry day; so I could not see exactly how deep the grave was, nor how the coffin was laid. I lingered about the grave on Monday week when a grave digger came, and I asked him to open the grave for me. He said he would, but had scarcely begun when Mr. Bird came up, and said to me, "I told you the ground was not to be opened," and sent the man away. I followed Mr. Bird down the churchyard, and again entreated of him to show me my husband's coffin; but he replied, "You have got teeth to dig a grave yourself." I went back to the grave again, and having seen three men near the churchyard, and not connected with it, I asked them to dig the grave. They said they would. The first man had not been more than a minute at work, when the stench became so intolerable that he was obliged to leave off. The second and third tried consecutively, but the smell became so intolerable, that they were obliged to quit the place.—Mr. Combe: How soon did the stench issue?—The woman: The very first shovelful they threw up. A fourth man took up the spade, but he, too, was driven away by the smell. I asked him what the charge for digging the grave was; he said a pot of beer, and I gave him my last threepence to get it. I went the next day again, and made the same request to Mr. Bird. He took down my name and address, and said he would write to me on the following Friday, but I have never since heard from him. Mr. Wakeling, vestry clerk of Clerkenwell parish, said he attended there on behalf of the parish. It might be said that the statements in the newspapers regarding this place were of a revolting character; but facts ten times more revolting relative to this place had come to his knowledge. He had evidence to show that the corpses were tumbled out of the coffins in heaps, and thrown upon a mound of clay, then beaten and chopped up with the clay, and when compounded together, the whole was thrown to the bottom of a pit dug for the purpose. Mr. Watt, a pawnbroker, who lives in a house in Exmouth-street, abutting upon the grave-yard, here remarked that there was one practice connected with this ground which was not denied, and which there was abundant evidence to prove. A mechanic was in the habit of officiating as clergyman, and performing the funeral service. He was called in by the managers of this place, who received one and sixpence for each service thus performed. He was of course dressed in the garb of a clergyman.—Mr. Combe: Who is this man?—Mr. Watt: His name is Brown. He is a straw-bonnet maker. I am convinced that when the heat of the sun becomes a little more powerful, putrid fever will spread like wild-fire over the neighbourhood. A few days ago, a coffin-plate, belonging to a coffin buried last year, was found in the churchyard by a friend of his; where was the coffin?—Mr. Superintendent Macey: I went to the grave-yard a few days ago, and the smell was so intolerable that I could not remain more than a few minutes in it. The effluvia was dreadful, and Mr. Bird himself said he could hardly stay in the ground. Sixty graves were open. One man, in looking for the remains of his child, struck his pick-axe into a coffin, and its contents poured out in a thick fluid state. These graves had not been opened at the request of the relatives, but opened on speculation, in order to pacify the friends of deceased persons.—Mr. Wakeling said the opening was a mere "blind." When a relative asked to have a particular grave opened, the request was refused. The nuisance was dreadful.—Mr. Combe said the mode adopted by the managers of this place was most unsatisfactory to the relatives of the deceased, as well as most pernicious in its consequences. The magistrate directed that Mr. Vinall should be communicated with forthwith, and humanely directed a small sum from the poor-box to be given to the poor woman.

DEATH OF MAJOR-GENERAL SIR THOMAS CORSELLIS, K.C.B.—Major-General Corsellis, K.C.B., died a few days ago at his residence in Cambridge-street, Edgware-road, at the age of 74. Sir Thomas entered the military service of the East India Company on the Bombay Presidency, in 1788. He attained the rank of Captain in 1800, that of Colonel in 1829, and became a Major-General in 1837.

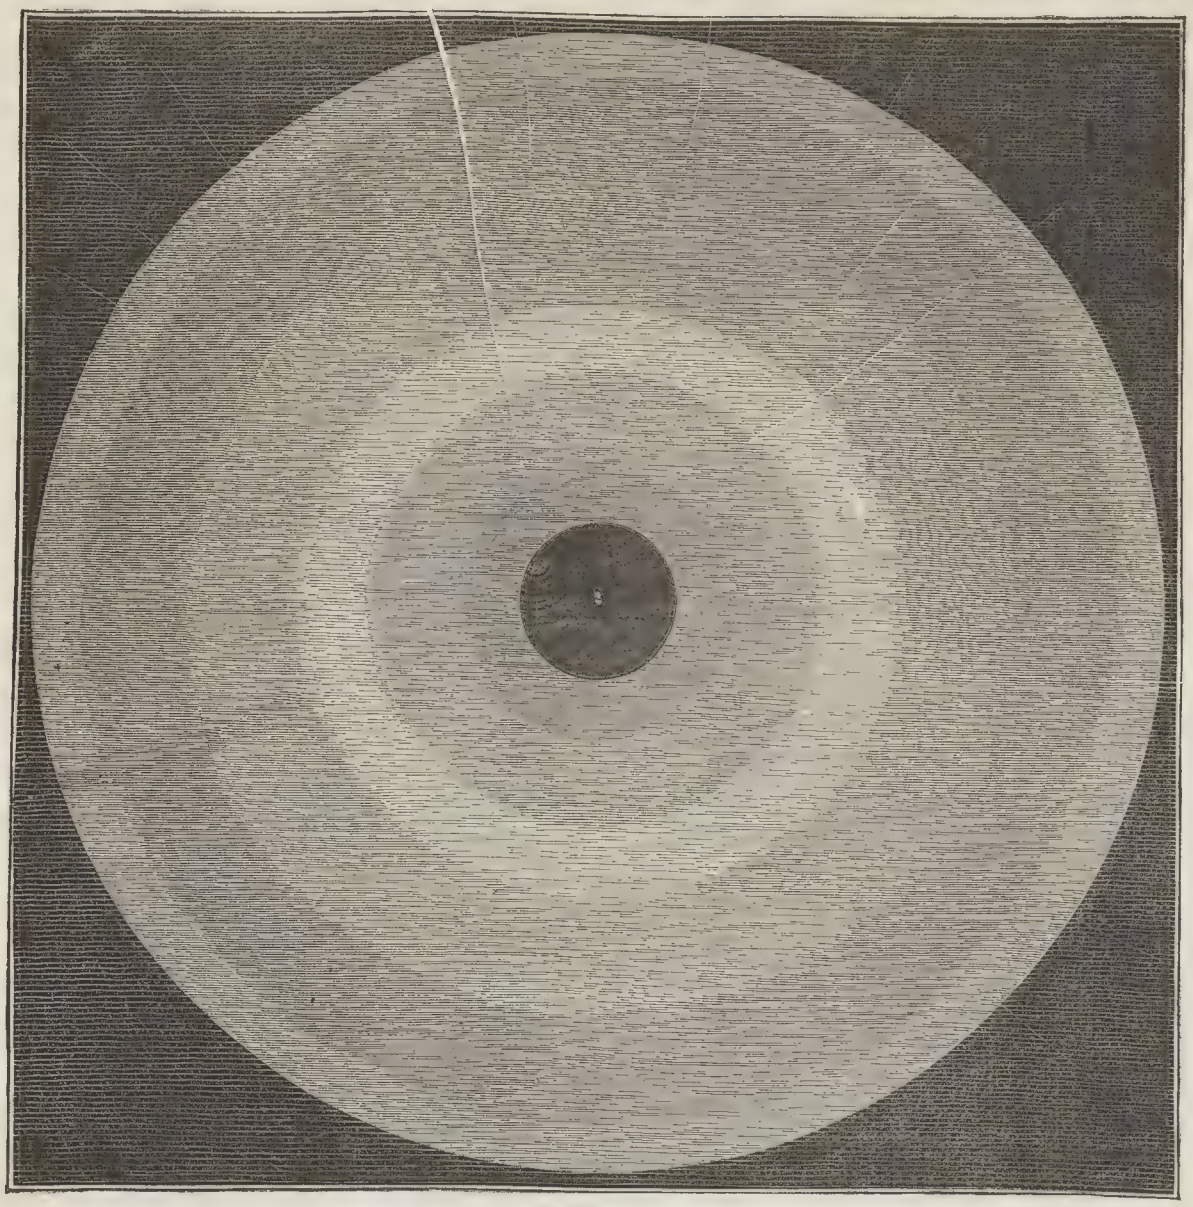
DEATH OF MAJOR-GENERAL REEVES, C.B.—This gallant officer, late Lieutenant-Colonel of the 27th Regiment, died last week, in the 73rd year of his age.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL CARPENTER.—Admiral Carpenter died on Sunday last, in Cumberland-street. He was in his 86th year; was the senior admiral of the white, and the 11th from the top of the list; and had been an officer in the Royal Navy for nearly 69 years.

EXTRAORDINARY ASTRONOMICAL PHENOMENON.

The long continuance of the winter, and the dull weather connected with it, have called much attention to the aspect of the Sun's disc. Spots of unusual magnitude are said to have been seen by various observers, and are believed by them to have had more or less influence in producing the remarkable lowness of our present winter temperature. A phenomenon, however, of a different character has recently occurred, which has drawn additional attention to the subject, and which has been described at length in the following letter to the Times. We print it without abridgment, and leave it, with the illustrations we have added, to the consideration of scientific readers:—

Sir,—I write to inform you of a most extraordinary phenomenon which has to-day been observed at Cambridge; and I do so, because, although the event is one which must interest the scientific world to a very high degree, yet the results of the minute observations made by the Plumian Professor will not be completed for some days; and I thought that in the meanwhile the results of my own observations might not be unacceptable.



The morning was beautifully fine, and the sky cloudless, if we except a few cirro-cumuli in the S.S.E., which appeared like thin pieces of white gauze floating in the sky, scarcely a breath of air stirring. About 25 minutes past ten my attention was drawn to the Sun, which, though apparently unclouded, seemed to shine with less than usual lustre, and his rays appeared slightly tinged with green.

I immediately put on the dark glass of my achromatic telescope, and with a power of about 40, directed the instrument to the Sun's centre. I here saw distinctly a small dark spot, surrounded successively by violet, blue, green, yellow, orange, and red rings, separated by comparatively dark rings, and beyond the exterior red ring the same recurred in the same order, but the colours then were much more faint, and at last hardly visible. This appearance increased in intensity until 5 minutes past 11, after which the colours began to fade, and exactly at 12 all trace of colour disappeared. However, I continued my observations, and soon found that the phenomena had not concluded, for the colours now began to return in a reversed order—i.e., at the Sun's centre was now a spot of purely white light, and each colour was replaced by its complementary one; and most astonishing to relate, this appearance of the Sun's disc increased in intensity of colour until 5 minutes before 1, and then began to fade, vanishing completely at 35 minutes past 2, after which everything resumed its ordinary appearance, and nothing more could be discerned unusual throughout the day.

A few words respecting the causes of this extraordinary phenomenon. It is well known that, if two convex lenses of small curvature be placed in contact, and a pencil of sunlight be allowed to fall upon them, that the appearance presented by the reflected rays is that of a dark spot surrounded by coloured rings, from blue to red; and that the transmitted light exhibits a bright spot surrounded by rings of the complementary colours, which are commonly known as "Newton's rings."

Now, if two thin films of vapour, extremely near together, passed between the Sun's disc and the eye of an observer, the scientific reader will immediately see that the transmitted rays might produce the appearance I have described as taking place after 12 o'clock; but to produce that observed before 12, the rays reflected from the earth by these two films of vapour must have been again reflected by a third film, and thus brought to the eye in a manner somewhat analogous to that in which the mock sun is formed. As this third film moved away the phenomenon must vary, and at last disappear, and the Sun's transmitted rays now reaching the eye without any reflection, would change the appearance to that observed from 12 o'clock to half-past 2.

I cannot, however, yet explain why the periods of maximum brightness should be equidistant from noon, as I am at a loss to know what functions of the Sun's hour angle the motions of these laminæ of vapour could be.

The correctness of the above hypothesis is remarkably confirmed by micrometical admeasurements which I took of the angular magnitudes of the red and violet rings. I found these to be nearly in the ratio of 43 to 30—i. e., nearly in the ratio of the square roots of the lengths of the undulations corresponding to red and violet rays, which is exactly what ought to be the case if my hypothesis is correct.*

The colours in the spectrum before noon were fainter than those observed afterwards; and some light must be lost by the second reflection: if my hypothesis be correct, this is another remarkable confirmation of its truth. I have written the above in great haste, which I hope you will excuse.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

THEODORE F. ELLIS.

Trinity College, Cambridge, Sunday, March 9.

* See Airy's "Mathematical Tracts," p. 296, last edition, where it is proved that if δ be the diameter of any one of Newton's rings, and λ the corresponding undulation, that $\delta 2$ varies as λ, and δ varies as $\sqrt{\lambda}$, for different coloured rays.

PALM SUNDAY IN SURREY.

The superstitions of a people are usually among the latest of the results of ignorance and social degradation which retreat before the progress of civilization. Those which concern the political condition of a country are generally the first to depart, while those that relate to the higher faculties of the mind remain as firmly rooted as the sin and selfishness in which they originate. Palm Sunday in Surrey affords a curious illustration of this truth. It is well known that the Weald of Surrey formed part of the Coit-andred, or mighty wood of the ancient Britons; and that, along with the kindred localities in the neighbouring counties of Kent and Sussex, it has, through all the pages of our national history, been held to be one of the least civilized of the home districts. In this wide forestial region, traces of the grim old Britons are everywhere apparent. The churches are mostly built upon the "high places" of their worship; trees and streams are held in sacred estimation; and the "luck" which constitutes the hope of the savage, is more or less attached, in the minds of the inhabitants, to the events of a wise superintending Providence. Many cases might be cited in illustration, but the following must suffice:—

It occurs in the churchyard of Crowhurst, on the borders of Kent and Surrey—a spot situated nearly in the centre of the Weald. In this place, near the east end of the church, is an enormous and very ancient yew tree, measuring ten yards and nine inches in girth at the height of five feet from the ground. The interior is hollow, and has been fitted up with a table in the centre and benches around for as many as "sixteen persons." From time immemorial this tree has been regarded as the head-quarters of good fortune; and it is the custom of the peasantry to assemble on Palm Sunday beneath the shade of its venerable branches, to hold a wake or fair—a kind of rustic viminalia—and to dance about the tree and the old tombs in its neighbourhood with palm branches of the willow in their hand. This done, the grand duty of the day has been performed, and the poor people separate with something of the feeling of those who have made a thank-offering. Formerly, excesses were frequently committed on the occasion, through the sale of liquors; but of late years the fair has been conducted with great decorum. At present, the festival is associated, oddly enough, with a collection-sermon in the church, for the Duchess of Marlborough's almshouses at St. Alban's.

PALM SUNDAY, AT CROWHURST.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The correspondence to this department of the paper has increased to such an extent that we cannot possibly acknowledge, individually, the numerous solutions, right and wrong, of our Problems, which pour in weekly. Now, it is perfectly true that if Black, at his 3*rd move, instead of taking the Bishop, retires his King to Q R's sq., he may, by two or three unavailing sacrifices, live a move longer, but this was no doubt foreseen by M. Anderssen, who, following the example of many of the finest inventors of Problems, counted only the first interposition, and considered the after sacrifice of pieces as futile and undeserving notice.*

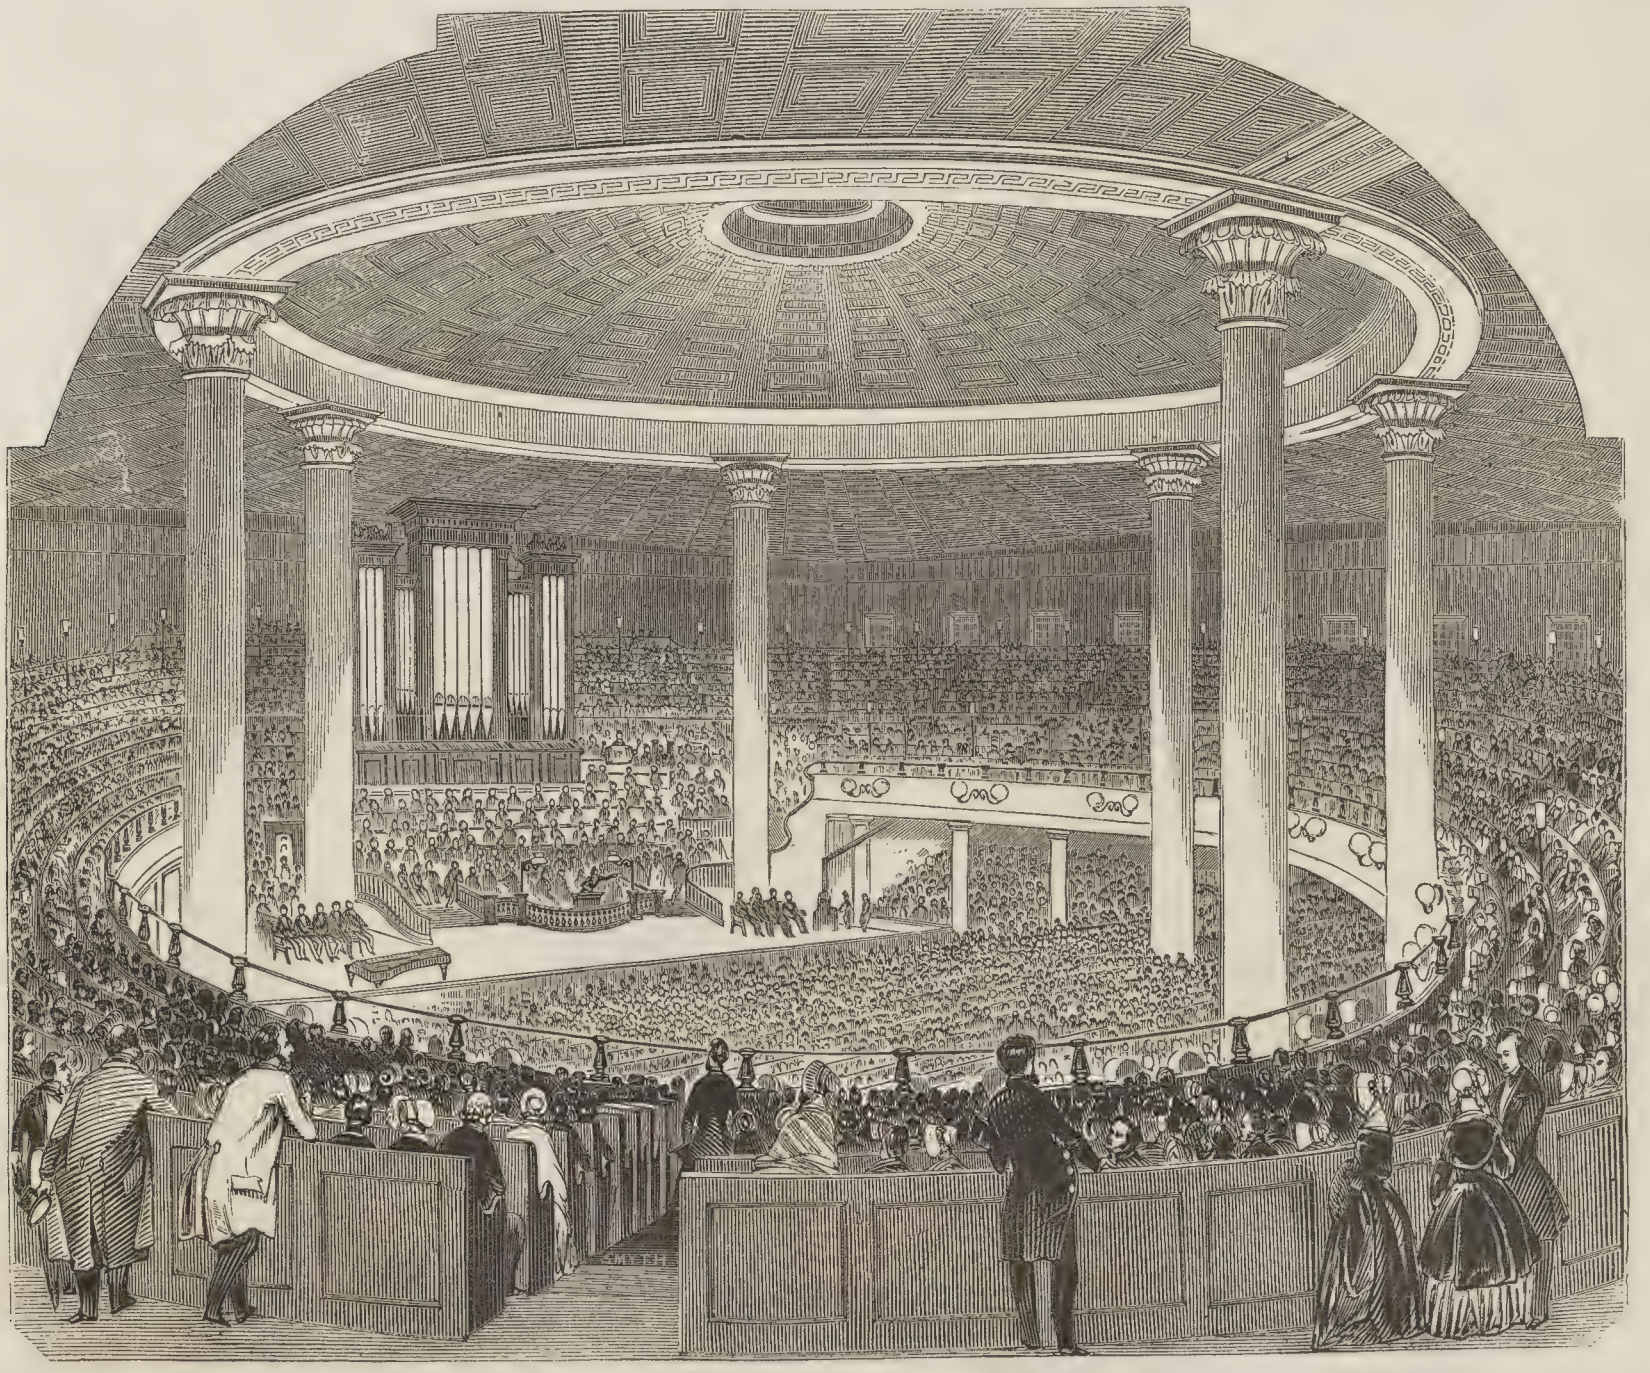
PRESIDENT POLK.

AMERICA, the "equal land without a lord," has just witnessed the inauguration of her new President, in the person of Mr. Polk. We have read the accounts of the pomp and circumstance attending the event, but they have not impressed us with a very lofty idea of the pageantry of the "States." Perhaps it may be attributed to the sense of discomfort and disappointment felt by the writer, a Whig spectator, soaked with rain and soured by the success of the Democrats. Certainly there is a sub-acidity of manner, a tinge of ill-humour visible throughout the narrative, which we can only account for by the double influence of dampness and defeat. The writer makes quite a feature of the rain and the defences against it:—

"As the rain increased, umbrellas became in great request, and, as all were well supplied, a spectator some distance up the avenue, looking towards the Capitol, could see only a long line of moving umbrellas terminating at the Capitol, the dome of which towered up like a gigantic umbrella held up by some invisible hand."

But his spleen becomes more apparent as he proceeds; there is a decided disposition to underrate in the following:—

"The 'Officers and Soldiers of the Revolution' were represented by one fat pursy gentleman, in a sort of navy undress, who might be some purser or other, about fifty years of age, two young naval officers, one of them (Lieutenant Eld) late of the exploring expedition, and two boys, apparently midshipmen, about sixteen years of age, and this respectable number of five individuals represented the revolutionary warriors."



He presently drops the connected narrative style, and lots the officials present with the auctioneer-like brevity of a catalogue of sale:—

"Ex-Presidents—none.
"Tyler's Cabinet—Wickliffe and Wilkins.
"Supreme Court—none.
"Diplomatic Corps—none."

Altogether, the account in the American paper is a long, clumsy, and vulgar endeavour to ridicule the ceremonial of a day, which, as in all elective contests, brought humiliation to one of the contending parties. But there are more important matters than pageantry, however described, and we quit the outward manifestations of the occasion to what is of more consequence—the declaration of the new President, and the event the intelligence of which has accompanied it to England.

The inaugural Address of Mr. Polk is, of course, like opening addresses of all kinds—profuse in promises; it is also like every address of an American President, extravagant in its praises of the American people, laws, and constitution. It is even more enthusiastic than is usual on these points, and if we did not know better by experience, we should believe that Utopia was found at last, and that the earthly paradise was bounded on the north by the St. Lawrence, stretching southwards to Texas, which is likely to be soon a part of it:—

The inestimable value of our federal Union is felt and acknowledged by all. By this system of united and confederated states, our people are permitted, collectively and individually, to seek their own happiness in their own way: and the consequences have been most auspicious. Since the Union was formed the number of the states has increased from thirteen to twenty-eight; two of these have taken their position as members of the confederacy within the last week. Our population has increased from three to twenty millions. New communities and states are seeking protection under its ægis, and multitudes from the Old World are flocking to our shores to participate in its blessings. Beneath its benign sway, peace and prosperity prevailed. Freed from the burdens and miseries of war, our trade and intercourse have extended throughout the world. Mind, no longer tasked in devising means to accomplish or resist schemes of ambition, usurpation, or conquest, is devoting itself to man's true interests, in developing his faculties and powers, and the capacity of nature to minister to his enjoyments. Genius is free to announce its inventions and discoveries; and the hand is free to accomplish whatever the head conceives, not incompatible with the rights of a fellow being. All distinctions of birth or of rank have been abolished. All citizens, whether native or adopted, are placed upon terms of precise equality. All are entitled to equal rights and equal r otection. No union exists between church and state, and perfect freedom f opinion is guaranteed to all sects and creeds.

The greater portion of this is a mere flourish, that might pass when read to a mob of thousands on a day of more excitement than thought; but, as a State document, to be read and judged in Europe, it is a very frothy affair. What can we think of the declaration that—"Mind no longer tasked in devising means to accomplish or resist schemes of ambition, usurpation, or conquest, is devoting itself to man's true interests," when at the very moment it is made, the "mind" of American statesmen is actively engaged in a scheme of "ambition, usurpation," if not of conquest, in the annexation of Texas to the Republic, and when, in the very same address, the occupation of the British territory of Oregon is openly advocated. As to what is said about "equal rights and equal protection," it must be understood to apply to "citizens" alone; their "fellow beings" of another colour have neither one nor the other.

The rest of the address, as it goes more into detail, is, we admit, less liable to censure in point of taste; but it broaches many subjects which will, to England, become matters of deep consideration.

In the first place, comes the annexation of Texas to the territory and Government of the United States, as Florida and Iowa have actually been united to it very recently. Texas has an immense surface, but a population very small in comparison to it; it has a territory of 300,000 square miles, and a white population not exceeding 70,000 souls. In territory alone then, can the United States gain at present by the acquisition, and of what use mere unoccupied land can be to a State that already possesses so vast an amount of it, it is difficult to see; it is like "giving the sum of more to that which hath too much." In America, population does not yet press upon space, and without either Texas or Oregon, of which it seems England is to be relieved, the Union has ample room and verge enough for her surplus numbers for centuries to come. Texas is a region of great capability and promise, but all is yet undeveloped; the Southern States, looking at their own over-cropped and worn-out soils, think, perhaps, that their slaves might find profitable employment in the "fresh fields and pastures new," of the Texan territory. In new Slave States, they will also find a support against the abolitionists of the north; it remains to be seen whether the Texians will really consent to be "absorbed," or, if they do, whether Mexico will let such an event take place, without an opposition that will bring on a hazard of a war between the two Republics.

Another great topic of gratulation, not peculiar indeed to the address of Mr. Polk, but common to all Presidents' Messages, is the frugality of the States and their freedom from debt. With respect to the Federal Government it is true, but if the separate States are taken into consideration, it is not so; they are neither frugal nor free from debt, Pennsylvania to wit. In fact, there is a fictitious sort of credit claimed here which cannot be too often exposed; all the advantages the separate States bring the Union by their population and commerce, are duly claimed and insisted on; but if they become embarrassed—if they rush into debt—if they incur liabilities and refuse to discharge them—then the President disowns them, says that the State, as a State, has nothing to do with them, and leaves them at liberty to cheat their creditors as they please.

This is neither fair nor just; a Government should either be one thing or the other; if it professes to have any control or power at all, it should take all the responsibilities belonging to it; if it has none, it should keep all mention of the advantages it derives from its separate states out of the President's Messages. Again the Federal Government is "a protector of each and all the States; of every man who lives upon our soil, whether of native or foreign birth;" a good sentence, and well pronounced, as Shakspeare says, but which would be better if well followed. What protection does the State give the Negro against his master, or if colour extinguishes all claim, we will come to the white and the free man—the stranger, and ask what protection was there for the Irish of Philadelphia, when it pleased the free and enlightened citizens to renew there, very recently, scenes which have not been witnessed in England for the last sixty years? The truth is, and no vapouring of Presidents in Messages or Addresses can disguise the fact, that as an Executive power the Federal form of Government is the most inefficient that has ever been devised. We are willing to make every allowance for a document prepared for delivery to a large audience, not as a State paper, to be analysed like a set of instructions or a despatch; such a manifesto must partake more or less of the ad captandum vulgus style, like a speech from the hustings, or an harangue in Exeter Hall. But even in such a speech we could not see assertions of equality of rights and protection boasted of by men who nourish slavery at their hearths—of frugality and freedom from debt, by those who are notoriously and disgracefully embarrassed—of the absence of ambitious designs, when they are grasping at territory on every side—we could not see all these assertions made without putting it on record, that in England, at least, the public are not duped by them.

For the rest, taken as a composition, the address of President Polk is better written, its language is clearer, more condensed, and vigourous than that of American Presidents has for some time been; compared with the wordy, slipshod and ungrammatical messages of President Tyler, it absolutely shines; but, nevertheless, we cannot admire either the tone or matter of the address of Mr. President Polk.

CELEBRATION OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTH-DAY.

The anniversary of the birth of Washington (February 22, 1732,) was this year celebrated by the Washingtonian Temperance Society, with great ceremony, at the Tabernacle, in New York, on the evening of Saturday, the 22nd ult. This vast building was densely crowded on the occasion; and the performances on the fine organ, and the addresses of the several speakers were received with great éclat. The Tabernacle, as our illustration shows, is a splendid building; and its beautiful Sienna marble columns, and paneled roof, the whole lighted with gas, had a very brilliant and imposing appearance.

We may here mention, that in the New York Inquirer have just appeared the following anecdotic particulars of the Washington family:—

A translation of a letter from Baron von Washington, of Munich, to the United States Consul at that place, has been published, in which he gives some interesting particulars concerning a branch of the family of Washington, with which the writer is connected. Both branches sprung from an English family, holding large possessions in York and Northampton, connected by marriage with Earl Ferrers, and Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. The branch from which George Washington descended, emigrated to America about the year 1650. James Washington, another member, became so deeply implicated with the Duke of Monmouth, in the time of Charles II., that he fled from England, and after losing all his property by shipwreck, reached Holland, where he became the founder of a branch of the Washington family, which still exists, and to which the Baron, who writes the letter stating these facts, belongs. The Baron was in 1794, in the Dutch service, afterwards Lieutenant in the Dutch brigade of the Prince of Orange; in the English service in 1799, and since 1802, has been attached to the Bavarian King, partly as Marshal of the Court, and partly as Aide-de-Camp. James Washington, his great-grandfather, is mentioned by General Washington in some of his letters, as among his ancestors, and a merchant at Rotterdam.

The Journal des Chemins de Fer states that the bill for the Paris and Strasbourg Railroad will be shortly presented to the Chambers, and that the bill for the road between Dijon and Mulhouse will be brought in before the end of the session, but not for six weeks or two months, as the council of the ponts et chaussées has not yet decided upon the line it is to take.

Frankfort letters allude to the foundation of a National Church of Germany, emancipating the German Catholics from the influence of Rome, as an event that may bear consequences, rivalling in importance the reformation carried by the energy of Luther and his followers. An immense number of communities exist already in the countries of Brunswick, Saxony, Baden, and Nassau, following those which first were created in Silesia and Posen.

The weather has been extremely stormy lately in the Red Sea; several native boats have been lost, and one with nearly two hundre[d] Mahom[edan] [illegible]

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The news from France this week is unimportant, but there is some interest in the accounts from Switzerland. There have been some rather exciting discussions in the Diet, upon the subject of the Jesuits, but no result had been arrived at.

An official note has been sent to the Diet by Prince Metternich, in which he states that the Emperor of Austria concurs with the views of the English and French Governments, "relative to the reprobation which, in the despatches transmitted to the Count de Pontois, the latter pronounces upon the enterprises and the existence of the free corps. A Government not possessing sufficient power to master its subjects, to prevent them carrying, with arms in hands, murder and pillage into the territory of an inoffensive neighbour, such a Government would not deserve that name."

In dismissing the Diet, on the 20th, the President acknowledged the receipt of Prince Metternich's note, adding, that he had not had time to place it in the hands of the deputies, but would communicate it to all the cantonal Governments. In announcing the close of the Diet, the President enjoined the deputies to use their utmost influence to maintain order and public tranquillity, "so that the spirit of party should not rise above that of the interests of the country." He added, that "Switzerland would repent too late if the authority and power of the country be surrendered to party."

The Paris Chamber of Deputies is engaged in the discussion of the Customs Bill. The Minister of Finance has presented two projects of law, the one relative to the payment of the dividend due on the Greek Loan, and the other proposing the withdrawal from circulation of pieces of 15 and 30 sous, &c., and the issuing of other small coin, more in accordance with the decimal system.

The Constitutionnel has a letter from Tangier, in which it is stated that Abd-el-Kader had assumed a hostile attitude towards the Emperor Abderrhaman, and called upon all true Mussulmans to join his standard. A considerable number of troops, under the command of the Emperor's son, had been sent to oppose him; but little good was expected from the expedition, as numerous portions of the populations have already declared in his favour. Several circles or districts are in open rebellion. This state of things is the more serious, as the party opposed to the dynasty of Abderrhaman is very powerful, and has only wanted a chief of ability to direct it.

The cause of the blowing up of the powder magazine at Algiers was undiscovered. The Toulonnais gives the following version of the cause of the event:—A long time since some Moors were employed in piling up in the room in which the fire broke out a quantity of hollow and charged projectiles. It may be supposed that some powder scattered on the floor had not been swept up One of the projectiles, insecurely placed, may have rolled from a height to the ground on the powder, and by the sudden contact have ignited it. This is plausible enough, but is it the fact? The disaster cannot be attributed to ill-will, for the magazine was guarded by French troops, with all the precautions usually taken for places containing inflammable matter.

UNITED STATES.

MESSAGE OF THE NEW PRESIDENT.—THE ANNEXATION OF TEXAS.

By the arrival of the packet-ship George Washington, we are in possession of New York papers to the 6th inst. Their contents are exceedingly important, and the news they bring cannot fail to excite considerable interest in a political point of view.

The bill for the Annexation of Texas to the United States, which passed the Senate on the 27th Feb., had passed the House of Representatives on the 28th, and was returned with the signature of the PRESIDENT on the 1st. The resolution had passed by a vote of 27 to 25, a majority of two.

Mr. Polk, the new President, after taking the usual oaths, delivered his inaugural address on the 1st of March. The ceremony is described as being most imposing, the numbers assembled to witness it far exceeding any former occasion. This address is much shorter than those usually delivered by American Presidents, but it is pointed and to the purpose. We subjoin an analysis of the most interesting topics to which allusion is made in this address. The new President, after touching upon the vast responsibility which he has taken upon himself, says that it will be his first care to administer the Government in the true spirit of the constitution. Mr. Polk describes the system adopted in the United States as the "most admirable and wisest system of well-regulated self-government among men ever devised by human minds;" and thus eulogises the federal union:—

"The inestimable value of our federal union is felt and acknowledged by all. By this system of united and federated States, our people are permitted, collectively and individually, to seek their own happiness in their own way; and the consequences have been most auspicious. Since the Union was formed the number of the States has increased from thirteen to twenty-eight—two of these have taken their position as members of the confederacy within the last week. Our population has increased from three to twenty millions. New communities and States are seeking protection under its ægis, and multitudes from the Old World are flocking to our shores to participate in its blessings. Beneath its benign sway peace and prosperity prevail. Freed from the burthens and miseries of war, our trade and intercourse have extended throughout the world. Mind no longer tasked in devising means to accomplish or resist schemes of ambition, usurpation, or conquest, is devoting itself to man's true interests, in developing his faculties and powers, and the capacity of nature to minister to his enjoyments. Genius is free to announce its inventions and discoveries; and the hand is free to accomplish whatever the head conceives, not incompatible with the rights of a fellow being. All distinctions of birth or of rank have been abolished. All citizens, whether native or adopted, are placed upon terms of precise equality. All are entitled to equal rights and equal protection. No union exists between Church and State; and perfect freedom of opinion is guaranteed to all sects and creeds."

After stating his determination to preserve this federal union, the new President gives an outline of the policy he intends to pursue:—

"With these views of the nature, character, and objects of the government, and the value of the Union, I shall steadily oppose the creation of those institutions and systems which, in their nature, tend to pervert it from its legitimate purposes, and make it the instrument of sections, classes, and individuals. We need no national banks, or other extraneous institutions, planted around the government to control or strengthen it in opposition to the will of its authors. Experience has taught us how unnecessary they are as auxiliaries of the public authorities—how impotent for good, and how powerful for mischief.

"Ours was intended to be a plain and frugal government; and I shall regard it to be my duty to recommend to Congress, and as far as the executive is concerned, to enforce by all means within my power the strictest economy in the expenditure of the public money, which may be compatible with the public interests.

"A national debt has become almost an institution of European monarchies. It is viewed, in some of them, as an essential prop to existing governments. Melancholy is the condition of that people whose government can be sustained only by a system which periodically transfers large amounts from the labours of the many to the coffers of the few. Such a system is incompatible with the ends for which our republican government was instituted. Under a wise policy the debts contracted in our revolution and during the war of 1812 have been happily extinguished. By a judicious application of the revenues not required for other necessary purposes, it is not doubted that the debt which has grown out of the circumstances of the last few years may be speedily paid off.

"I congratulate my fellow-citizens on the entire restoration of the credit of the general government of the Union, and that of many of the States. Happy would it be for the indebted States if they were freed from their liabilities, many of which were incautiously contracted. Although the Government of the Union is neither in a legal nor a moral sense bound for the debts of the States, and it would be a violation of our compact of Union to assume them, yet we cannot but feel a deep interest in seeing all the States meet their public liabilities, and pay off their just debts, at the earliest practicable period. That they will do so as soon as it can be done without imposing too heavy burdens on their citizens, there is no reason to doubt. The sound moral and honourable feeling of the people of the indebted States cannot be questioned; and we are happy to perceive a settled disposition on their part, as their ability returns, after a season of unexampled pecuniary embarrassment, to pay off all just demands, and to acquiesce in any reasonable measures to accomplish that object."

He next gives his views of the principles upon which a tariff ought to be framed. In his opinion, in levying discriminating duties, "care should be taken that it be done in a manner not to benefit the wealthy few at the expense of the toiling millions, by taxing lowest the luxuries of life, or articles of superior quality and high price, which can only be consumed by the wealthy; and highest, the necessaries of life, or articles of coarse quality and low price, which the poor and great mass of our people must consume. The burdens of government should, as far as practicable, be distributed justly and equally among all classes of our population."

Mr. Polk now comes to the great question of the annexation of Texas, upon which, as will be seen, he speaks in a dictatorial tone, claiming for the United States the sole and exclusive privilege of deciding upon it:—

"The republic of Texas has made known her desire to come into our Union, to form a part of our confederacy, and enjoy with us the blessings of liberty secured and guaranteed by our constitution. Texas was once a part of our country—was unwisely ceded away to a foreign power—is now independent, and possesses an undoubted right to dispose of a part or the whole of her territory, and to merge her sovereignty, as a separate and independent state, in ours. I congratulate my country that, by an Act of the late Congress of the United States, the assent of this Government has been given to the re-union; and it only remains for the two countries to agree upon the terms, to consummate an object so important to both.

"I regard the question of annexation as belonging exclusively to the United States and Texas. They are independent powers, competent to contract; and foreign nations have no right to interfere with them, to take exceptions to their re-union. Foreign powers do not seem to appreciate the true character of our Government. Our Union is a confederation of independent states, whose policy is peace with each other and all the world. To enlarge its limits is to extend the dominion of peace over additional territories of increasing millions. The world has nothing to fear from military ambition in our Government. While the chief magistrate and the popu[lar] branch of Congress are elected for short terms by the suffrages of those m[illi]ons, who must in their own persons bear all the burthens and miseries [of] war, our Government cannot be otherwise than pacific. Foreign pow[ers] should, therefore, look on the annexation of Texas to the United States, n[ot] as the conquest of a nation seeking to extend her dominions by arms a[nd] violence, but as the peaceful acquisition of a territory once her own, [by] adding another member to our confederation, with the consent of that me[m]ber; thereby diminishing the chances of war, and opening to them new a[nd] ever-increasing markets for their products."

An argument ensues upon the danger likely to arise should Texas rema[in] independent.

"None can fail to see the danger to our safety and future peace, if Tex[as] remains an independent state, or becomes an ally or dependancy of so[me] foreign nation more powerful than herself. Is there one among our citize[ns] who would not prefer perpetual peace with Texas to occasional wars, whi[ch] so often occur between bordering independent nations? Is there one w[ho] would not prefer free intercourse with her, to high duties on all our produ[ce] and manufactures which enter her ports or cross her frontiers? Is the[re] one who would not prefer an unrestricted communication with her citize[ns] to the frontier obstruction which must occur if she remains out of t[he] Union? Whatever is good or evil in the local institutions of Texas, w[ill] remain her own, whether annexed to the United States or not. None of t[he] present states will be responsible for them, any more than they are for t[he] local institutions of each other. They have confederated together for cert[ain] specified objects. Upon the same principle, that they would refuse to fo[rm] a perpetual union with Texas because of her local institutions, our fo[re] fathers would have been prevented from forming our present Union. P[er]ceiving no valid objection to the measure, and many reasons for its adopt[ion] vitally affecting the peace, the safety, and the prosperity of both countri[es] I shall, on the broad principle which formed the basis and produced t[he] adoption of our constitution, and not in any narrow spirit of sectio[nal] policy, endeavour, by all constitutional, honourable, and appropriate mea[ns] to consummate the expressed will of the people and government of t[he] United States, by the re-annexation of Texas to our Union at the earl[iest] practicable period."

Mr. Polk speaks in equally decisive and peremptory terms upon [the] Boundary question. He says:—

"Nor will it become in a less degree my duty to assert and maintain, [by] all constitutional means, the right of the United States to that portion of [our] territory which lies beyond the Rocky Mountains. Our title to the coun[try] of the Oregon is 'clear and unquestionable;' and already are our pe[ople] preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and childr[en]. But eighty years ago our population was confined on the west by the ri[dge] of the Alleghanies. Within that period—within the lifetime, I might say [in] some of my hearers—our people, increasing to many millions, have filled [the] eastern valley of the Mississippi, adventurously ascending the Missouri to [its] head springs, and are already engaged in establishing the blessings of s[elf] government in valleys of which the rivers flow to the Pacific. The w[hole] beholds the peaceful triumphs of the industry of our emigrants. To us [be]longs the duty of protecting them adequately wherever they may be u[nder] our soil. The jurisdiction of our laws, and the benefits of our republican [in]stitutions, should be extended over them in the distant regions which t[hey] have selected for their homes. The increasing facilities of intercourse [will] easily bring the States, of which the formation in that part of our territ[ory] cannot be long delayed, within the sphere of our federative Union. In [the] meantime, every obligation imposed by treaty or conventional stipulati[on] should be sacredly respected.

"In the management of our foreign relations it will be my aim to obser[ve] careful respect for the rights of other nations, while our own will be the s[ub]ject of constant watchfulness. Equal and exact justice should characte[rize] all our intercourse with foreign countries. All alliances having a tende[ncy] to jeopard the welfare and honour of our country, or sacrifice any on[e] the national interests, will be studiously avoided; and yet no opportu[nity] will be lost to cultivate a favourable understanding with foreign gov[ern]ments, by which our navigation and commerce may be extended and [our] ample products of our fertile soil, as well as the manufactures of our sk[illed] artisans, find a ready market and remunerating prices in foreign countri[es]

The address concludes thus:—"Confidently relying upon the aid and [as]sistance of the co-ordinate departments of the Government in conduct[ing] our public affairs, I enter upon the discharge of the high duties which h[ave] been assigned me by the people again humbly supplicating that Di[vine] Being, who has watched over and protected our beloved country from [its] infancy to the present hour, to continue his gracious benedictions upon [it], that we may continue to be a prosperous and happy people." We find f[rom] these papers that, after passing a few measures of an immediate local inter[est] the session of Congress was brought to a close.

It is understood that the Mexican Minister at Washington, Almonte, [has] made all necessary arrangements for his return to Mexico.

He is said to be only waiting for the President to sign the Texan ann[ex]ation resolutions, and to make the usual proclamation, which will soon [be] done, to DEMAND HIS PASSPORTS AND MAKE HIS PROTEST, and to retire [and] break up all official relations with the Government of the United States. [De]spatches were forwarded by the Mexican Minister, by express, to New [Or]leans, to be sent to the city of Mexico, informing the Government of [the] passing of the Texan resolutions. Private letters, from the highest sourc[es] from that city, state that the instant the intelligence is received there [the] Government of Mexico will immediately declare war and issue letters [of] marque and reprisal.

Private letters from Canada assure us of the improved health of Lord M[et]calfe, the Governor General.

The commercial intelligence from America is of no special import. T[he] stock market was rather brisk, and a great rise had taken place in all [de]scriptions of Texan securities and property consequent on the Annexation.

The following is the latest information respecting the formation of M[r.] Polk's Cabinet:—

Secretary of State, Senator Buchanan, of Pennsylvania.
Secretary of Treasury, Senator Walker, of Mississippi.
Secretary of Navy, George Bancroft, of Massachusetts.
Secretary of War, Governor Marcy, of New York.
Postmaster-General, Cave Johnson, of Tennessee.
Attorney-General, Mr. Mason, late Secretary of the Navy, who is said [to] have had this offered to him, and to have refused it; and it is now said th[at] J. W. Jones, late Speaker of the House of Representatives, will be the incu[m]bent, but it is also said that this post remains unfilled, and that it is the o[ne] one that is so.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.) This morning, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent left Fro[g] more House, at nine o'clock, and proceeded to the Castle to brea[k] fast with her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and t[he] Grand Duchess Stephanie of Baden, to take leave of her Royal Highne[ss] the Grand Duchess of Baden previously to her Royal Highness's departu[re] from the Castle, where the Grand Duchess has been sojourning, on a vi[sit] to her Majesty and the Prince Consort since Tuesday last. Her Majes[ty] and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by their respective suite[s] took equestrian exercise this morning, proceeding from the Castle up th[e] Frogmore-road, returning through the Great Park. Her Royal Highne[ss] the Grand Duchess Stephanie of Baden, attended by the Baroness de Sturm[er] feder, and the Baron Roth de Schrackenstein, took her departu[re] from the Castle this morning before luncheon. The infant Royal Famil[y] were taken for their accustomed airing in the enclosures and pleasur[e] grounds attached to the Castle, during the day. Her Royal Highness th[e] Duchess of Kent, accompanied by the Countess Wratislaw, and attended b[y] Lady Anna Maria Dawson, will join the Royal Party at dinner at th[e] Castle this evening.

DEPARTURE OF HER MAJESTY FOR THE ISLE OF WIGHT.—Her Majest[y] who has purchased Osborne House, leaves Windsor to-day (Saturday), an[d] intends to pass a short time at that residence.

PRINCE ALBERT AND THE DUKE OF ROTHESAY.—It may not be generall[y] known that his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is Duke of Rothesa[y] as well as Duke of Cornwall, and which it would appear from the followin[g] incident that recently occurred, was either unknown to or forgotten by h[is] royal father. One morning, a card was presented at Buckingham Palace t[o] his Royal Highness Prince Albert, upon which was engraved "The Duke [of] Rothesay," and an audience solicited. His Royal Highness seemed puzzle[d] and repeated the name several times, saying he did not recollect ever havin[g] heard of such a nobleman, but he consented to give the required audienc[e] and ordered the Duke of Rothesay to be shown in, when he was agreeabl[y] surprised by the entrance of the heir apparent, attired in full Highland cos[-]tume, attended by her Majesty's piper. The above amusing incident wa[s] productive of considerable entertainment to the royal circle.

NEW ANTHEM BY PRINCE ALBERT.—On Wednesday a new anthem composed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, was rehearsed for the firs[t] time in St. George's Hall, Windsor. The Queen's private band and the cho[ir] of St. George's were in attendance. Her Majesty and the Prince came int[o] the Hall, and his Royal Highness, after the first trial, picked out a few erro[rs] in the instrumental department. The anthem, on being tried over again[,] proved to be perfect. The Queen then commanded it to be played over onc[e] more, and was much delighted with the composition and the manner i[n] which it was performed This anthem, entitled "Out of the deep have [I] called thee," is acknowledged by a number of the first-rate judges wh[o] were present to be the chef-d'œuvre of the Prince's compositions.

DEATH OF THE HON. WILLIAM FRASER.—The Hon. William Fraser die[d] suddenly last week. Mr. Fraser was habitually subject to gout, and ha[d] not been well for some short time past; but he was out on the very da[y] se'nnight preceding his death. He was one of the Vice-Presidents of th[e] Scottish Hospital, of the foundation of King Charles the Second. Mr. Fraser was the son of the late, and brother and heir presumptive to the pre[-]sent Lord Saltoun.

DEATH OF LADY LESLIE.—Lady Leslie, widow of the late Hon. Sir Charle[s] Leslie, Bart., brother of the Countess of Devon, and the Hon. and Rev. Si[r] Henry Leslie, Bart., chaplain in ordinary to the Queen and Prebendary o[f] Exeter, died last week. Her ladyship had survived her husband twelv[e] years.

DEATH OF THE COUNTESS OF PORTMORE.—The above countess died on Thursday week, at Bath, after a short illness. The deceased countess was in her 69th year, and was second wife of the late Earl of Portmore, a title now extinct.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Monday the marriage of Miss Barberina Farquhar, third daughter of the late Sir Thomas Farquhar, Bart., and Lady Farquhar, with Mr. Mark Milbanke, eldest son of Mr. and Lady Augusta Milbanke, and nephew of the Duke of Cleveland, was solemnised at St. James's Church, Westminster, in the presence of a numerous circle of the relatives and friends of both families. The Rev. Archdeacon Hamilton officiated at the ceremony.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.—A vestry meeting was held on Thursday morning, of this parish, Dr. Croly, the rector, in the chair; at which, after some conversation as usual, about the accounts, Messrs. Flight and Rock were unanimously elected churchwardens for the ensuing year. Mr. Henry Rock and Mr. Williams were re-elected as overseers. Mr. Crosby made a statement relative to the aspect and prospects of the pending law proceedings, and as there could be no progress to report until after next term, which commences on 15th April, it was resolved to adjourn the present meeting until the 9th May.

THE FANCY FAIR IN THE THAMES TUNNEL.—There was a fancy fair and bazaar in the Thames Tunnel on Monday, which was continued during the week. The stalls were neatly arranged with fancy goods, works of art, and decorated with flags, banners, and Chinese lanterns. The shafts were also brilliantly illuminated with gas, and dressed out with the flags of all nations. The cosmorama and saloon of arts in the Rotherhithe shaft, the temple of magic in the Wapping shaft, the electrifying apparatus, and various exhibitions, afforded much delight to the various promenaders under water. Fifteen thousand passengers went through the Tunnel during Monday.

VICTORIA PARK.—The opening of the weather has placed the operations for the commencement of the park in full activity, and a great many hands have been put on to commence digging for the formation of the plantations. Since October, when the land was given up to the Crown, and during the winter, the operatives have not been inactive in the formation of roads, and placing park paling round the boundaries.

CHEAP SUGAR.—The grocers in the poorer districts of the metropolis are competing as to who shall give the public the fullest benefit in the reduction of the price of this article. In most shops in Drury lane and Clare-market moist sugar is sold as low as 3½d. and 4d. per lb., and refined sugar at 7d. A similar reduction has taken place in the New cut and the eastern districts of town.—[It is feared that the competition in sugar has led to considerable adulteration.]

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—There is a complete clearance of the houses from Holborn to Lily-street, Saffron-hill, in the line of the new street, comprising more than three-fourths of the distance to Clerkenwell; and the road is nearly formed to its proper level, the whole open remnant of the old Fleet ditch having been covered over. The road complete now from Whitechapel to Spitalfields Church has been formed, and paved on each side, the gas lamps having been erected, and the whole line to the docks will be ready for traffic in the course of the summer.

THE WEATHER.—The favourable change which took place in the state of the weather yesterday week still continues, with every appearance of its being lasting. During Saturday and Sunday there was a continuous fall of rain, with the wind S.W., which did not terminate till a late hour on Sunday night. Monday was, in reality, a March "summer's day," the sun shining with great power during the day, and the temperature being most genial. Thursday, also, was a beautiful spring day.

THE FOUNTAINS IN TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.—On Wednesday, about one o'clock, these fountains were put in operation on an experimental trial, which attracted a concourse of some hundreds of persons. Although the water has ascended to a height of forty feet, the jets were only suffered to play to a height of from six to eight feet, as with a greater ascent the water is, by the force of the wind, driven to a considerable distance across the square. The fountains are to play for ten hours each day, such being the contract with the engineers of the works. The cistern from which they are supplied at the top of the engine-house, in Orange street, holds 37,000 gallons of water, and the higher main, at the top of the tower, for the supply of the government offices, about 20,000 gallons.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

LAUNCH OF THE SPITFIRE STEAM-VESSEL, AT DEPTFORD.

This beautiful little steamer, similar in appearance and built on the same slip as the Porcupine, was launched on Wednesday, in the presence of Captain Superintendent Sir John Hill, Knt., Major Hill, of the 32nd Regiment, and a number of respectable parties assembled on the occasion. At three o'clock Mrs. Hill, wife of Major Hill, and daughter-in-law of Sir John Hill, drank a glass of wine to the success of the "Spitfire," and broke the bottle from which the wine was taken on the bows of the vessel. The knocking out the dog-shores then commenced, and in five minutes the Spitfire glided into her future element in fine style, amidst the hearty cheers of the spectators. The Royal Standard and the Admiralty and Union flags were raised on flagstaffs from the deck, and floated proudly in the breeze as the vessel entered the water. The Monkey steam-vessel was ordered round from Woolwich to take the Spitfire in tow to that dockyard to be fitted with her machinery.

DEATH OF REAR-ADMIRAL RICHARD POULDEN.—This gallant officer expired, aged 80 years, a few days ago, at his residence, Clifton Villa.

GENERAL SIR CHARLES WALE, K.C.B.—This gallant officer died at his seat, at Little Shelford, Cambridgeshire, on Thursday week, at the age of 81 years. He was Colonel of the 33rd Regiment, and distinguished himself during the course of a long military career in every quarter of the globe. In private life the deceased General was much beloved and respected.

THE ESPIEGLE, THE DARING, AND THE FLYING FISH.—These experimental 12 gun brigs arrived in Plymouth Sound last week, having been absent from port since the 4th inst. Both the Espiegle and the Flying Fish have gained considerably on the Daring twice. The first trip the Daring had a very slight advantage on a wind. The Espiegle, with five months' provisions on board, has beat the Flying Fish, with only three months' provisions under hatches, on a wind, in five trials out of eight. The Espiegle is considered the first as a man of war, and in other respects.

IRELAND.

THE BANQUET TO MR. O'CONNELL AT KILKENNY.—The long-talked of banquet to Mr. O'Connell and the other "Repeal martyrs" took place at Kilkenny on Tuesday. The procession was an immense one. By some the number of Repealers was estimated at 30,000. On Mr. O'Connell's carriage were—the principal martyr, Mr. John O'Connell, Mr. Barrett, Mr. Steele, Mr. Ray, and Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P. They were lustily cheered. The dinner was given in the body of a new building about to be consecrated as a chapel, a temporary roof of canvass being thrown across, tent fashion. It was well lighted, and over the chairman's seat the word "Repeal" blazed forth in bright gas light. Covers were laid for 600, and a row of seats was set apart for and occupied by ladies. At half-past six the doors were thrown open, and the band in attendance struck up "See the conquering hero comes." All eyes were turned towards the grand entrance, and in marched Mr. O'Connell, Mr. John O'Connell, Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P., Mr. D. Brown, M.P., Mr. Ray, Mr. Clements, and Dr. Cane (the Mayor of Kilkenny), all attired in the uniform of the '82 club. The sight of this warlike costume well nigh set some of the local Repeal leaders frantic with delight—they cheered, and shouted, and cheered again, the ladies waved their handkerchiefs, and one might say the company was compelled to stop by fatigue. After the usual toasts to the Royal Family, the Chairman (Dr. Cane) proposed, in the most eulogistic terms, the health of "O'Connell—Repeal—and No Surrender." Drunk with all the honours.—Mr. O'Connell, in reply, made a long speech, in the course of which he touched upon all the old topics. He said that no less than 50,000 voices proclaimed to-day that the Repeal spirit was high as ever. It gave an answer to the Queen's Speech, or rather to the speech her Ministers put into her mouth. The other speakers were Mr. J. O'Connell, Mr. T. Steele, Mr. Barrett, the Rev. Mr. Tierney, Mr. W. S. O'Brien, and Mr. R. F. D. Browne.

DISTURBED STATE OF THE COUNTRY.—The Irish provincial papers contain notices of occurrences indicative of the disturbed state of the country. Last week, near Aughroo Bridge, in the vicinity of Ballinamore, a person in the employment of Dr. Collins, who has a large property in that part of the county of Leitrim, was visited by a nocturnal gang of ruffians, who served him with a notice to quit the county on pain of incurring death. After this notice, one of the gang fired into the house, but, fortunately, without effect. The only crime attributed to the person thus attacked, is his having come from a distant part of the country, at the expense of the proprietor of the soil, to instruct the people in the best mode of draining and growing green crops. He has had nothing whatever to do with taking land or in ejecting. The counties of Roscommon, Longford, and Galway, are represented to be in a very disturbed state, there being many instances of the urning up of land and serving threatening notices.

ANOTHER MURDER IN TIPPERARY.—On the night of the 17th instant, some of the tenants and other persons in the employment of Mrs. Finch, Kilcoleman Abbey, assembled in the house of a man named Frawley, at Bannakry, at a tea party, and amongst them was Mrs. Finch's steward. About eleven o'clock Pat Ryan and Denis Brien, accompanied by four or five strangers, entered the barn of Frawley, where the party were dancing. Soon after Ryan and his companions made their appearance, they endeavoured to kick up a row with the steward (Coleman); in this they were defeated, in consequence of the people quietly ejecting them from the barn and closing the door. After being put out, they unfortunately met a quiet and unoffending poor man, named Jeremiah Halloran, whom they brutally murdered. Word was sent at once to the Kilcoleman police, who immediately went in pursuit, and succeeded in arresting Ryan and Brien, both of whom are fully committed.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

THE ALLEGED LADY THIEF.—At the Middlesex Sessions on Tuesday, Elizabeth Palmer, a respectably dressed widow, about fifty years of age, was indicted for stealing a piece of beef, value 1s. 6d., the property of Joseph Flowerdale. It appeared that the prisoner is the widow of a journeyman painter, and had been in the habit of dealing at the prosecutor's shop for several years, and that on the occasion in question she went to the shop, and while there was seen to take a piece of beef and conceal it, but was at once charged with the robbery, and given into custody. The circumstances have been mentioned in our paper. Mr. Payne addressed the jury on the part of the prisoner, and complained of the manner in which she had been paraded before the public as a lady thief, but for which the case would have been disposed of in a summary manner. The Learned Counsel called several witnesses, who gave the prisoner an excellent character, and who stated that her late husband was an honest, industrious mechanic, and had maintained that character for several years. Some of the witnesses stated that they knew the prisoner was in great distress at the time of the commission of the offence. The Jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." The Learned Judge then said that he should like to have some further inquiries made into the circumstances of the prisoner before pronouncing upon her the judgment of the Court, and for that purpose her sentence would be respited.

THE SPA-FIELDS BURIAL GROUND.—An indictment has been preferred at these Sessions, by Mr. Wakeling, on behalf of the parochial authorities of Clerkenwell, against the parties engaged in the perpetration of the outrages of public decency at the Spa-fields burial-ground, which are at present exciting so much attention. The grand jury returned a true bill.

POLICE.

SERIOUS OCCURRENCE AT STEPNEY FAIR.—On Tuesday, William Davis was charged at the THAMES Police-office with endangering the life of a man named Bell, in Stepney Fair. The injured person is now in the London Hospital, in a precarious state. David Adams, of No. 6, Match walk, Shadwell, said he was proprietor of an up-and-down swing in Stepney Fair, and the prisoner was employed by him to assist. While the lowest boat next the ground was being filled with passengers, a hook was screwed on to a stancheon and made fast, to prevent the revolution of the machine until the lowermost boat or car was properly filled, when it was unhooked, and the last boat filled sent up acting by its weight as a counterpoise to the boat coming down. Unless each boat was filled with the proper number of passengers, the labour of turning it was excessive. The boat next the ground had been stopped for the purpose of letting out nine passengers, and taking nine more in, and six only had already entered, when the prisoner unfastened the hook, and the top boat, containing nine passengers, overbalanced, and it came down very swiftly, causing the wheel to revolve, and turning round the handle of the winch at which Bell was stationed, and it struck him on the head and face, and injured him severely. The man was conveyed to the hospital. Mr. G. A. Falconer, a surgeon in the Commercial-road East, said a black man was brought to his house from Adams's "up and down," on Monday night, and expired a few minutes afterwards. He was called upon to see Bell a few minutes previous. There was a contused wound on the forehead, half an inch above the nose, one on the upper lip, and a severe bruise on the lower jaw. The injuries were very serious, and he should say the man was in danger. The prisoner, in defence, said he had no intention to do any injury whatever. There were two hooks, one on each side of the boat, and he unfastened one and the man the other. His master called out that the boat was too light, and he immediately jumped towards it, seized it with his hands, and was carried up six feet or more. His master called out, "You will be killed; let go;" and he did so. He did all that laid in his power to stop the boat when he saw it going up too fast. Charles Smith, police sergeant, said he was standing near the "up and down." The man injured was on a raised platform thirty feet from the ground, with a very slight railing around it. He heard the cracking of wood, and upon looking up, saw Bell hanging over the platform with his head downwards. The iron winch-handle of the machine revolved with great velocity, and struck him with great violence. The handle of the winch was too long, and the platform was so very small, that, in the event of any man upon it missing his hold of the winch, he must be struck by the handle (for he could not retreat backwards) unless he laid down. He saw the prisoner carelessly unlock the boat several times, while the master was present, before it was filled. Davis was remanded. He was again brought up on Wednesday. A certificate was put in, stating that Bell was out of danger, and Mr. Broderip liberated the prisoner upon his own recognizance to appear on Wednesday next, to answer any charge that may be preferred against him.

THE MORAL EFFECT OF EXECUTIONS.—At GUILDHALL, on Monday, a lad named Richard Lee was charged with stealing a silk handkerchief from the pocket of Mr. M'Millan, of Powell-street, while he was standing in the Old Bailey, about half-past eight o'clock, looking at the hanging corpse of the man Tapping, who was that morning executed. He detected the prisoner in the fact before he had taken the handkerchief away. The prisoner said the crowd was very great, and if he had his hand accidentally against the complainant's pocket, he had no idea of stealing the handkerchief.—Mr. Alderman Copeland committed him to Bridewell for fourteen days.

THE POISONING CASE AT CAMBERWELL.—On Monday George May, the shopman of the late Mr. and Mrs. Montague, who has been some time in custody on suspicion of having plundered his late master, was finally examined at LAMBETH Police-office, and discharged, as the magistrate was of opinion the evidence was not sufficiently strong to warrant committal for trial.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The German Universal Gazette says, that the British Ambassador had formally refused to grant any passport to the Ambassador from the Khan of Bokhara for England, as the Queen would not receive him at her Court.

A painting of the Nativity, by Rubens, is said to have been lately discovered by an English tourist in the church of one of the rural communes within the arrondissement of Montreuil. It had been long concealed behind a confessional.

Mr. Wm. Barrymore, well known as the celebrated pantomime author and stage manager, died at Boston, in America, on the 16th ult.

The Edinburgh papers announce the death of Mr. Alexander Blackwood, of the firm of Blackwood and Sons, the proprietors of Blackwood's Magazine. Mr. A. Blackwood was about 32.

A Berlin paper, of the 18th, states, that the Empress of Russia, accompanied by the Emperor, will visit Berlin in May, and proceed to Tegerusee for the recovery of her health. It is expected that the Emperor will bring with him the Count de Nesselrode. The same letter mentions a report that the King of Prussia intends the manufacturing and mercantile classes of his subjects to have representatives in the provincial Diets.

A man was executed at Rome on the 7th inst., by the guillotine for the murder of a pilgrim from Bavaria, for the purpose of robbing him. To heighten the punishment and as an example the criminal's head was exposed on the scaffold for the space of an hour. An unusual number of persons were present to witness the death of this hardened sinner, who had committed numerous crimes anterior to that for which he suffered.

The celebrated painter, Horace Vernet, has arrived at Marseilles, en route for Algeria, to study on the spot his intended painting of the battle of Isly.

Mr. John Drummond Hay, son of the late Consul-General at Tangier, is to succeed his father in that important office.

A letter from Havre, dated March 24, gives the following account of murders and suicide, arising from the new game law. A person was observed by two gens-d'armes with a double-barrelled fowling-piece, firing at game on the banks of the Caen River—the period allowed by law having expired. They approached to take him into custody. He addressed them saying, "You know me well, I am an old carabineer; if you approach ten paces I will shoot you both." Not minding him, or perhaps not believing him, they advanced. He fired one barrel after the other, and shot both dead; he then reloaded his piece, put it to his mouth, and blew his own brains out.

The first cargo of Java sugar, with a certificate of origin, has just arrived from Batavia, imported by Messrs. Thornton and West, which, under Sir Robert Peel's new act, will come in at the duty of 23s. 4d. per cwt. instead of 35s. 9d., the rate fixed last year.

News has been received from Cowes, of the loss of the Siam, East Indiaman, bound from Calcutta to London, with a valuable cargo. The last land made was the Lizard; her keel and rudder were knocked off and drove ashore. A lad belonging to her was drowned, and also a man from Freshwater. She is close in with the cliffs, and has twelve feet water in her hold. There is no chance of getting the ship off.

Letters from Stuttgard state that a slight shock of an earthquake was felt at Dornstellen on the 17th. The Neckar has overflowed its banks in several places, and considerably damaged the works on the railway at Esslingen.

Mrs. Harriet Downing, the authoress of the "Remembrances of a Monthly Nurse," in "Fraser," and the "Monthly" magazines, and of many poetical pieces and stories in the periodicals and annuals, died last week at Chipping Norton.

Her Royal Highness Princess Amelia Augusta, consort of his Royal Highness Prince Johan, of Saxony, was delivered of a Prince, on the 15th instant, at Dresden. Her Royal Highness and infant were, according to the last accounts from that city, progressing favourably.

Letters from Constantinople of the 7th inst. mention that a serious mutiny had broken out among the Albanian recruits who had recently arrived in that city, in consequence of their pay having been withheld. The mutiny was at length put down; but not until several of the regular troops had been wounded. Five of the mutineers were ordered to receive 500 strokes of the bastinado upon their feet.

The new pier, at Gravesend, is now finished, and was on Monday morning thrown open to the public.

EVENING MELODIES. NO. VII.

There 's a spell in these vales, one imagines, must touch
The hearts of all wand'rers who find them;
Yet that spell's only felt to perfection by such
As come with those hearts left behind them!
If you've never lov'd deeply and wildly, depart,
And visit this country again, sir;
Let some image of bliss have made captive your heart,
And see how it looks to you then, sir!

There 's a tale of a man, who, though born in this dell,
Could see nothing lovely about it;
He had heard of that stone of which alchymists tell,
And his life was not happy without it:
But one day to the bower of a lady he stroll'd,
When he found his own folly had hid it;
For all things from that hour turned as precious as gold,
And Love was the bright stone that did it!

Oh! the best of all landscapes were dark, did we rove
With a soul that felt hated and lonely;
For valleys and mountain-streams weren't made to love,
As valleys and mountain-streams only!
But each glance that we give them, new thoughts should infuse
Of some heart that can never turn from us;
As the rainbow, though bright for its various hues,
Looks brighter because of the Promise! R. R. S.

HOME MANUFACTURE OF BEET-ROOT SUGAR.

We find by a Parliamentary paper that there is one manufactory of sugar from beet-root and potatoes, at Stratford, in Essex, which made 3800 cwts. of sugar in 1843, and 5420 cwts. in 1844. There is another at Liverpool, which made 43¾ cwts. in 1843, and 62 cwts. in 1844. There is a third at Portaferry, in Ireland, which seems to have begun in 1844, and in that year made 115½ cwts. This home manufacture pays duty at the colonial rate, namely, 25s. 2½d. per cwt. Last year the duty came to £7052.

DWELLING-HOUSE AND WINDOW TAX.

The total number of dwelling-houses in the United Kingdom, at the census of 1841, was as follows:—In England, 3,144,641; in Ireland, 1,384,360; and in Scotland, 529,524; being a total of 5,058,525. The number of houses assessed to the window-duty during the same year was, in England, 414,395; and in Scotland, 33,025; total, 447,420. Whilst the amount of duty was, in England, £1,716,331 for the year 1841, and £1,618,932 for the year 1844; in Scotland, £114,126 for 1841, and £124,468 for 1844; making together a total of £1,830,457 for 1841, and £1,743,400 for 1844.

THE ADVANTAGE OF ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

A Dutch sculptor of the name of Petersen is reported to have contrived artificial legs and arms so perfect, that the latter, though they weigh only one pound, are rather better than natural arms. At least, they are not liable to rheumatism, stiffness in the joints, or fractures, to need amputation.

ONE MORE COMET.

A letter from Rome mentions the discovery of another new comet on the 25th ult., in the constellation of Ursa Major. It was proved to be a true comet, its right ascension as well as its declination, having sensibly diminished on the succeeding day.

TO SLEEP.

Smile as I bow me to thy shrine, O Sleep!
Balm of all weariness, solace of all ill!
Veil up my senses; not that I may kill
Scorpions of conscience 'neath thy shadows deep—
But that from thy protection I may reap
Peace and refreshment, as thy dews instil
Into my frame, and all my spirit fill
With joy, that thou thy watch didst safely keep.
Samaritan of life! with pitying smile,
When weary nature fails upon the road,
Thou com'st an angel to the sons of toil—
Cheering their spirits—lightening their load:
Though wealth may win thee not with golden will,
Unasked upon contentment thou'rt bestowed. H. F. L.

DISTRESSING TO LADIES OF A CERTAIN AGE.

Baron Alderson has decided that a female aged thirty-two is not a girl, but a young woman.

THE RULING PASSION.

After a marriage in Connecticut, the bridegroom took the parson aside most mysteriously, and whispered to him, "Can't you take the pay out in 'tatoes."

THE ELECTRICAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Wheatstone is on his way to Paris for the arrangement of an electric telegraph in France. It may soon be completed from Havre to Paris; from Paris to Marseilles there will be a continuous line of railway, and a telegraph on it; thus we reach the Mediterranean; thence Egypt, across the desert, and so to Bombay and Calcutta. We shall soon have our continuous line to Venice; then across the desert, and finally from Calcutta to Bombay as before.

CONTRADICTION OF PROVERBS.

"The more the merrier." Not so; one hand is enough in a purse.
"Nothing but has an end." Not so; a ring hath none, for it is round.
"Money is a great comfort." Not when it brings a thief to the gallows.
"The world is a long journey." Not so; the sun goes over it every day.
"A friend is best found in adversity." Not so; for then there is none to be found.
"The pride of the rich makes the labour of the poor." Not so; the labour of the poor makes the pride of the rich.

A ROCKITE ARGUMENT.

A Tipperary Rockite sends a letter of advice to a neighbour about taking a certain piece of land or letting it alone, and ends with this pithy question, "What's the whole world to a man if his wife be a widow?"

A BUSY TOWN.

They have a little town "Out West," which appears to have been overlooked by Dickens and other English travellers, and which is "all sorts" of a stirring place. In one day they recently had two street fights, hung a man, rode three miles out of town on a rail, got up a quarter race, a turkey shooting, a gander pulling, a match dog fight, had preaching by a methodist circuit rider, who afterwards ran a foot-race for drinks "all round;" and as if this was not enough, the judge of the court, after losing a year's salary at single-handed poker, and whipping a person who said he didn't understand the game, went out and helped to lynch a man for hog-stealing.—Halifax Morning Post.

THE OLDEST INHABITANT DISCOVERED.

We have finally found out (says an American paper) who that much-talked-of individual, the "oldest inhabitant," is. An elderly chap, speaking of his great knowledge of the western country the other day, said that he had "known the Mississippi river ever since it was a small creek!" He's the man.

IMPROVEMENT IN TRAVELLING.

In March, 1745, a Bath paper announced that the London Flying stage-coach would perform the journey from Bath in two days. In March, 1845, the distance was performed in two hours and three quarters.

THE CONVICT'S WIFE.

Her lovely daughter prattled at her knee;
While tears bedimned her eyes, to think its fate
In the wide world was lone and desolate,
Save her own fond devotion—you might see
The working of her bosom's agony,
Upon her face its force delineate;
And as her finger checked the infant's prate—
Again, her tears gush'd copiously and free.
Unmated dove! whose happy early nest
Rude crime broke in upon, and tore away
The unworthy partner of thy guileless breast,
And left thee here for scorn, or shame, a prey:
Who shall administer thy spirit rest—
Or help thee bear the burden of the day? H. F. L.

AMERICAN COMMERCIAL ELOQUENCE.

A remarkable rich specimen of the commercial eloquence and "florid style" used by our Transatlantic brethren, is to be met with in recent New York papers, in the form of an advertisement, recommending the attractions of—a tailor's shop! The head-line consists of the single word "Niagara," in capitals an inch long, and then the lofty spirit of the Yankee "man of measures" breaks out in these words:—"Like the rush of the mighty waters of Niagara, bearing everything on in its course, so has been the rush of trade at Oak Hall during the last [illegible]

DESTRUCTION OF THE "TRIBUNE" OFFICE, NEW YORK.

DESTRUCTION OF THE "TRIBUNE" OFFICE, NEW YORK.

During the terrific storm at New York, on the 5th ult., a fire broke out at about 4 o'clock in the morning, in the office of the Tribune newspaper, covering lots Nos. 158 and 160, Nassau-street, New York, opposite the City Hall. At the time of the alarm, Mr. Graham, the proprietor of the Tribune, and a clerk, were sleeping in the second story, until awakened by the roar of the flames, and the door and stairway being on fire, they jumped from a window and escaped. The compositors in the fifth story, and the pressmen in the basement, had barely time to save themselves. A few books were saved, and nothing else. The circumstances of this fire were very peculiar. In the account in the Tribune, it is observed:—

"No man could have imagined that such an establishment, in which men were constantly at work night and day, could be wholly consumed by fire. There has not been another night, since the building was put up, when it could have been burned down, even if deliberately fired for that purpose. But when this fire broke out, under a strong gale and snow storm of twenty-four hours' continuance, which had rendered the streets impassable, it was well nigh impossible to drag an engine at all. Some of them could not be got out of their houses; others were dragged a few rods, and then given up of necessity; and those which reached the fire found the nearest hydrant frozen up, and only to be opened with an axe. Meantime, the whole building was in a blaze."

All that is stated as to the origin of the fire is, that a boy lighted a fire in a stove at four o'clock, and half an hour afterwards the apartment was in flames.

The loss of the co-tenants has been very considerable. Tammany Hall was at one time in imminent danger. The rear part, connecting with the Tribune Buildings, was in a blaze, but the flames were subdued by the prompt and energetic exertions of the firemen.

On the morning after the fire, in searching the ruins for property, a watch and chain, and purse of money, which had been left under a pillow of one of the beds, was discovered. The watch was much injured, but the purse and money were not damaged.

THE LATE EXPLOSION AT ALGIERS.

In our journal of last week we detailed this frightful catastrophe, which occurred at Algiers, on the 8th inst. We now annex a representation of the sad scene, after the explosion, from a sketch by M. Duplan. In the background is shown a portion of the city of Algiers; in the foreground workmen are occupied in clearing away the ruins; to the left is the lighthouse of the port, which is left entire, and commands the ruins of the casemates, where lodged the second and seventh companies of artillery. In the middle of the view is the chamber of the Commandant, M. Pallard, and above is that of the Commissary of the Marine; and somewhat more to the left is the kitchen of Madame Segretier, overlooked by the dwelling of the Admiral's Aide-de-camp.

LLANLLECHYD CHURCH.

This neat church is just on the eve of completion, in the mountainous region of Carnarvonshire. The parish comprises 19,000 acres, and has a population of 5000 persons, consisting of small farmers and quarry-men. The cost of this "humble house of God" will not exceed £1800, of which sum £1400 has been subscribed some weeks since; and it is hoped this attempt to meet the spiritual wants of this portion of the Principality will be crowned with success, and the entire sum shortly raised. The architecture of the church is a fair specimen of the Anglo-Norman style, from the design of Mr. H. Kennedy, architect, Bangor.

LLANLLECHYD CHURCH.

THE LORD MAYOR'S ENTERTAINMENT.

On Monday the Lord Mayor gave a grand entertainment in the Egyptian Hall, at the Mansion House, when about 300 sat down to a sumptuous banquet. Amongst the distinguished guests present were Lord Stanley, the Earl of Lincoln, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Bishop of Llandaff, the Bishop of Peterborough, Mr. Baron Rolfe, Sir H. Pottinger, the Chevalier Bunsen, the Prussian Ambassador, the Buenos Ayres Minister, Sir Felix Booth, Alderman Moon, &c.

After the accustomed toasts to the Royal Family, the Lord Mayor gave "The Health of the Foreign Ministers in this country.

The Chevalier Bunsen, the Prussian Minister, returned thanks, and expatiated upon the importance of maintaining peace, for the benefit of the communities of all the states in Europe. Whilst England maintained her present firm position, in opposition to hostile movements, it was impossible for any nation in Europe to disturb the present amicable state of affairs. (Hear, hear.)

The Lord Mayor then gave the health of her Majesty's Ministers, and complimented them upon the manner in which they had restored the balance between the revenue and expenditure of the country. (Hear.)

Lord Stanley returned thanks for the honour which had been done to himself and his colleagues. In undertaking this pleasing task, he could not help regretting the absence of other members of the Administration, who, he was sure, would have felt proud to have been present on this occasion. The Premier had gone to his family seat in Warwickshire, and the Duke of Wellington had been obliged, also, by the infirmities which age brought upon him, to go into the country during the vacation. But he was happy to say, and he thanked God for being able to say it, that the infirmities of the body were not accompanied by any diminution of the mental faculties. (Hear, hear, hear.) The noble lord proceeded to say that he cordially concurred with his Excellency the Prussian Minister as to the importance of the maintenance of peace. War presented no advantages commensurate with the horrors which it incurred. Apart from all religious grounds of opposition, he believed that it was now generally agreed that the horrors of war should not be wantonly incurred by the nations of the world. (Hear, hear.) The incidents of war were of a terrible and revolting character, which would not be incurred unless under the most stringent occasion. (Hear, hear.) Considering the matter in this light, her Majesty's Government had felt it their duty, whenever a difference of opinion arose with a foreign power, not weakly to yield to the demands of that power, but to ask for those explanations which by the nature of the case could be given; and it had not occurred in any of these cases that they had occasion to desire to seek other means of obtaining what was their due. (Hear, hear.) Whilst seeking to promote a general peace, however, the Government had not neglected to place the resources of the country on such a footing as to enable them to meet at any time any hostile movement which might be made against them. The equalization of the expenditure and revenue of the country was one of the first points of anxiety with her Majesty's Ministers, and the country, by generously seconding and promoting those views, had ably done its duty, and ensured a permanent advantage to their commercial relations and fiscal position. (Hear, hear.) Her Majesty's Ministers, after the success which had attended them in this matter, felt with pleasure that, if at any period, however near, they should be superseded in their official position, they had laid the foundation for a permanent peace, which no country in Europe would heedlessly dare to interrupt. (Cheers.) The noble lord, in conclusion, proposed the health of the Lord Mayor.

The Lord Mayor returned thanks, and then proposed "The Church of England." If true to itself, it must stand. (Cheers)

The Bishop of Llandaff returned thanks.

After some other toasts the assembly adjourned to the drawing-room, where dancing commenced, and was kept up with great spirit for some hours.

BRAZILIAN SUGAR MILL.

SLAVE LABOUR IN THE BRAZILS.

The prohibitory duties levied by Sir Robert Peel on the slave sugars of the Brazils, having called public attention to the condition of the slaves in South America, many conflicting statements have been put forth, to show on the one hand the justness and humanity of his restrictions, and, on the other, to depreciate them as partial, and founded on an hypocritical regard for sufferings which have no real existence. Both classes are, to some extent, in error; but the latter most so. The slaves are not so well off as the friends of the planters would have us believe; nor are they, on the contrary, so badly used as the anti-slavery party declare. The following account of the condition of the sugar farms of the Brazils—which present the most complete examples of the cases in question—will show, that the position of the slave, whether it be regarded politically or religiously, is both in principle and practice a bad one; and that, consequently, the Premier has shown a wise discretion in setting his face against it.

The most considerable plantations in Brazil are those devoted to the production of sugar, but a triple utility is demanded from them. Each sugar estate must have a large forest to furnish supplies of wood for building, fire-wood, &c.; another portion is set aside for the plantation, properly so called; and a third is reserved for the culture of grains, fruits, and other edibles for the sustenance of the persons composing the establishment. Besides these three divisions, small allotments are portioned off for the slaves, to cultivate for their own benefit. Finally, most sugar estates are in this but little cultivated territory so extensive, that the planter has seldom a sufficient capital, or number of slaves, to keep the whole under tillage at one time. Nor would it be his interest to do so; for, in the low state of agricultural science in Brazil, the planter, when once the land is exhausted, makes no attempt to renew its productiveness by artificial means, and therefore abandons it altogether, and sets his slaves to work in clearing and burning the forest to establish a new plantation, letting the old one lie till nature has restored its powers. This operation is called roçada. Plantations where there are thirty or forty slaves, and as many horses and oxen, are deemed considerable, but those of the greatest magnitude have not less than fifty or sixty of each.

Such being the field of slave labour in Brazil, we now proceed to describe the labour itself, and the domestic treatment of the labourers.

The slaves are sent to work at sunrise, and at eight o'clock half an hour is allowed for breakfast but in some places the meal is taken before leaving the house. At mid-day two hours is allowed or rest and dinner, and work is continued till six in the evening; but in many plantations, instead of pursuing their work in the fields, the slaves occupy the time between five and seven, in supplying the horses with forage, and in collecting fire-wood from the neighbouring forests. It is usual when they return from their work, to present themselves to the planter, and wish him "good evening."

The various seasons bring with them many changes in the ordinary occupations of the slaves. During the sugar harvest, for instance, the work is carried on day and night; the negroes relieving each other in gangs, like the watches on shipboard. The harvest takes place from the end of September to the end of October, and during that time nothing is neglected to keep them in good humour and in good health, so that there is at its commencement a great deal of gaiety, and a great deal of uproar; but soon after, excess of labour exhausts their strength, particularly those who have to grind the sugar; and they are often so overworked that they drop asleep in the middle of their occupation; whence is derived the Portuguese saying, "He sleeps like a slave at a sugar mill."

It frequently happens that inattention, arising from fatigue, produces fatal results; sometimes the head, sometimes the clothes of the negro whose duty it is to place the canes between the cylinders, are caught in them, and perhaps the whole body is drawn in, no assistance is immediately at hand. In some plantations we see beside [illegible]cane, a strong bar of iron, which in such cases is introduced between the two rollers, to stop their motion or to separate them; there is no other way of saving the sufferer. It is thought that there is less danger when the machine is moved by oxen, than when mules are employed, for the latter, frightened by the cries of the negro, turn the mill more rapidly, while the oxen immediately stop.

In the position of slaves much depends also upon the department of agriculture followed in the plantation to which they are attached: for example, the situation of slaves is more arduous and painful where they are required to clear the ground for new plantations or roçadas, than that of those who are employed upon estates which have already been cultivated; but, above all, if the new lands are a great distance from habited districts, for there the slaves are exposed to unhealthy climates and temperatures, particularly in marshes. Their habitations in such cases are nothing better than huts temporarily formed of tree branches; and they are subjected to every kind of privation, and the attacks of wild animals, venomous serpents, and mischievous insects.

Another description of slave labour is that of carrying produce, in company with the planter, from the coast to the plantation, or from the interior to the coast. It is true that the irregularity of living to be endured by these troperos, exposes them to occasional hardships; but, on the other hand, they enjoy more liberty than their fellows, and are placed on a more equal footing with their owners, on account of being obliged to share with them the difficulties and dangers of the journeys, which are sometimes formidable, from the beaten roads in Brazil being few, and only occurring between considerable towns. The most trustworthy and capable of a large proprietor's slaves are sent with cattle to grazing grounds (facendas de criaz), which are often situated at great distances from home. These shepherds being so entirely removed from the eye of the master, enjoy more liberty than their fellows, and, in return for it, seldom betray the trust which is reposed in them. It is the ambition of most of the field-slaves to become vaquerios, and to be sent away with the cattle to live in campos.

We next come to the condition and treatment of Brazilian slaves.

The planters, generally, favour marriages between their slaves; for they know by experience that it is the best means to attach them to the plantation, and the strongest guarantee for their good conduct. Nevertheless, there are many exceptions to this rule; for often the manners and morals of the slaves are fearfully degraded by the example of the master. The girls are married when fourteen years old, and the men at the age of seventeen. The wives assist in the field, and the young couple have a piece of ground given them (in addition to the garden), on which to build a cabin. They are also allowed more time to work on their own account. The possession of the whole plot thus allotted to the slaves causes an amelioration in their condition not met with in many other countries where they are employed. Indeed, wherever the forms of the Roman Catholic religion are strictly observed, the negroes have a large proportion of leisure time, on account of the number of feasts and holidays, which they are always allowed to employ for their own especial benefit. The saints' days observed in Brazil absorb no fewer than a hundred days in the year; consequently, it is not uncommon to see a slave a man of some substance, possessing pigs, fowls, and sometimes a horse, or mule, which he is able to let out at a profit. Sometimes they acquire a sufficient sum by the sale of produce from their gardens, and other resources, to puchase their own manumission. In that case, or when a slave dies—so entirely is the ground given to him by his master, his own—that he may dispose of, or bequeath it to, whomsoever he pleases.

The children of negroes, though also the slaves of the planter, are seldom required to work till they are twelve years old, except upon occasions to wash vegetables for the family, or to take care of the beasts. When they get older the girls are set to spin, and the boys to work in the fields; but should a young negro evince a predilection for any particular trade, he is put to learn it, that he may afterwards exercise it upon the plantation. This increases his chance of freedom, if he be prudent and industrious, for he can employ his spare time to much greater advantage than ordinary slaves.

All this, it must be confessed, exhibits the bright side of the picture; but a dark shade is cast upon it by the severity and frequency of corporeal punishments to which Brazilian slaves are subjected. Although the law professes to punish crimes, yet it leaves the correction of minor offences to the master, nominally restricting the quantity inflicted to the degree of the offence; but most of the proprietors are beyond the reach of the law, and exercise a despotic power. Indeed punishment seems never absent, for the overseer (feitor) urges the slaves to work whip in hand, and drives them out of the house in the morning like a herd of cattle, superintending their labour during the whole day by the aid of the degrading, unhumanizing whip. If within reach of public authority, the slave, on committing a great crime, is punished by it; but for drunkenness, laziness, or intoxication, the master takes that office upon himself—for the duty of feitor, or driver, is rather to urge the negroes to labour than to punish them for faults. The gravest offences are visited with flogging, for which purpose the culprit is fastened to a post or block (cepo) fixed in the sugar house, and the lash applied upon his bare back. For minor faults he receives a proportionate number of palmados, or slaps upon the palm of the hand, with a sort of wooden bat or custici. It is seldom that a negro is corrected, except in the presence of the whole of the slaves, for the sake of example.

Our cut shows an ordinary scene of domestic punishment, less dreadful than those we have described, but not the less injurious to the poor creatures whose lot it is to endure them. Although it may be impossible to preserve an efficient discipline amongst a large body of slaves without some kind of punishment, yet its frequent application has always been found to deteriorate from their value and usefulness; for, if it be true that a bad servant requires the most correction, it is also true that the more he is punished the worse he becomes: and thus a complete reciprocity between cause and effect is established.

The worst feature of slavery we have purposely kept out of view—namely, the trade carried on in the human species; the procuring negroes, in the first instance—the kidnapping—the horrible transit in densely-crowded and confined ships—and the sale in the public markets—by persons, too, who profess Christianity. These considerations and facts kept in view, it is not too much to say that efforts, in common with those made by the Government, ought to be exercised by many "who profess and call themselves Christians," while others are directed to the improvement of less enlightened, and therefore less guilty, communities.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1845.
